[I] The Biſhop warmly oppoſed it in the Upper-Houſe] His ſpeech was as follows, 'My Lords, here are certain bills exhibited againſt the clergy, wherein there 'are complaints made againſt the viciouſneſs, idleneſs, rapacity, and cruelty of Biſhops, Abbots, Prieſts, 'and their Officials: but, my Lords, are all vitious, 'all idle, all ravenous, and cruel Prieſts, or Biſhops? 'And for ſuch as are ſuch, are there no laws provided 'already againſt ſuch? Is there any abuſe that we do 'not ſeek to rectify? Or can there be ſuch a rectification, as that there ſhall be no abuſes? Or are not 'clergymen to rectify the abuſes of the clergy? Or 'ſhall men find fault with other mens manners, whiles 'they forget their own? and puniſh where they have 'no authority to correct? if we be not executive in 'our laws, let each man ſuffer for his delinquency; 'or if we have not power, aid us with your aſſiſtance, 'and we ſhall give you thanks. But, my Lords, I 'hear there is a motion made, that the ſmall Monaſteries ſhall be taken into the King's hands, which 'makes me fear it is not ſo much the good as the 'goods of the Church, that is looked after. Truly, 'my Lord, how this may found in your ears I cannot 'tell, but to me it appears no otherwiſe, than as if 'our holy mother the Church were to become a bondmaid, and new-brought into ſervility and thraldom, 'and by little and little to be quite baniſhed out of 'thoſe dwelling places, which the piety and liberality 'of our foreſathers, as moſt bountiful benefactors, 'have conferred upon her; otherwiſe to what tendeth 'theſe portentous and curious petitions of the Commons? to no other intent or purpoſe, but to bring 'the clergy into contempt with the laity, that they 'may ſeize their patrimony. But, my Lords, beware 'of yourſelves and your country; beware of your holy 'mother the catholique Church; the people are ſubject unto novelties, and Lutheraniſm ſpreads itſelf 'amongſt us. Remember, Germany and Bohemia, 'what miſeries are befallen them already; and let our 'neighbours houſes that are now on fire, teach us to 'beware our own diſaſters. Wherefore, my Lords, I 'will tell you plainly what I think, that except ye reſiſt manfully by your authorities, this violent heap of 'miſchiefs offered by the Commons, you ſhall ſee all 'obedience, firſt drawn from the clergy; and ſecondly 'from yourſelves; and if you ſearch into the true 'cauſes which reign among them, you ſhall find that 'they all ariſe through want of faith'——At this ſpeech ſome of the Lords were pleaſed, others diſpleaſed. And the Duke of Norfolk, addreſſing himſelf to the Biſhop, ſaid, 'My Lord of Rocheſter, many of theſe words might have been well ſpared; but 'I wis that it is often ſeen that the greateſt clerks are 'not always the wiſeſt men.' To which the Biſhop replied, 'My Lord, I do not remember any fools in 'my time that ever proved great clerks.' But when the Commons heard of it, they were all in a flame, and ſent their ſpeaker Thomas Audeley to complain to the King: who thereupon ſent for the Biſhop, and aſked him, 'why he ſpake thus?' The Biſhop anſwered, that 'being in counſel, he ſpake his mind in 'defence of the Church, whom he ſaw daily injured, 'and oppreſſed by the common people, whoſe office 'it was not to judge of her manners, much leſs to reform them, and therefore he thought himſelf in conſcience bound to defend her in all that lay within 'his power.' The King bid him 'uſe his words 'more temperately,' and that was all. Which gave the Commons little ſatisfaction (12).

[K] In 1530, he eſcaped two very great dangers, namely of being poiſoned, and ſhot, in his houſe at Lambeth-marſh.] One Richard Rouſe, who was acquainted with the cook, coming into the Biſhop's kitchen; took his opportunity, while the cook was gone to fetch him ſome drink, to throw a great quantity of poiſon into gruel which was prepared for the Biſhop's dinner. He could eat nothing that day, ſo eſcaped; but, of ſeventeen perſons that ate of it, one Mr Bennet Curwin, and an old widow, died, and the reſt never perfectly recovered their healths. Upon this occaſion, an act was made, which declared poiſoning to be high-treaſon, and adjudged the offender to be boiled to death. That ſevere puniſhment was inflicted upon Rouſe, in Smithfield, ſoon after. But the act was repealed, 1 Edw. VI. c. 12. & 1 Mar. c. 1.——As for the other danger, it was thus. A cannon-bullet, that was ſhot from the other ſide of the Thames, piereed through his houſe, and came very near his ſtudy, where he uſed to ſpend moſt of his time (13).

[L] For which the reader will be pleaſed to conſult the note.] Thoſe reaſons are taken from a letter written by him to the Houſe of Lords, while the bill for attainting Elizabeth Barton and her accomplices, was depending.—— 'It may pleaſe you to conſider 'that I ſought not for this woman's coming unto me, 'nor thought in her any manner of deceit. She was 'the perſon that, by many probable and likely conjectures, I then reputed to be right honeſt, religious, 'and very good and vertuous. I verily ſuppoſed, 'that ſuch feigning and craft, compaſſing of any guile 'or fraud had been far from her: and what default 'was this in me, ſo to think, when I had ſo many 'probable teſtimonies of her virtue? 1. The bruit of 'the country which generally called her the Holy Maid. 2. Her entrance into religion upon certain 'viſions which was commonly ſaid that ſhe had. '3. For the good religion and learning that was 'thought to be in her ghoſtly father (14), and in other 'virtuous

The Court having the advantage againſt him they wanted, ſoon made uſe of it, by adjudging him to be guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon, for concealing the Maid's ſpeeches that related to the King; and condemning him (with five others) in loſs of goods, and impriſonment during the King's pleaſure: but he was releaſed upon paying 300*l.* for his Majeſty's uſe [M]. In the ſame Parliament, which met Jan. 15, 1533-4, wherein this ſentence was paſſed upon him and the reſt of Elizabeth Barton's accomplices; an act was made, which abſolutely annulled King Henry's marriage with Catherine of Arragon; confirmed his marriage with Anne Boleyn; intailed the crown upon her iſſue, and nominally upon the Lady Elizabeth; made it high-treaſon to ſlander or do any thing to the derogation of this laſt marriage; and injoined all perſons whatſoever to maintain and keep the contents of this act (g). In purſuance of it, on the day of the prorogation of that Parliament, March 30, an oath was taken by both Houſes, whereby they 'ſwore to 'bear faith, truth and obedience all onely to the King's Majeſty, and to his heirs of his 'body of his moſt dear and entirely beloved lawfull wife Queen Anne, begotten and 'to be begotten. And farther to the heirs of the ſaid ſovereign Lord, accor-'ding to the limitation in the Statute made for ſurety of his ſucceſſion in the crown 'of this realm mentioned and contained, and not to any other within this realm, nor 'foreign authority or potentate, &c (h).' Inſtead of taking this oath, Biſhop Fiſher withdrew to his houſe at Rocheſter. But he had not been there above four days, before he received orders from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other Commiſſioners, authorized under the Great-Seal to tender the oath, to appear before them at Lambeth. He appeared accordingly, and the oath being preſented to him, he peruſed it a while, and then deſired time to conſider of it; ſo five days were allowed him. At the expiration of them, he appeared again before the Commiſſioners, and told them, 'He had 'peruſed the oath with as good deliberation as he could: but as they had framed it, he 'could not (with any ſafety to his own conſcience) ſubſcribe thereto, except they would 'give him leave to alter it in ſome particulars; whereby his own conſcience might be the 'better ſatisfied, the King pleaſed, and his actions rather juſtified, and warranted by law.' They all made anſwer, that 'the King would not in any wiſe permit, that the oath 'ſhould admit of any exceptions or alterations whatſoever.' And the Archbiſhop in particular, ſaid, 'You muſt anſwer directly, whether you will or will not ſubſcribe.' To which the Biſhop replied, 'If you will needs have me anſwer directly, my anſwer is, 'that foraſmuch as my own conſcience cannot be ſatisfied, I abſolutely refuſe the oath.' Whereupon he was immediately committed to the Tower, it being on the 26th of April 1534 (i). But, in reſpect of his great reputation for learning and piety, earneſt endeavours were uſed to bring him to a compliance. Some Biſhops waited upon him for that purpoſe; as did afterwards the Lord Chancellor Audeley, and others of the Privy-Council, but they found him immoveable (k) [N]. Secretary Cromwell was alſo with him, to try to

'virtuous and well learned Prieſts, that then teſtified 'of her holineſs, as it was commonly reported. Fi-'nally, my Lord of Canterbury (15), that then was 'both her ordinary and a man reputed of high wiſ-'dom and learning, told me that ſhe had many great 'viſions. And of him I learned greater things than 'ever I heard of the Nun herſelf.——But here 'twill be ſaid, that ſhe told me ſuch words as was to 'the peril of the Prince, and of the realm.——The 'words that ſhe told me concerning the peril of the 'King's Highneſs were theſe, That ſhe had her revelation from God, that if the King went forth with 'the purpoſe that he intended, he ſhould not be King 'of England ſeven months after, and ſhe told me alſo, 'that ſhe had been with the King and ſhewed unto 'his Grace the ſame revelation.——But whereas, 'I never gave her any counſel to this matter, nor 'knew of any forging or feigning thereof, I truſt in 'your great wiſdoms that you will not think any de-'fault in me touching this point.——It will be ſaid, 'that I ſhould have ſhewed the words unto the King's 'Highneſs. Verily if I had not undoubtedly thought 'that ſhe had ſhewed the ſame words unto his Grace, 'my duty had been ſo to have done. But when ſhe 'herſelf, which pretended to have had this revelation 'from God, had ſhewed the ſame; I ſaw no neceſſity 'why that I ſhould renew it again to his Grace.—— 'And not only her own ſaying thus perſuaded me, but 'her Prioreſs's words confirmed the ſame, and their 'ſervants alſo reported to my ſervants that ſhe had 'been with the King. And yet beſides all this, I 'knew it not long after by ſome others that ſo it was 'indeed——— (16).

[M] He was releaſed upon paying 300*l. for his Majeſty's uſe*] This is R. Hall's account (17). But Dr Burnet ſays, he does not find, that the King proceeded againſt him upon this act, till by new provocations he drew a heavier ſtorm of indignation upon himſelf (18). He obſerves further upon this point, that when the cheat was firſt diſcovered, Secretary Cromwell, ſent the Biſhop's brother to him, with a ſharp reproof for his carriage in that buſineſs; and withal adviſed him to write to the King, and deſire his pardon, which he knew the King, conſidering his age and ſickneſs, would grant. But he wrote back, excuſing himſelf, that all he did, was only to try whether her revelations were true, &c.—Cromwell ſent him a long anſwer (19); in which he charges the matter upon him heavily, and ſhews him, that he had not proceeded as a grave Prelate ought to have done; for he had taken all that he had heard of her upon truſt, and had examined nothing.——Then he ſhews, how guilty he was, in not revealing what concerned the King's life, and how frivolous all his excuſes were. —And after all, tells him, that though his excuſing the matter had provoked the King, and that if it came to a trial, he would certainly be found guilty; yet again he adviſes him to beg the King's pardon for his negligence, and offence in that matter, and undertakes that the King would receive him into his favour.——But Fiſher was ſtill obſtinate, and made no ſubmiſſion, and ſo was included within the act for miſpriſion of treaſon.

[N] But they found him immoveable] His anſwer to the Biſhops was thus, 'My very good friends, and 'ſome of you my old acquaintance, I know you wiſh 'me no hurt, but a great deal of good; and I do be-'lieve, that upon the terms you ſpeak of, I might 'have the King's favour as much as ever. Where-'fore, if you can anſwer me to one queſtion, I will 'perform all your deſires. What is that, ſaid they? 'It is this, ſaid the Biſhop, what will it gain a man 'to to perſuade and convince him. He adviſed him to write to the King: But he told Cromwell, that as he knew the King's jealous temper, he was afraid of writing, for fear his Majeſty ſhould take ſomething amiſs: however, upon his repeated ſollicitations, he conſented to write. Cromwell found, that the thing which ſtuck moſtly with him, was, That the marriage was to be reckoned contrary to the law of God, on account of the prohibition in the Levitical Law. He ſent therefore Roland Lee, elect of Coventry and Lichfield, to talk with him upon that point. The iſſue was, Biſhop Fiſher declared, that he would ſwear to the ſucceſſion; never diſpute any more about the marriage; and promiſed allegiance to the King: But his conſcience could not be convinced, that the marriage was againſt the law of God (l). Theſe conceſſions did not ſatisfy the King [O]: who was reſolved to let all his ſubjects ſee, there was no mercy to be expected from him by any one who oppoſed his will (m). Therefore, in the Parliament which met the 3d of November 1534, he was attainted for refuſing the oath of ſucceſſion, and his biſhopric was declared void from the 2d of January following (n). During his confinement the poor old Biſhop was but hardly and unkindly uſed, and ſcarce allowed neceſſaries; as appears by Dr R. Lee's Letter, and the Biſhop's own complaints, to Secretary Cromwell (o) [P]. He continued above a year priſoner in the Tower, and might have continued there till releaſed by a natural death, which could not be far off conſidering his advanced age: But an unſeaſonable honour paid him by Pope Paul III (p), haſtened his deſtruction; that was, the creating of him, on the 21ſt of May 1535, Cardinal, by the title of Cardinal Prieſt of St Vitalis. When the King heard of it, he gave ſtrict orders that none ſhould be permitted to bring the Hat into his dominions; and therefore it came no nearer than Calais (q). Moreover, he ſent Secretary Cromwell to examine the Biſhop about that affair [Q], and from this time his ruin was abſolutely determined. But as no legal advantage could be taken againſt him, Richard Rich, Eſq; Sollicitor-General, a buſy and officious man, went to him, on the 7th of May (r); and in a fawning and treacherous manner, under pretence of conſulting him (as from the King) about a caſe of conſcience, unwarily drew him into a diſcourſe about the tender point of the Supremacy. Concerning which the Biſhop inconſiderately uttered theſe words: 'As to the buſineſs of 'Supremacy, I muſt needs tell his Majeſty, as I have often told him heretofore, and 'would ſo tell him, if I were to die this preſent hour, that it is utterly unlawful; and 'therefore

'to win the whole world, and to loſe his own ſoul.' ——To the Lords of the Privy-Council he anſwered thus, 'My Lords, you preſent before me a two-edged 'ſword; for, if I ſhould anſwer you with a diſac-'knowledgment of the King's Supremacy, that would 'be my death; and if I ſhould acknowledge the ſame 'perhaps contrary to my own conſcience, that would 'be aſſuredly unto me worſe than death. Wherefore 'I make it my humble requeſt unto you, that you 'would bear with my ſilence, for I ſhall not make 'any direct anſwer to it at all (20).'

[P] As appears by Dr R. Lee's letter, and the Biſhop's own complaints, to Secretary Cromwell.] Dr Lee repreſented to Secretary Cromwell, that the Biſhop's 'body could not bear the cloaths on his back; 'that he was nigh going, and that he could not con-'tinue unleſs the King were merciful to him.'——And how great and juſt were the poor Biſhop's complaints, appears from the following extract of a letter of his to the ſame Mr Secretary Cromwell.

'Furthermore, I beſeech you be good maſter unto 'me in my neceſſity. For I have neither ſhirt nor 'ſute, nor yet other cloaths, that are neceſſary for 'me to wear, but that be ragged and rent too ſhame-'fully: notwithſtanding, I might eaſily ſuffer that, if 'that would keep my body warm. But my diet alſo, 'God knoweth how ſlender it is at many times. And 'now, in my age, my ſtomach may no away but with 'a few kind of meats: which if I want, I decay forth-'with, and fall into craſes and diſeaſes of my body, 'and cannot keep myſelf in health. And, as our 'Lord knoweth, I have nothing left unto me, for to 'provide any better, but as my brother of his own 'purſe layeth out for me, to his great hindrance. 'Wherefore, good Maſter Secretary, eftſones, I be-'ſeech you, to have ſome pity upon me, and let me 'have ſuch things as are neceſſary for me, in mine 'age, and eſpecially for my health. And alſo that 'it may pleaſe you, by your high wiſdom, to move the 'King's Highneſs to take me unto his gracious favour 'again, and to reſtore me to my liberty, out of this 'cold and painful impriſonment. Whereby ye ſhall 'bind me to be your poor bedeſman for ever unto Al-'mighty God: who ever have you in his protection 'and cuſtody. Other twain things, I muſt deſire up-'on you. The toon is, it may pleaſe you, that I 'may take ſome prieſt with me in the Tower, by the 'aſſignment of Maſter Lieutenant, to hear my confeſ-'ſion againſt this holy time. That other is, that I 'may borrow ſome books, to ſay my devotion more 'effectually theſe holy days, for the comfort of my 'ſoul. This I beſeech you to grant me of your cha-'rity. And this our Lord God ſend you a merry 'Chriſtmas, and a comfortable, to your heart's de-'ſire. At the Tower, the 22d day of December, 'your poor bedeſman, [Q] Moreover he ſent Secretary Cromwell to examine the Biſhop about that affair.] After ſome conference between them, Cromwell aſked him, 'My 'Lord of Rocheſter, what would you ſay, if the Pope 'ſhould ſend you a Cardinal's hat, would you accept 'of it?' The Biſhop replied, 'Sir, I know my ſelf 'to be ſo far unworthy of any ſuch dignity, that I 'think of nothing leſs; but if any ſuch thing ſhould 'happen, aſſure yourſelf I ſhould improve that favour 'to the beſt advantage that I could, in aſſiſting the 'holy Catholick Church of Chriſt, and in that reſpect 'I would receive it upon my knees.' When this anſwer was brought to the King by Secretary Cromwell, Henry ſaid in a great paſſion, 'Yea, is he yet ſo luſty? 'well, let the Pope ſend him a hat when he will, 'Mother of God, he ſhall wear it on his ſhoulders 'then, for I will leave him never a head to ſet it on '(23).' The Biſhop's anſwer hath been differently repreſented by our hiſtorians, as if it had been, 'That 'if the Cardinal's hat was laid at his feet, he would 'not ſtoop to take it up.' But that was Sir Thomas More's anſwer to his daughter Mrs Roper, when ſhe acquainted him that the Biſhop was created a Cardinal (24).

'therefore I would not wiſh his Majeſty to take any ſuch power or title upon him, as he 'loves his own ſoul, and the good of his poſterity (s).' The Biſhop being thus caught in the ſnare purpoſely laid for him; a ſpecial commiſſion was drawn up for trying him, dated June 1, 1535 [R], and the indictment againſt him for high-treaſon was found the 11th of the ſame month, it being (as the record expreſſes it) for having ſaid, 'The King 'owre Soveraigne Lord is not Supreme Hed yn Erthe of the Cherche of England (t).' He was then ſo ill that he could not be brought to his tryal, but in the mean time all his books and other effects whatſoever were ſeized. On the 17th being a little recovered, he was brought to the King's-Bench-bar; partly on horſeback, and partly by water, becauſe his weakneſs did not permit him either to walk, or to go wholly on horſeback. Upon a ſhort tryal he was found by his jury guilty of high-treaſon [S]; chiefly, if not ſolely, for the words abovementioned, ſpoken by him in confidence to Mr Sollicitor Rich: and condemned to ſuffer death as in caſes of treaſon (u), notwithſtanding all that he could alledge in his own defence [T]. On the 22d of June he received the news of his execution on that day, from the Lieutenant of the Tower, at five o'clock in the morning, with great calmneſs; and ſlept ſoundly two hours after it. When he was getting up, he cauſed himſelf to be dreſſed in a finer and more cleanly manner than uſual [U]. Being come down ſtairs, he was carried in a chair, upon account of his great weakneſs, to the place of execution, upon Tower-hill; where, inſtead of ſuffering the uſual death of traitors, he was beheaded, about ten o'clock in the morning. Such was the tragical end of John Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter (w), after he had arrived to the age of 76 years 9 months, and ſome days over. His body was buried in the church-yard of All-hallows-Barking, removed afterwards within the chapel in the Tower; and his head ſet up the next day over London-bridge (x). He was a very tall man, as being ſix foot high; and, with that, comely, upright, and well-formed; and ſtrong and robuſt. But, in the decline of life, he grew extreamly emaciated. His complexion was brown, his forehead broad, and his features duly proportioned (y). Eraſmus repreſents him as a man of the greateſt integrity, of deep learning, incredible ſweetneſs of temper, and grandeur of ſoul [W]. Both friends and enemies acknowledge, that he was a pious man, ſober, temperate, and charitable; and not only learned himſelf, but alſo a great lover and encourager

[S] He was found by his jury guilty of high-treaſon.] Mr Jeremy Collier rightly thinks (26), that he was proceeded againſt only upon Statute 26 Henr. viii. c. 13. [and that too ſtrained.] This Statute made it high-treaſon, maliciouſly to wiſh or deſire by words or writing, or to imagine, invent, or attempt any bodily harm to be done to the King, the Queen, or their heirs apparent; or to deprive any of them of the Dignity, Style, or name of their royal eſtates.—At the time of his tryal, the Biſhop made the following obſervation with regard to that ſtatute;——'I pray 'you, my Lords, conſider, that by all equity, juſtice, 'worldly honeſty, and courteous dealing, I cannot '(as the caſe ſtandeth,) be directly charged—with 'treaſon, though I had ſpoken the words indeed, the 'ſame being not ſpoken maliciouſly, but in the way of 'advice and counſel, when it was requeſted of me by 'the King himſelf; and that favour the very words of 'the ſtatute do give me, being made only againſt ſuch 'as ſhall maliciouſly gainſay the King's Supremacy, 'and none other: wherefore, although by rigour of 'law, you may take occaſion thus to condemn me, 'yet I hope you cannot find law, except you add ri-'gour to that law to caſt me down, which herein I 'hope I have not deſerved (27).

[T] Notwithſtanding all that he could alledge in his own defence] He objected moſtly againſt the Sollicitor-general's evidence, and thought it exceedingly hard and cruel. And therefore he addreſſed himſelf to him in this manner; 'Mr Rich I cannot but mer-'vail to hear you come in and bear witneſs againſt me 'of theſe words, knowing in what ſecret manner you 'came to me.'——Then addreſſing himſelf to his Judges, he related to them all the particulars of Rich's coming; and thus went on.—— 'He told me, 'that the King, for better ſatisfaction of his own con-'ſcience had ſent unto me in this ſecret manner to 'know my full opinion in the matter [of the Supre-'macy] for the great affiance he had in me more than 'any other:——and he told me, that the King 'willed him to aſſure me on his honour, and in the 'word of a King, that whatever I ſhould ſay unto him 'by this his ſecret meſſenger, I ſhould abide no dan-'ger nor peril for it, neither that any advantage ſhould 'be taken againſt me for the ſame.——Now 'therefore, my Lords, concludes he, ſeeing it pleaſed 'the King's Majeſty to ſend to me thus ſecretly under 'the pretence of plain and true meaning, to know my 'poor advice and opinion in theſe his weighty and 'great affairs, which I moſt gladly was, and ever will 'be, willing to ſend him; methinks, it is very hard 'injuſtice to hear the meſſenger's accuſation, and to 'allow the ſame as a ſufficient teſtimony againſt me in 'caſe of treaſon (28).'

And alſo obſerve theſe words of the ſame celebrated author. Aut egregiè fallor, aut is vir eſt unus cum quo nemo ſit hac tempeſtate conferendus, vel integritate vitæ, vel eruditione, vel animi magnitudine (30). Dr S. Knight rightly obſerves, that he was, 'in all reſpects, the greateſt 'favorer of learning and learned men' in his time: and that 'no age ever afforded a perſon whoſe heart 'was more ſet upon the promotion of good literature 'in himſelf, and others.' Eraſmus, of immortal memory, whom he greatly admired, encouraged, and ſupported, is a pregnant inſtance of his ſingular affection for learned men. And his learning Greek, (*) when he was advanced in years, is a ſufficient proof of his reliſh and love for all polite literature. To which add, his endeavours to reſtore learning in the Univerſity of Cambridge to a right uſe, and to baniſh thence every thing that had too long uſurped that name (31).

FITZHERBERT (Sir ANTHONY) a very learned Lawyer, as his moſt excellent writings teſtify, and one of the Judges of the Court of Common-Pleas in the reign of King Henry VIII. He was deſcended from the moſt ancient and noble family of Herbert, honoured with the titles of Huntingdon and Pembroke, notwithſtanding what is ſaid to the contrary by the judicious and learned Mr Camden (a), whoſe authority, however, in this, as well as in ſome other points of a like nature, has borne down that of all others (b), and, which is ſtill worſe, even truth itſelf, as will manifeſtly appear in that examination, which, for this reaſon (and ſure a better could not be aſſigned) will be afforded to this point in the notes [A]. He was the younger ſon of Ralph Fitzherbert, of [A] To this point in the notes] The matter of this note will give the reader full ſatisfaction, as to the means by which ſo many errors creep into all kinds of hiſtory, and more eſpecially into that of eminent perſonages, and their deſcents. It muſt be allowed, that, in things of this nature, the greateſt men may miſtake, and that ſuch miſtakes might be, and indeed ought to be excuſed; but for this very reaſon perſiſting in ſuch miſtakes is altogether inexcuſable; and for a man to preſume his own authority and credit to be of more conſequence than truth, is offering a great indignity to the publick; and yet it has ſometimes happened, that this indignity has been not only borne with, but ſuch as have endeavoured to ſet right miſtakes of this nature, have drawn upon themſelves only ſcorn and reproach. In the preſent caſe we will firſt ſtate the account given us by Camden, in all the editions of his book, except the laſt; then, the remark of Raſe Brooke upon that account; next Mr Camden's reply; after that, the ſubſtance of Brooke's rejoinder; and laſt of all, the paragraph as it ſtands in Camden's beſt and moſt correct edition; with a few obſervations as to the neceſſity and uſe of ſuch diſcuſſions.

CAMDEN (1).

Herbert married the ſiſter of William Earl of Hereford, and in her right, was Lord of Deane, from whom is deſcended the noble family of the Herberts: from hence alſo, if we ſhall credit the Heralds and Ejeutcheons of arms, Anthony Fitz Herbert, that great Lawyer, and Lord Chief Juſtice of England, took his original. But I think he rather deſcended from the worſhipful family of the Fitz Herberts in Derbyſhire.

'Your often and ſuſpicious objections, calling in 'queſtion the credit of her Majeſty's Heralds, as tho' 'you judged them ſcarce worthy to be believed, doth 'proceed, as I ſuppoſe, from a malignant humour in 'you, rather then of any good ground, or ſufficient 'reaſon, that might move you thereunto. But I truſt 'that thoſe of diſcretion will ſooner give credit unto 'them, in matter they ſhall aver by good warrantiſe 'and authority, than to you, who ground your contradicting arguments upon hearſays and opiniative 'imaginations. And where you charge the Heralds 'to have made Anthony Fitz Herbert, that was Lord 'Chief Juſtice of England, to be deſcended from that 'family of Herberts, which married the ſiſter of William Earl of Hereford: I ſay, that therein they have 'done like honeſt and learned officers of arms; and 'thoſe that have, or ſhall, derive the ſaid Anthony, 'or any of that family of Fitz Herberts, from any 'other original than that aforeſaid, they have and 'ſhall err from the truth.'

CAMDEN's Reply (3).

(3) Ad Lectorem, p. 12.

That I did but ſo much as believe, that Anthony Fitz Herbert, Lord Chief Juſtice, did deſcend of the Lineage of the Fitz Herberts in the County of Derby. He revileth me as tho' he were Lord of my belief.

He

of Norbury in the county of Derby, Esq; and on this account in all probability it was, that,

He denieth it, and that with many words. He deriveth him from Peter, son of Herbert of Deane, of his own bare words, ipse dixit, he said it, but proof he bringeth none. Let him look upon the visitation, and he shall see that he was of the Lynage of the Fitzherberts of Norbury in the County of Derby. Let him also give ear to one, that having diligently searched all the deeds with their seals fixed of that family, because he would find out the truth, affirmeth, that they never, in former ages, did bare the arms of that Fitzherbert of Deane, but others, which they took from the Earls Ferrar's, of whom in the time of King Henry the Second, they held their lands, and that before and after they flourished under the surname of Fitzherbert. Neither let this fellow, which hath so plodded in the pedigree of the Herberts, which descended from Peter son of Herbert, forget, how that they never took Fitzherbert for their surname, but, after the old and Welch fashion, did alter always their surname by the christian name of their father; for the son of Reginald, Peter Fitz Reginald, and until it came to William ap Thomas, whose son, the Earl of Pembroke, did assume the christian name of Herbert for his surname, and left it to his posterity. And so likewise did others out of that family, whom it shall be needless particularly to reckon up. But wherefore do I stay upon these points? I will in one word end all this matter. He derives this family from Peter Fitzherbert of Deane, but that Peter lived under King John and was of his Councel, as witnesseth Roger of Wyndouer, 1211. But William Fitzherbert had Norbury in the year 1125, fourscore years before, as appeareth by the book of Tuttesbury-Abby, where these words are to be read. In the year of the Incarnation 1125, William Prior and the Convent of the Church of St Maries of Tutesbury, did give to William Fitzherbert, Norbury, to him and his heirs, &c. and for this did William give one measure of wheat.

BROOKS Rejoinder (4).

'Gentle reader, in my discovery I reproved this 'learned man for discrediting of her Majesty's officers 'of arms in these words; if we shall credit the Heralds, Anthony Fitzherbert, the great Lawyer, and 'Lord Chief Justice of England, did descend from 'Herbert Lord of Deane, &c. as tho' their labours 'and travels were not to be believed or regarded so 'soon as his own thoughts, and thus most subtily he 'goeth about to impeach their credits, whose books 'he was not then worthy to carry, in regard of their 'knowledge and profession. I think this man was 'much distempered in minde, when he suffered these 'obstinate and unadvised speeches to pass from him, 'or else was misinformed by his negligent tutors, 'otherwise to seek revenge upon his adversary. He 'would not have play'd Sampson's part rashly, to 'have crushed the pillars whereby he leaned, and 'have shaken the whole house upon himself. I appeal to the judgment of the indifferent reader, and 'his own writings, what this man will not say and 'write, when as in this place most untruly he dareth 'to charge me to derive Sir Anthony Fitzherbert to 'descend from one Peter Fitzherbert of Deane, when 'as I neither writ, or ever thought, of any such matter, my words being only as before, that who so 'ever did derive the said Sir Anthony to descend 'from any other family then of that which married 'with the sister of William Earl of Hereford, should 'err. And where he voucheth the visitation of Derbyshire to prove this Sir Anthony Fitzherbert to 'descend of Fitzherberts of Norbury, I marvel greatly 'at his weakness therein, considering that the same 'proveth no further then to Nicholas Fitzherbert in 'King Henry the Sixth's time, who was grandfather 'to the said Sir Anthony beforementioned; but it 'sheweth his ignorance, and that he dareth to alledge 'any thing to serve his turn, rather then he will be 'unfurnished of matter, altho' very impertinent to 'that in question.'

'What will not this man say or put in print upon 'his own imagination or report of others, there being 'not any that will or can averr and prove, that they 'have searched and seen all the Fitzherberts deeds 'and charters, therefore have I no cause or reason to 'lend my ear, and much less to believe one which 'hath no name, neither that hath reported a truth. 'And for proof thereof I have at this instant in my 'custody, divers original deeds and charters of the 'said Fitzherberts being of the younger house, sealed 'with the foresay'd coat of the three lyons, about 'King Edward the First's time, which will prove 'that the Fitzherberts of Norbury did use and bare 'the said arms, as did they of Deane, which is also 'acknowledged to be true even by the said Sir Anthony's own tombe at Norbury, where he lieth buried with the very same arms as Fitzherbert of Deane 'did use in King Henry the Third's time (which he 'that searched all their deeds missed to see) and if 'this good man, and his diligent searcher, be desirous of further proof hereof, let them go and view 'the church and cross in Castleton in Derbyshire, but 'with better eyes than this man did the Castle of Norwich, for the Earl Bygots arms, and they shall find 'there very antient, both wrought in glass, and carved 'in stone, the said arms of three lyons rampant, and 'the other coat he saith was taken from the Earls 'Ferrars arms quartered with the same.

'This which he hath cited here out of the book 'of Tutesbury-Abbey is not faithfully done, according to his former promise at the first, which I hold 'to be in him a great fault, to make a common occupation of falsifying of his authors which I find 'set down thus. In the year from the Incarnation '1125, William Prior, and the Convent of St Mary 'of Tutesbury, have given to William Fitzherbert, 'Norbury, in fee to him and to his heirs, in consideration of one hundred shillings to be paid annually, fifty 'shillings at the feast of the Annunciation of St Mary, 'and the other fifty on the festival of St Michael, for 'his homage, &c.

'This learned man's fellow hath indeed diligently, 'and with his best endeavours, collected and set forth '(with good authorities) for the late Right Honourable Henry Earl of Pembroke, the honourable and 'antient descent of Fitzherbert Lord of Deane, &c. 'which he is and will be ever ready to averr and 'prove true, therefore let us see how cunningly this 'learned man will carry himself, which saith he will 'end all this matter in one word, when I doubt he 'will not be able to make good his promise in a thousand. First he affirmeth, that the family of Fitz'herbert of Deane, did never assume Herbert for 'their surname before William ap Thomas his son, in 'King Edward the Fourth's time, did assume the 'same, which I hold to be as untrue as his denial of 'Brute, our antient and great Monarch of Britain, 'which for the truth sake, and his own credit, I wish 'he had omitted in his four former editions, as he 'hath now done in his fifth and last edition; as also 'his untrue interpreting of sirnames, upon his own 'bare imagination, wherein he hath done great wrong, 'and misled divers antient families from their right 'surnames and parents. Because he findeth one Peter, 'to be the son of Herbert in King John's time, and 'that he was called Peter Fitzherbert, therefore, upon 'his bare word, ipse dixit, he hath spoken it, we 'must believe it, and that the name of Fitzherbert 'was but a christen name, and not a surname, before 'King Edward the Fourth's time, altho' he hath produced no proof at all for the same; which to disprove, and make plain that it was a surname long 'before, as also to warn him hereafter of the like vain 'imaginations conceived and bred in his own brain, 'I will endeavour to prove unto you, that this name 'of Herbert was a surname, and a noble family, above 'five hundred years past; all surnames being at the 'first taken either of their parents christian names, their 'dwelling places, occupations, nicknames, or such 'like; and that both Fitzherbert of Deane, and Fitz'herbert of Norbury, were lineally descended of one 'paternal ancestor, altho' here very cunningly he 'would carry away and abuse the reader, with saying, 'that I derive the family of Fitzherbert from one Peter, son of Herbert in King John's time, when as I 'did never so much as once dream or think of any 'such matter. For I do, and ever did, derive them 'to descend and come of Henry Fitzherbert, Chamthat, from a child, he was deſtined to a learned profeſſion (c). After he had received the firſt tincture of letters in the country, he was ſent to the univerſity of Oxford, but in what college he ſtudied there does not appear (d). He went from thence to one of the Inns of Court, but to which of theſe is alſo a point, that, at this diſtance of time, cannot be determined (e). His great parts, penetrating judgment, and incomparable diligence, ſoon diſtinguiſhed him in his profeſſion, and, in proceſs of time, he became ſo eminent, that November 18, 1511, being the third year of the reign of King Henry VIII, he was called to the ſtate and degree of a Serjeant at Law (f); and, in 1516, he received the honour of knighthood (g). As he roſe more into publick view, his prudence and probity became more and more conſpicuous, ſo that November 24, 1517, and in the ninth year of the ſame King's reign, he was appointed one of his Majeſty's Serjeants at Law (h). It was two years after this, and not before it as many of our writers ſay, that he publiſhed his great work in relation to the Law, which was then ſo well received, and has been ever ſince both reverenced and admired, as well for the utility of the matter, as the elegancy of it's form (i) [B]. It was not long after this that he publiſhed ſeveral other learned pieces, which

'lain to King Henry the Firſt, ſon of William the 'Conqueror; and to prove the ſame I will firſt uſe 'the teſtimony of that worthy Herald, which our Pe'dant himſelf ſo much commendeth, Robert Glover, 'Somerſet-Herald, who, in his Collectanea, hath this: 'Henry Fitzherbert, Chamberlane to King Henry the 'Firſt, married the daughter of Robert Corbet of Alen'ceſter, and had iſſue Herbert Fitzherbert, the King's 'Chamberlain, father of Herbert Lord of Deane, in 'right of his wife Luce, ſiſter of William Earl of 'Hereford.

'This might perſuade this learned man to know 'and confeſs, that the firſt Herbert aſſumed not his 'furname of Henry his father, after the Welſh faſhion 'in King Edward the Fourth's time, for then ſhould 'he have been called Herbert Fitz-Henry. But this 'I doubt will not yet ſatisfy this learned man, unleſs 'I prove it by ſome other authentical record, where'fore I wiſh him to read this in the red book in the 'Exchequer, which he will not deny but to be very 'antient and authentical.' "Tempore Henrici Secundi, "Herbertus filius Herberti Camerarii ſenioris, tenuit "feoda duorum militum in Comit' Southt' de Epo' Win"ton, & modo tenet Herbertus filius ejus." 'This 'doth prove directly, that the firſt Herbert, ſon of 'Henry, had his ſurname of Herbert, and not of 'Henry his father, which may give this man cauſe to 'be ſorry and repent him of his folly, and wrong he 'would and hath done unto this noble family of Fitz'herbert, had he not been encountered in the ſame, 'yet will he object againſt me, and ſay, that altho' 'I have proved the family of Fitzherbert to have a 'ſurname in King Henry the Firſt's time, yet have I 'not proved Fitzherbert of Deane, and Fitzherbert 'of Norbury to be one family, and therein he think'eth ſurely to give me the jerk, if I fail to perform 'the ſame. Wherefore, to make good what before 'I have promiſed, and to ſtop his mouth, as alſo his 'diligent ſearchers and famous antiquaries whom he 'ſo much boaſteth of, who have very much wronged 'me, let both he and them ſatisfy themſelves with 'this, which Roger Hovedon, his own author, hath 'ſet down, who affirmeth that the firſt Herbert, fa'ther to the ſecond Herbert, Lord of Deane, and 'William Fitzherbert, which had Norbury given him 'in King Henry the Firſt's time, were both brothers, 'and that Reginald Earl of Cornwall, natural ſon of 'King Henry the Firſt, was begotten of their mother. 'The words are theſe. Anno 1177. King Henry the 'Second gave to Herbert Fitzherbert and William, the 'brethren of Reginald Earl of Cornwall, and Joſſa'lane de la Pomeray, their Nephew, the kingdom of 'Limerick, for the ſervice of ſixty Knights fees, to 'hold of him and John his ſon, &c.

'Thus hath Roger Hovedon, his own author, proved 'for me, that Reginald Earl of Cornwall, Herbert 'Fitzherbert, and William Fitzherbert of Norbury, 'were three brothers. And yet for a further proof, 'I will uſe here one more of this man's own teſtimo'nies, avouched in his Apologie ad Lectorem, which 'is, as he ſaith, an antient deed of the aforeſaid Re'ginald Earl of Cornwall, wherein he calleth the ſe'cond Herbert Lord of Deane his Nephew, and Wil'liam Fitzherbert of Norbury his brother, and this I 'hope he will allow of, becauſe he hath avouched it 'himſelf. But to a worſe purpoſe than I have here 'applied it unto. Reginaldus Henrici Regis filius om'nibus &c. ſciatis me dediſſe Gulielmo de Boterell fi'lio Alice Corbet materteræ meæ, totam terram quam 'dederam Gulielmo de Boterell in Comitatu Cornubiæ, 'patri ſcz. prædicti Willielmi vz. 'Now that you have had manifeſted unto you, 'gentle reader, by good proofs and records, that 'theſe two great and honourable families of Fitzher'bert of Deane and Norbury, had a ſurname in King 'Henry the Firſt's time, as alſo that they were de'ſcended of one original anceſtor, and did uſe all one 'coat of arms, which this Pedant, and his unnamed 'friend, hath laboured to obſcure. Give me leave 'here, I pray you, with your patience, to demand of 'him, by what commiſſion or authority he hath made 'this Anthony Fitzherbert to be Lord Chief Juſtice 'of England, which if he refuſe or fail to ſatisfie me 'of, let him not blame me if I tell him that he hath 'forged that title and office out of his own brain, as 'he hath done many others of the ſame kind. The 'ſaid Anthony himſelf never aſſuming any other title 'or office, than only Knight, and one of the King's 'Juſtices of his Common Bench.'

CAMDEN's Paragraph in his laſt Edition (5).

(5) Britannia, 1606, fol. p. 313.

'Whence, as ſome will have it, deſcended Anthony 'Fitzherbert, a moſt excellent Lawyer, as appeared 'both in that Court in which he ſat, and from his moſt 'elaborate writings which he publiſhed; but that he 'was of the Knightly family of the* Fitzherberts in 'Derbyſhire has been the belief of others.'

It appears plainly from hence, that Mr Camden was himſelf convinced that he could not ſupport his charge againſt the Heralds and Herald Painters, and therefore he withdrew it, but, that he might confeſs as little as poſſible, he ſtill inſerts both the opinions, as if they were oppoſite and inconſiſtent; whereas Brooke has manifeſtly proved, that they were very reconcileable, perfectly correſponding one with the other, and both of them true; our Judge being deſcended from the Fitzherberts of Norbury, and the Fitzherberts of Norbury from the ſame ſtock with the noble family of Herbert.

[B] As the elegancy of its form.] We have aſſigned the time when our author's grand Abridgement was publiſhed, from unqueſtionable authority. That original edition, magnificently printed upon royal paper, which is very fine, and in a character reſembling antient writing, is become very ſcarce and very dear. There have been ſeveral editions of it ſince, particularly one in 1665, in large folio, and another in 1577, in a ſhort folio, but upon a fine paper, and with a broad margin. I ſhall give the title from thence at large:

which gained him ſuch reputation, that, in Eaſter term 1523, and the fifteenth year of the reign of Henry VIII, he was made one of the Juſtices of the Court of Common Pleas (k), in which honourable ſtation he ſpent the remaining part of his life, diſcharging the duties of his office with ſuch ſufficiency, that he was held the oracle of the Law in his time, and with ſuch integrity as gained him univerſal reſpect (l). Two things are mentioned in reference to his conduct; one, that (without fear of his power) he openly oppoſed Cardinal Wolſey in the heighth of his favour (m); the other, that, when he came to lie upon his death-bed, foreſeeing the changes that were like to happen in the Church as well as State, he preſſed his children in very ſtrong terms to promiſe him ſolemnly, neither to accept grants, nor to make purchaſes of abbey-lands (n), which it is ſaid they did, and adhered conſtantly to that promiſe though much to their own loſs. We may add to this a third point, viz. that he continued his labours in the cloſet for the benefit of ſucceeding times, as well as upon the Bench for the advantage of his contemporaries, and provided thereby that poſterity ſhould be the better for his valuable writings (o) [C]. liuer en le fyne de lour apte titles. That is, The Grand Abridgement collected by that moſt reverend Judge, Mr Anthony Fitzherbert, lately conferred with his own manuſcript corrected by himſelf, together with the folio's referring the caſes to the books, by which they may be eaſily found; an improvement never before made. Alſo in this edition, the additions or ſupplements are placed at the end of their reſpective titles. The Colophon runs thus: Imprinted at London, in Fleet-Street, within Temple-Bar, at the ſign of the hand and ſtar, by Richard Tottel, the 20th day of Auguſt, Anno 1577, Cum privilegio. To this edition there is added a moſt uſeful and accurate table, by the care of William Raſtall, Serjeant at Law, and alſo one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas in the reign of Queen Mary; which table is very highly commended by the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke.

As to the original of theſe abridgements of caſes, we are told that the firſt was publiſhed in the reign of King Henry the Sixth by Stathom (6), a learned Lawyer of that time and Baron of the Exchequer, concerning whom there is a very ſingular paragraph to be met with, in the works of the facetious Doctor Fuller (7), which will give ſome light into the reaſon of our author's compoſing his abridgement. 'Much eſteemed, 'ſays he, at this day, (ſpeaking of Stathom) for the 'antiquity thereof. For otherwiſe Lawyers behold 'him, as ſoldiers do bows and arrows ſince the in'vention of guns, rather for ſight than ſervice. Yea 'a grandee in that profeſſion hath informed me, that 'little of Stathom, if any at all, is Law at this day; 'ſo much is the practice thereof altered, whereof the 'learned in that faculty will give a ſatisfactory ac'count, tho' otherwiſe it may ſeem ſtrange, that 'reaſon continuing always the ſame, Law grounded 'thereon ſhould be capable of ſo great alteration.'

Sir Edward Coke mentions our author, and this work of his, in many places, and always with much reſpect; tho' at the bottom he is far enough from being fond of Abridgements, yet he has left us a paſſage, in which he ſhews us not only his approbation of this, but even of that which Fuller would have us believe was worn altogether out of date, and is exceedingly puzzled to know, why the reaſon of things ſhould not outlaſt the things themſelves, and why the Law ſhould not remain always the ſame, tho' made to regulate the moſt changeable of all ſubjects, the manners, opinions, and circumſtances of men. But to the paſſage in Lord Coke (8), 'Perkins, Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, 'and Stamford, of which the Regiſter, Littleton, Fitz'herbert, and Stamford, are moſt neceſſary, and of 'greateſt authority and excellency, and yet the other 'alſo are not without their fruit. In reading of the 'caſes in the books at large, which ſometimes are ob'ſcure and miſprinted, if the reader, after the dili'gent reading of the caſe, ſhall obſerve how the caſe 'is abridged in thoſe two great Abridgements of Juſ'tice, Fitzherbert and Sir Robert Brooke, it will both 'illuſtrate the caſe and delight the reader, and yet 'neither that of Stathom, nor that of the book of 'aſſizes, is to be rejected: and for pleading, the great 'book of entries is of ſingular uſe and utility.' Theſe reaſons are certainly clear and convincing, to which we may add, that there is ſomething ſingularly accurate in our author's method, ariſing probably from his writing this book with a deſign to publiſh it, whereas Sir Robert Brooke's Abridgement, like Sir James Dyer's Reports, was compoſed for his own uſe, and therefore in reading them this circumſtance ſhould be always remembered.

Magna Charta cum diverſis aliis ſtatutis. Lond. 1519, in 12mo. i. e. Magna Charta, and ſeveral other ſtatutes.

[C] For his valuable writings.] In this note we will endeavour to give a diſtinct account of the reſt of our author's writings, and of ſuch as have been attributed to him, and of which it is doubtful whether they are his or not.

II. L'Office & auctoryte des juſtyces de peas, compyle & extrayte hors des anciens livres, ſi bien del commen ley, come des ſtatutes. That is, The office and authority of Juſtices of Peace, compiled and extracted out of the old books, as well of the Common Law, as of the Statutes. Lond. 1538, 12mo. part in French, part in Engliſh, without the author's name, and ſeveral times afterwards.

It was held a very uſeful book for that time, being the firſt upon the ſubject that was ever publiſhed; it was afterwards augmented by Richard Crompton, Eſq; and printed in Quarto at leaſt ſeven times during his life, and before Serjeant Crompton publiſhed it with additions, it had been tranſlated and printed ſeveral times in Engliſh.

III. L'Office de Viconts, Bailiffes, Eſcheators, Conſtables, Coroners, &c. That is, The Office of Sheriffs, Bailiffs of Libertys, Eſcheators, Conſtables, Coroners, &c. Lond. 1538. 4to.

This has been alſo annexed by Serjeant Crompton, to his Office and Authority of Juſtices of the Peace, and has been frequently printed with it.

IV. Of the Diverſity of Courts.

This was written by him, as the reader will ſee hereafter, in the twenty firſt of Henry the Eighth, but without the author's name; it was originally written in French, but was tranſlated into Engliſh by W. H. of Grey's-Inn, and added by him to Andrew Horne's Mirrour of Juſtices.

V. Natura Brevium novel, that is, The new Natura Brevium. Lond. 1534. afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh, and often publiſhed with very accurate tables, having been always in very high eſteem; the nature and deſign of this work, as alſo the reaſon of its being ſtiled the new Natura Brevium, will fully appear from our author's ſhort and excellent proem.

'In every art and ſcience there are certain rules 'and foundations, to which a man ought to give cre'dit, and which he cannot deny. In like manner, 'there are divers maxims and fundamentals in the 'knowledge of the Common Laws of the land, which 'a man ought to believe very neceſſary for thoſe who 'will underſtand the ſame, eſpecially at the beginning 'of their ſtudies: for, upon thoſe fundamentals, the 'whole Law doth depend. For which purpoſe, in 'time paſt, there was compoſed a very profitable book, 'called The Regiſter, which doth contain fundry prin'ciples, by which he muſt be well inſtructed who 'would ſtudy the Law. And alſo for that purpoſe was 'there compoſed by a learned man, a book called Na'tura Brevium, which book doth declare and ſet 'forth the diverſities and natures of many original writs, 'with their proceſs, which book helped much to the 'underſtanding not only of The Regiſter, but alſo of 'the Law of the land; but becauſe of late time that 'book hath been tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue, length, full of years, in high eſteem with his Sovereign, and univerſally reverenced by his fellow-ſubjects, he yielded his laſt debt to nature the 27th of May, 1538, deſervedly lamented and admired (p). His body was interred in his own pariſh-church of Norbury (q), upon which there was ſome time afterwards laid a blue marble ſtone, with a very plain and modeſt inſcription, which, becauſe it is not eaſily to be met with, the reader will find inſerted in the notes [D]. This venerable Sage in the Law, Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, left behind him a very numerous poſterity; and as he became, by the death of his elder brother, John Fitzherbert of Norbury, Eſq; poſſeſſor of the land eſtate of his family, he was in a condition to provide, in a very plentiful manner, for his younger children (r); ſo that long after his deceaſe we find ſeveral very conſiderable families, not only in the county of Derby, but alſo in ſome other adjacent counties, that very juſtly valued themſelves upon having this learned and upright Judge for their common anceſtor (s) [E]. We ſhall, in a ſubſequent article, ſee, that ſome of his deſcendants (who underſtood his laſt words in ſo rigorous a ſenſe, as to believe they prohibited them from leaving the Church of Rome (t), as well as from acquiring church lands) ſuffered very ſeverely for their obſtinacy in that particular, but were notwithſtanding ſo far happy, as that while they remained exiles in foreign parts, by the modeſty of their behaviour, quickneſs of their parts, and great probity of their lives, they maintained the reputation of their family, and were not in the ſlighteſt degree a diſcredit to their country, abating their adherence to Popiſh tenets.

'and many things are therein, which are not according 'to the Law of the land, and many other things are 'omitted which are very profitable and neceſſary for 'the underſtanding of the Law, for that cauſe is this 'work compoſed and publiſhed. Wherein, if there 'be any thing againſt the opinion of the ſages who 'have the adminiſtration of the Laws, the requeſt of 'him who hath taken the pains to make this treatiſe, 'is, that they would correct and amend the ſame, as 'they ſhall ſee good according to the Law.'

Theſe obſervations of our venerable author are highly commended, and ſtrongly ſupported, by that judicious writer, and exquiſite Lawyer, Sir Edward Coke (9), 'For an example of an original writ, ſays he, among 'many others, I refer the ſtudious reader eſpecially to 'Caly's caſe, in Eaſter term in the twenty ſixth of the 'reign of the late Queen Elizabeth, of ever bleſſed 'memory, now publiſhed, whereby it more clearly 'appeareth how judicious the opinion of Juſtice Fitz-'herbert is, in his preface to his Natura Brevium, 'where he ſaith, that original writs are the founda-'tions whereupon the Law dependeth, and how truly 'he calleth them the principles of the Law, and for-'tifieth alſo the opinion of Bracton, where he ſaith, 'that Breve, formatum eſt, ad ſimilitudinem regulæ juris, which caſe I have reported in that form, to this 'end, that ſtudents, ſeeing the ſingular uſe of origi-'nal writs, will, in the beginning of their ſtudy, learn 'them, or at leaſt the principalleſt of them, without 'book, whereby they ſhall attain unto three things of 'no ſmall moment. 1. To the right underſtanding 'of their books. 2. To the true ſenſe and judgment 'of Law: and laſtly, 3. To the exquiſite form and 'manner of pleading.'

(9) Proem to the 8th part of his Reports.

The ſame intelligent perſon has, in another place, given us a ſhort account of moſt of our author's Law treatiſes, in theſe words (10): 'Fitzherbert's Abridge-'ment was painfully and elaborately collected, and 'publiſhed in the eleventh year of King Henry the 'Eighth, by Fitzherbert, then Serjeant at Law: and 'he wrote alſo another book, called his Natura Bre-'vium, an exact work, exquiſitively penned, and 'publiſhed in the ſix and twentieth year of Henry 'the Eighth, when he was Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, 'Knight, one of the Judges of the Court of Common 'Pleas: about the ſame time he wrote his treatiſe of 'Juſtices of the Peace, wherewith the Judges, as I 'have ſeen it reported, found fault, for that he there-'in affirmed, that Juſtices of Peace, having, by their 'commiſſion, authority to hear and determine felonies, '&c. could not hear and determine murders, &c. 'which, amongſt others, they clearly over-ruled, that 'Juſtices of Peace lawfully might do.'

VI. Of the ſurveying of Lands, 1539. 8vo. Lond. 1567.

VII. The Book of Huſbandry, very profitable and neceſſary for all perſons.——Printed by Tho. Berthlet 1534, 8vo and ſeveral times after in the reign of Queen Mary, and in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth. It is ſaid, in an advertiſement to the reader, that this book was written by one Anthony Fitzherbert, who had been forty years a huſbandman, from whence many have concluded, that this could not be our Judge, but have rather inclined to think it written by his brother John Fitzherbert. Upon examination, however, it will be found, that this latter opinion is leſs ſuſtainable than the former; for ſo it is, that, in the author's preface to his book of meaſuring of lands, he mentions his book of Agriculture, and in the advertiſement prefixed to the ſame book it is expreſsly ſaid, that the author of that treatiſe of meaſuring, was the author likewiſe of the book concerning the office of a Juſtice of Peace, whence it ſhould ſeem, that both thoſe books were written by our author, who perhaps in thoſe ſeaſons when he had leiſure to go down into the country, might apply himſelf as vigorouſly to huſbandry, as to the ſtudy of the Laws when in town; and as his genius naturally led him to method and order, ſo he might be inclined to commit his thoughts upon that uſeful ſubject to writing, tho', it may be very well doubted, whether he ever intended they ſhould be publiſhed.

[D] Inſerted in the notes.] We owe the preſervation of this inſcription to Mr Brooke, York-Herald, who publiſhed it in his diſpute with Mr Camden, as a point deciſive in his favour; for therein he obſerves, that, as to his bearing the antient arms of the family, and his being one of the Judges, not Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, appears from his epitaph, taken from his tomb at Norbury, whereon his arms are engraven, viz. Gules, three Lyons rampant, or, with this inſcription:

Of your Charitie, praye for the Souls of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Knyght, one of the King's Juſtices of his Comon Bench, and ſome tyme Lo. and Patrons of this towne; and Dorathy his wife, daughter of Sir Henry Willoughby, Knyght, &c. Which Sir Anthony deceaſed 27 May 1538.

[E] For their common anceſtor.] We are informed by Mr Phillips, that, in the year 1684, there were the following families ſubſiſting, of the deſcendants of our Judge, viz. Baſil Fitzherbert, deſcended of William Fitzherbert, Eſq; a younger ſon of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert's, who marrying Elizabeth, daughter and coheireſs of Humphry Swinnerton, of Swinnerton in Staffordſhire, brought that eſtate likewiſe into the family, which, together with the old paternal ſeat of Norbury, was then enjoyed by Baſil Fitzherbert (11). William Fitzherbert, of Tiſſington in the county of Derby, was likewiſe deſcended, in a direct line, from Sir Anthony (12). As alſo Francis Fitzherbert, of Somerſall-Herbert in the county of Derby (13). Likewiſe John Fitzherbert, of Luckington in the county of Wilts, Eſquire (14). The reader may learn ſomething more, upon the ſame ſubject in the ſucceeding article (15).

FITZHERBERT (THOMAS) a deep ſufferer for, and a learned defender of, the Popiſh cauſe, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the ſon of William Fitzherbert by Iſabel his wife, daughter and one of the heirs of Humphrey Swinnerton of Swinnerton in Staffordſhire, fourth ſon of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Knt (a), of whom in the former article, and born in the ſaid county of Stafford in 1552, in which county being initiated in grammar learning, he was ſent either to Exeter or Lincoln-college in 1568 (b). But having been moſtly before bred up in the Catholick religion, the college grew uneaſy to him, for though he would ſometimes hear a ſermon, which he was permitted to do by an old Roman Prieſt that then privately lived in Oxon. yet he would ſeldom go to prayers, for which he was often admoniſhed by the Sub-Rector of his Houſe (c). At length, ſeeming to be wearied with Hereſy, he receded without a degree to his patrimony, where alſo refuſing to go to his pariſh-church, he was impriſoned about 1572 (d). But being ſoon after ſet at liberty he became ſtill more zealous in his religion, and not only confirmed many wavering Catholicks, but wrote alſo Several Reaſons for the Catholicks not going to Proteſtant churches, for which being like to ſuffer, he withdrew and lived concealed (e). In 1580, when Campian and Perſons the Jeſuit came into England, he retired to London, found them out, ſhewed himſelf exceedingly attached to, and ſupplied them liberally. Whereupon bringing himſelf into a Præmunire, and foreſeeing great dangers, he went a voluntary exile into France, anno 1582, where he continued a zealous ſollicitor in the cauſe of Mary Queen of Scots, with the King of France and Duke of Guiſe, though in vain (f). After the deplorable death of that Princeſs, and the loſs of his own wife, Mr Fitzherbert reſolved to leave France and to repair to Madrid, in order to implore the protection of Philip II, to whom indeed moſt of the Engliſh exiles reſorted ſooner or later; he continued there till about the year 1589, and then, being either tired out with vain expectations, or finding that he was not a man of fit principles to thrive in that Court, he reſolved to accompany the Duke of Feria, who had been formerly in England with King Philip, married an Engliſh Lady, and was juſtly eſteemed a great patron of the nation in Spain, to the city of Milan in Italy, where he remained for ſome time, and from thence repaired to Rome (g). It is reported that during his reſidence there he fell into great neceſſities, notwithſtanding he had left behind him a competent fortune in England, which diſtreſs is ſuppoſed to have driven him to think of entering into Orders (h). However that matter may be, it is certain, that he took a lodging very near the Engliſh college, and obſerved the ſame hours of prayers they did who were reſident in the place. He ſpent the reſt of his time in compoſing ſeveral books, and, amongſt the reſt, one which he addreſſed to his ſon Edward Fitzherbert, Eſq; againſt the maxims of the famous Italian Politician, Nicholas Machiavel, which has been of ſome uſe to modern writers, and was in thoſe times eſteemed a moſt ſound and excellent treatiſe (i) [A]. He entered into the Society of Jeſus in the ſpring of the year 1614, and received Prieſts Orders much about the ſame time; after which he ſpeedily removed into Flanders, in order to preſide over the Miſſion, and continued at Bruſſels about two years, during which ſpace he wrote ſeveral books in defence of his opinions. In theſe, though he falls much ſhort of the reſt of his perſuaſion, yet he

[A] Eſteemed a moſt ſound and excellent treatiſe.] The firſt writings publiſhed by our author, and which gave thoſe of his party a true opinion of his worth, that was not certainly inferior to any of their zealous champions at that time, were the following pieces:

I. A Defence of the Catholic Cauſe, containing a treatiſe in confutation of ſundry untruths and ſlanders publiſhed by the Heretics, &c. To which is added, an apology, or defence, of his innocency, in a feigned Conſpiracy againſt her Majeſty's perſon, for which one Edward Squire was wrongfully condemned, and executed, in November 1598. St Omer's 1602. This is the book which the learned Camden (1) tells us was written by Walpole a Jeſuit, or one under his name.

(1) Pitſ. de Illuſt. Angl. Script. p. 814.

II. TREATISE concerning Polity and Religion, Doway 1606, 4to. wherein are confuted ſeveral principles of Machiavel. The ſecond part of the ſaid treatiſe was printed alſo at Doway 1610; and both together in 1615, 4to. A third part was printed at London 1652, 4to. being then, ſays Mr Wood, cried up for a good book, as the other parts had been.

III. An ſit utilitas in ſcelere, vel de infelicitate Principis Machiavellani? Rome 1610. 8vo. that is, whether there be any utility in wickedneſs? or, Of the infelicity of Machiavel's Prince.

Theſe laſt treatiſes met univerſally with a favourable reception, amongſt Proteſtants as well as Papiſts, and did the author great honour as they ſhewed him to be a man of deep ſenſe, ſtrong parts, and of a generous diſpoſition, as well as of much reading and ſingular experience. The truth is, theſe treatiſes give Mr Fitzherbert a right to be remembred among the learned men of our nation, ſince they were extremely well calculated to expel the poiſon infuſed by Machiavel's books, which have done incredible miſchief ever ſince they were publiſhed. Our author goes the right way to work, he ſhews that cunning, ſubtilty, and artifice, are but the mimicks of wiſdom and civil prudence, and therefore naturally beneath great minds, and altogether inconſiſtent either with a good heart or a good underſtanding. He ſhews next, that addreſs, intrigue, and contrivance, are ſo far from being proofs of genius, that they are convincing teſtimonies of the want of it, for that men of true genius move always in a direct path, with their eyes fixed on the object they would obtain, and overcome all obſtacles, not by dirty plots, but by noble perſeverance. He demonſtrates, that the Machiavelian principles lead to infelicity, and that as it is impoſſible a wicked man ſhould be happy, ſo it is as impoſſible that a wicked Prince ſhould be proſperous, or great; it is true that his language is not a little perplexed and obſcure, that his method, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, is ſomewhat embarraſſed and pedantick; and that he has intermixed many things in his diſcourſe, which might have been much better omitted; but tho' theſe circumſtances abate, yet they are far from deſtroying the merit of his work, in which the materials are to be found of a better refutation of Machiavel's writings than is to be met with in our own or perhaps in any other language.

he expreſſes himſelf with a bitterneſs, which would be altogether inexcuſable, but from the nature of his circumſtances, which, on the one hand, might ſharpen his temper; and, on the other, oblige him to write in ſuch a ſtile as might be moſt agreeable to his benefactors (k). Theſe books of his, at the time they were publiſhed, were highly commended and much eſteemed, though now they are little read, and hardly remembered [B]. His great parts, his extenſive and polite learning, together with the high eſteem that he had procured by his prudent behaviour at Bruſſels, procured him what any other in his ſituation would have eſteemed a very high preferment, but which he with much reluctancy accepted. This was the Government, with the title of Rector, of the Roman College at Rome, which office he exerciſed with unblemiſhed credit for twenty-two years, and was often named within that ſpace of time for a Cardinal's hat, in the room of Cardinal Alan, which it is thought he might eaſily have obtained, if it had been in reality the object of his ambition (l). But he was a man of a mild and moderate diſpoſition, more eſpecially in the latter part of his life, and for that reaſon was more willing to decline, than to aſpire to, that envied dignity. He died there Auguſt 27, 1640, in the eighty-eighth year of his age (m). His body was interred in the chapel belonging to the Engliſh college at Rome (n). As he remained ſo great a part of his life an exile, and under the imputation of being an enemy to his country, he may be juſtly reputed unhappy, but yet leſs ſo than a near relation of his who was contemporary with him, and reſided for ſome years in the ſame college (o) [C], ſince our author lived the far greater part of his days decently, if not ſplendidly, and died at laſt peaceably in his bed, exceedingly admired by thoſe of his own faction, and as much eſteemed as he could expect by the reſt of his countrymen, who diſliked nothing in him but his perſuaſion, and were ſorry that a man of his parts, learning, and politeneſs, ſhould, by his obſtinacy, make himſelf ſo unhappy.

[B] And indeed hardly remembred] The remaining works of Mr Thomas Fitzherbert are entirely controverſial, and by no means equal to thoſe beforementioned, for the reaſons that have been briefly aſſigned in the text. The titles of them are as follow:

X. The Obmuteſce of F. T. to the Epphata of Dr Collins, &c. Printed 1621. 8vo.

[C] And reſided for ſome years in the ſame college] We were unwilling to multiply, beyond what neceſſity required, the number of articles in this book, and therefore choſe to ſpeak of the couſin of this gentleman, who, in his time, made a great figure in the Engliſh College at Rome, in a note. This Nicholas Fitzherbert was the ſecond ſon of John Fitzherbert, ſecond ſon of Sir Anthony Fitzherbert of Norbury in Derbyſhire, Knight. In his youth he was a ſtudent in Exeter College, and exhibited to it by Sir William Petre, about 1568, for his name ſtands in the regiſter under the title of Coll. Exon in 1571 and 1572, being then the Senior Under-Graduate of that College. About that time he left his native country, parents, and patrimony, for religion, and went beyond the ſeas as a voluntary exile (4). At firſt he ſettled at Bononia in Italy, to obtain the knowledge of the Civil Law, and continued there in 1580. Not long after he went to Rome, and, in the year 1587, began to live in the family of William Alan, the Cardinal of England, and continued with him till the time of his death, being then accounted eminent for his knowledge in the Laws and polite literature. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the learned world by the following pieces:

This Nicholas Fitzherbert, in a journey that he made from Rome, was unfortunately drowned, ſome time in the year 1612 (6), being, in the opinion of his acquaintance, about ſixty three years of age. We have a very high character given of him by Pitts (7), as might well be expected, his religion conſidered, and his living, on account of it, an exile from his native country for ſo many years.

the fleet ſent out againſt France [A]; and had the misfortune to be ſorely hurt with an arrow in attempting to deſtroy the French fleet at Breſt (*). Shortly after, he attended King Henry at the ſiege of Tournay; and, for his bravery there, received the honour of Knighthood (d). In 1520, he was Vice-Admiral of England, and employed in guarding the Channel, at the time the Emperor Charles V. came to England (e). He ſo ingratiated himſelf with the King his maſter, that he obtained from him, in 1521, a grant of the manor of Naveſby in Northamptonſhire, part of the poſſeſſions of Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, then lately attainted (f). At that time he was Embaſſador in France; but, upon a rupture between that kingdom and England, he was recalled, in January 1521-2, and ordered to ſea with a ſtrong fleet of twenty-eight ſail, to ſecure our Merchants, and take what French ſhips he could (g). Shortly after, he aſſiſted at the taking of Morlaix in Bretagne (h) [B]: and, with Sir William Sandes, and Sir Morice Barkeley, went and burnt Marguiſon, which was newly built and fortified; and many villages (i). In 1523, the King of France preparing to ſend John Duke of Albany Regent of Scotland into that kingdom, in order to invade England from that quarter; Sir William Fitz-William was made Admiral, and diſpatched, with a ſtrong fleet, to try to intercept him. Having miſſed of him, he determined to land on the French coaſt, which he accordingly did, at Treport in Normandy, and burnt the ſuburbs of that town, and ſeveral ſhips in the harbour; tho' there were but ſeven hundred Engliſh, oppoſed by ſix thouſand French (k). The year following, being Captain of Guiſnes in Picardy, he mightily annoyed Boulogne, and other places adjacent (l). Before the end of that year, he was made Treaſurer of the King's Houſhold; and, in October, ſent to France, with John Taylor Doctor of Law, to ſee the Lady Regent (whoſe ſon King Francis I, was then priſoner in Spain) ſwear to obſerve the articles of a treaty newly concluded between the two Crowns (m). In 1529, he was one of thoſe who ſubſcribed the articles exhibited in Parliament againſt Cardinal Wolſey (n). At the grand interview between the Kings of England and France in 1532, he attended his Maſter King Henry VIII to Boulogne, the place of interview, amongſt many other perſons of the higheſt quality (o). In May 1535, he was ſent, with the Duke of Norfolk, the Biſhop of Ely, and Dr Fox, to treat with the French King's Commiſſioners, about a league between the Crowns of England and France: one of the articles whereof were, That the Duke of Angouleſme, third ſon to the King of France, ſhould marry Elizabeth ſecond daughter of King Henry (p). Shortly after, he was made Knight of the Garter, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter; and in 1536, conſtituted Admiral of England, Wales, Ireland, Normandy, Gaſcogne, and Acquitaine (q). On the 18th of October 1537, he was advanced to the title of Earl of Southampton (r): and made Lord Privy-Seal the 27th of October 1539 (s). The April following, ſome diſputes having ariſen between England and France, he, and John Lord Ruſſel lately made High-Admiral, were ſent over to Calais with a few troops of horſe; and having ſet all things in good order, they quickly returned (t). He was alſo employed as Captain of the Foreward, in the expedition to Scotland, in October 1542; but, in the way thither, he died at Newcaſtle. However, ſo much eſteemed was he, that for the honour of his memory, his ſtandard was borne in the vanguard in all that expedition (u). By his Will, bearing date the 10th of September the ſame year, he ordered his body to be buried in the church of Midherſt in Suſſex (w). He left no iſſue by Mabel his wife, daughter to Henry Lord Clifford, and ſiſter to Henry the firſt Earl of Cumberland (x). Of this great man it is recorded, whilſt he was Admiral, that there was not a ſerviceable man under him whoſe name he knew not; not a week paſſed but he paid his ſhips; not a prize but his ſeamen ſhared in as well as [A] The year following, he was one of the chief commanders in the fleet ſent out againſt France] The deſign of this expedition, was, to clear the ſea of French ſhips, before King Henry and his confederates attacked France by land. The moſt conſiderable perſons employed in this ſervice, beſides Sir William Fitz-William, were, Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, Sir Walter Devereux Lord Ferrers, Sir Wolſtan Browne, Sir Edward Ichyngham, Sir Antony Poyntz, Sir John Wallop, Sir Thomas Wyndham, Sir Stephen Bull, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney, Eſquires, &c (1). They ſailed to Breſt, and reſolved to attack the French fleet in that harbour, where it lay under the covert of many platforms raiſed on the land; beſides, which they had joined twenty four hulks together, with intention to ſet them on fire, and let them go adrift with the tide, to keep the Engliſh ſhips from theirs. Notwithſtanding that, Sir Edward Howard ſent out his boats, to make a ſhew of landing; whereupon the French flocking to the ſhore, to the number of above ten thouſand (the Engliſh in all the boats being not above fifteen hundred) he thought fit to land over againſt Breſt, where he burnt the country in ſight of the caſtle, under which the French ſhips lay, defended by their hulks. He could do no more at that time, for want of proviſions. But ſome gallies of the enemy having anchored, a few days after, at Conquet below Breſt; the Admiral, attended by Sir Thomas Cheney, Sir John Wallop, Sir Henry Sherborne, and Sir William Sidney, fell upon thoſe gallies, tho' they lay betwixt two rocks, that had bulwarks on them full of ordnance: and the Admiral boarded one galley, in which the commander of them,——Pregent, was; but he had the misfortune to be thruſt overboard by the enemy's pikes, and drowned. By which means this expedition became unſucceſsful (2).—An attempt of the like nature under the Marquis of Caermarthen, in 1694, did alſo miſcarry. Which ſhews the great difficulty of ſuch undertakings.

FLAMSTEED (JOHN) one of the moſt eminent Engliſh Aſtronomers in the XVIIIth century, was born at Denby in Derbyſhire, Auguſt 19, 1646. His father, whoſe name was Stephen, was third ſon of Mr William Flamſteed of Little Hallam in that county. His mother was Mary, daughter of Mr John Spateman of Derby, Ironmonger, who died when he was a little above three years old. Our author had, from his infancy, a natural tenderneſs of conſtitution which he could never ſurmount (a). He was educated at the free-ſchool of Derby where his father lived, and at fourteen years of age, when he was but juſt become head of that ſchool, he was viſited with a ſevere fit of ſickneſs, followed by a conſumption and other diſtempers, which however did not ſo much obſtruct his progreſs in learning but that he kept his ſtation till the form broke up, and ſome of his ſchool-fellows went to the univerſity, to which, though deſigned for it, his father thought it not adviſable to ſend him on account of his infirmity. Being thus taken from ſchool in 1662, within a month or two after he had John de Sacroboſco's book de Sphæra put into his hands; this accident, and the leiſure which accompanied it, induced him to make Aſtronomy the principal object of his ſtudies [A]. He had already peruſed a great

(a) The reader will find in the note an account of the MSS. from which theſe particulars are taken, which remain in the hands of that learned, communicative, and worthy perſon, Mr James Hodgſon, F. R. S. and Maſter of the Royal Mathematical School at Chriſt's Hoſpital, in London.

[A] Induced him to make Aſtronomy the principal object of his ſtudies] In the text of this article, we have given an account of his progreſs in that ſcience in his junior years, as it is repreſented in a manuſcript of his, written in 1707, and intitled (1), Hiſtorica narratio vitæ meæ ab anno 1646. ad 1675. But we ſhall give a more particular account of his ſeveral ſteps in that ſtudy, from another manuſcript of his, dated May the 8th 1667, and intitled The ſelf inſpections of J. F. being an account of himſelf in the actions and ſtudies of his twenty one firſt years, written at ſeveral times, by his own hand. It is there he tells us, that, in 1662, he had Sacroboſco's book de Sphæra lent him, which he ſet himſelf to read without any director, but not unſucceſsfully, for here he laid the ground of his mathematical knowledge. In that winter, ſome time before Chriſtmas, his father taught him arithmetic, and the doctrine of fractions, and the golden rule of three direct and converſe. At Chriſtmas, or a little after, he went to Uttoxeter for his health, and took with him Mr Thomas Fale's Art of Dialling (2); and having ſeen a quadrant formerly, the conſtruction of which he was informed was laid down in that book, he ſet himſelf immediately to calculate a table of the ſun's altitudes at all hours in the Equator, Tropics, and ſome intermediate parallel in the latitude of fifty three degree, by Mr Fale's tables of natural ſines, which our author performed in Lent of that year without any help, and before he had heard of any artificial tables, and accordingly made himſelf a quadrant. The reſt of the winter he was greatly indiſpoſed, and his diſtemper continued violent upon him the ſummer of the year 1663, when it abated a little, and ſuffered him to proſecute his ſtudies. For upon his return home he was introduced to Mr Elias Grice, who told him of artificial tables, and ſhewed him Wingate's Canon. He procured likewiſe Mr Stirrup's Art of Dialling, which he read this ſummer with ſome other authors on mathematical ſubjects, as Mr Gunter's Sector and Canon, and ſoon after he obtained Mr William Oughtred's Canon, in all which, ſays he, I read ſome parts curſorily, not abiding a tedious prelection of any throughout, without the help or directions of any one, not being permitted (becauſe they were ſcarce to be met with) the help of any one ſo much as to expound a term unto me. His ſtudies were diſcountenanced by his father, but his natural inclination led him to proſecute them thro' all impeding occurrences. Having got the Artificial Canon, he calculated ſeveral both general and particular tables, fitting the particular ones to the latitude of Derby, viz. fifty three degrees. He collected alſo a calculative method of dialling from Mr Gunter's Sector, and tranſcribed it, with a method for the conſtruction of the quadrant and tables fitted thereto, calculated with his own hand in a ſmall paper book. In this taſk, and in peruſing ſome other authors on various ſubjects, he ſpent his ſtudious hours this year and the beginning of 1664, when he became acquainted with Mr George Linacre and Mr William Litchford, deſiring the friendſhip of the former on account of his knowledge of the fixed ſtars, and of the latter on account of his knowledge of the planets. Mr Flamſteed being deſirous to eſſay all ſorts of mathematical ſcience, and unwilling to be ſeen with Mr Gadbury's book which contained Horrox's tables, leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected to ſtudy Aſtrology, bought Mr Street's Caroline tables, intending, when he had an opportunity, not only to learn to calculate the places of the planets, but alſo to ſtudy their motions and underſtand their theory, but was prevented from executing this deſign for that year. January 1ſt, 1665, he applied himſelf to calculate the true places of the planets to a given time by his tables abovementioned, and accordingly effected it, tho' not ſo exactly as by his following calculations, yet ſo auſpiciouſly, as gave him a further encouragement to proſecute theſe endeavours, in which, ſays he, I obſerve it was my fault to err more thro' want of care than knowledge, which ſince I animadverted, I have ſtriven with double care to prevent. He employed himſelf afterwards in writing an Almanack for the year 1666, but never offered it to the preſs. He had in the ſummer of the preceding year, calculated ſeveral new tables, and digeſted ſome of them into a convenient book, and this year he added ſome more. He likewiſe calculated the nativities of ſeveral of his friends and acquaintance. He wrote alſo a piece upon the conſtruction and uſes of a quadrant, with neceſſary tables for the framing of the ſame, and of a rule which he had drawn, fitting both to the latitude of fifty three degrees. He began this piece Auguſt the eighth, and finiſhed it on the twenty fourth of the ſame month, intitling it his Mathematical Eſſays, which was the firſt piece he wrote, Auguſt the 26th he ſet out for Ireland, in order to be touched by Mr Valentine Greatraks, (3), but receiving no benefit returned to Derby, September the 23d following. Soon after he added an Appendix to his Mathematical Eſſays, and the projection of an univerſal dial, and a catalogue of ſeventy of the fixed ſtars, with their right aſcenſions, declinations, longitudes, and latitudes, to the year 1701, which he had compoſed by the Tychonic places, and allowing the annual proceſſion of the fixed ſtars 50″. He alſo proceeded to perfect the calculation of the ſolar eclipſe which was to happen June 22, 1666, in the morning, according to the Caroline tables. In the Lent aſſizes in 1666, he became acquainted with Mr Emanuel Halton of Wingfield manor, who lent him the Richleian tables compoſed by Natalis Durret, a Frenchman, the introduction to which Mr Flamſteed

a great deal of Hiſtory both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, but this was a new ſubject to him, and he found in it a mighty pleaſure; and having tranſlated ſo much as he thought neceſſary for his uſe into Engliſh, he proceeded to make dials by the directions of ſome ordinary books, and having changed a treatiſe of Aſtrology found amongſt his father's books for Mr Street's Caroline Tables, he ſet himſelf to calculate the places of the planets by them, and to enquire into the reaſons of them, in which he found little ſatisfaction, that author being very conciſe and ſhort, and leaving the reaſons of his proceſſes to be learned from others. Having calculated, by theſe tables, an eclipſe of the ſun which was to happen June 22, 1666, he imparted it to a relation of his, who ſhewed it to Mr Emanuel Halton of Wingfield manor (b), who coming ſoon after to ſee him, and finding that our author was not acquainted with the Aſtronomical performances of others, ſent him Ricciolus's Almageſt, and Kepler's Rudolphine Tables, with ſome other mathematical books to which he was before a ſtranger. Mr Halton, who was a good Algebraiſt, endeavoured to draw him in to the ſtudy of Algebra, by propoſing little problems to him, which, having not long before made himſelf acquainted with Euclid, he gave geometrical ſolutions to, and never applied himſelf unto Algebra till after he removed to London. He proſecuted his Aſtronomical ſtudies from this time with all imaginable vigour, and with all the ſucceſs that he could wiſh [B]. In 1669, he collected ſome remarkable eclipſes of the fixed ſtars by the moon, which would happen in 1670, and calculated them from the Caroline Tables, and directed them to the Lord Viſcount Brouncker, Preſident of the Royal Society (c), which produced very good effects [C]; for, this piece being read before that Society, was highly approved, and procured him letters of thanks from Mr Oldenburgh their Secretary, and Mr John Collins one of their members, with the latter of whom our author held a correſpondence for ſeveral years, and wrote a great many letters to him, moſt of which were in the hands of the late William Jones, Eſq; F. R. S. and of which we ſhall give the reader ſome extracts, ſince they will ſhew the progreſs of our author's ſtudies till his ſettlement at Greenwich in 1675, when that correſpondence ended [D]. From ſteed tranſlated into Engliſh, and corrected the errors of it. Mr Halton ſoon after communicated to him Ricciolus's new Almageſt in Latin, which our author was extreamly glad to receive, becauſe it ſhewed a method of finding the Sun's true parallax by obſervations of the Moon's Dichotony, which he was very deſirous of inveſtigating at that time. He ſpent likewiſe ſome part of his time in Aſtrological Studies, 'but ſo, ſays he, as my labours were rather aſtronomical. Amongſt others, I ſpent ſome time on Mr 'Linacre's, and another great perſon's ſchemes, yet 'could I not any ways ſatisfy myſelf in the arcs of 'directions for the meaſuring of time, nor am I yet 'perfectly ſatisfied: yet I think Kepler's meaſures 'moſt rational and beſt grounded, tho', in the great 'perſon's nativity which I directed, I uſed Naboyd's 'meaſure, which is moſt in uſe amongſt Aſtrologers. 'In fine, I found Aſtrology to give general ſtrong con'jectural hints, not perfect declarations.' After Mr Flamſteed had received Ricciolus's Almageſt, he read it over with great attention. In 1667, ſome conſiderations of the different equations of time, uſed by ſeveral Aſtronomers, tho' well demonſtrated by none, induced him to endeavour the diſcovery of a demonſtrable equation. He was at firſt of opinion, that the natural days were always equal, and that there needed no equation of time; but whilſt he was endeavouring to demonſtrate this, he proved the contrary, firſt, that the exentricity of the Earth's Orbit from the Sun's Center cauſed an inequality; and afterwards, that the Ecliptic's Obliquity cauſed another inequality of the apparent day, which two cauſes applied together, would make the abſolute equation of time. After a long meditation having removed moſt of the difficulty, he wrote a letter of three ſheets to Mr Halton upon this ſubject. He likewiſe endeavoured ſomething with regard to the Obliquity of the Ecliptic, the Sun's true diſtance from the Earth, and the mean length of the tropical year, in April 1667.

[B] And with all the ſucceſs that he could wiſh.] He employed himſelf in calculating the places of the Planets obſerved by Hevelius, and related in his Mercurius ſub ſole viſus, from the Caroline tables, whereby Mr Flamſteed found that they agreed not ſo well with the Heavens as he preſumed they had, and that further obſervations were requiſite to correct them. An Eclipſe of the Sun happening October 25, 1668, he had calculated the times of the appearance from the Caroline tables, and afterwards obſerved it, but not being yet furniſhed with convenient inſtruments for meaſuring and correcting the times, he could not believe it accurate enough to be publiſhed, tho' he found by this that the tables differed very much from the Heavens.

[C] Which produced very good effects.] He ſpeaks of this in the Appendix to his Self Inſpections, in theſe words: 'At the latter end of the year 1669, I wrote 'an Almanack for the following year, not after the 'uſual method, but much more accurately, inſerting 'an Eclipſe of the Sun that might have been obſervable but was omitted in the Ephemerides, and five 'Appulſes of the Moon to fixed Stars. But this being 'rejected, as being beyond the capacity of the vulgar, 'and returned me. I excerped the Eclipſe and Appulſes, and addreſſed them with ſome aſtronomical 'ſpeculations to the Royal Society, ſuppreſſing my 'name under my anagram. My little labour was better accepted than I expected. I received a letter 'of thanks from Mr Oldenburgh, the Secretary of 'the Society. My papers I ſent to Mr Stanſby, he 'delivered them to Mr Aſhmole, that great lover of 'curioſity, and he preſented them to the Royal So'ciety.' The original manuſcript of this piece was in the hands of the late learned and ingenious William Jones, Eſq; F. R. S. and is inſcribed thus: 'To the 'Right Honourable William Lord Viſcount Brouncker, 'Preſident of the illuſtrious Royal Society, as alſo the 'Right Worſhipfull worthy and truly ingenious Henry 'Oldenburgh, Eſq; Chriſtopher Wren, M. D. and 'all other the Aſtronomical Fellows of the ſaid So'ciety. I. F. humbly preſents this epiſtle.' At the cloſe of it he writes thus: 'Excuſe, I pray you, this 'juvenile heat for the concerns of ſcience, and want 'of better language from one, who, from the ſix'teenth year of his age to this inſtant, hath only 'ſerved one bare apprenticeſhip in theſe arts, under 'the diſcouragement of friends, the want of health, 'and all other inſtructors, except his better genius. 'I crave the liberty to conceal my name, not to ſup'preſs it. I have compoſed the letters of it written 'in Latin in this ſentence, In Matheſi à ſole fundes. 'I had many materials to add, but they would have 'ſwelled my letter beyond its preſcribed limits. If I 'may underſtand that you accept of theſe, or think 'them worth your notice you ſhall e'er long hear 'more from yours, &c. J. F.

[D] When that correſpondence ended.] In his letter dated at Derby, January the twenty fourth, 1669-70, he writes thus: 'Your's of the fifteenth I received, by 'which I underſtand that my papers, however unwor'thy, were read in the Royal Society, an honour 'which I could as little either expect or deſerve, as it 'merited

From the time that the abovementioned piece was read to the Royal Society, he began to have

'merited their applauſe, or I their thanks. My intent in addreſſing thoſe Calculi to his Lordſhip (4) was only to give notice, what Phænomena the Heavens were about to afford us, which ſince I was not accommodated with inſtruments ſufficient to obſerve them with the requiſite accuracy myſelf, I made bold to preſent to his Honour, whom I ſuppoſed to be amply accommodated for ſuch obſervations. But preſcribing the uſe of a Teleſcope before other inſtruments, and taking occaſion thereon to urge ſomething too boldly on Mr Hook, and in another on Mr Street, concerning the Ephemerides, being likewiſe conſcious of my rude addreſſes to thoſe worthy perſons with my papers, and fearing that my heat for the promotion of ſcience might be worſe taken by them than I intended, knowing alſo the ſmallneſs of my merits, I reſolved to ſuppreſs my name till I underſtood how it was like to ſpeed with my papers. I fear I addreſſed myſelf too rudely to his Lordſhip, but ſince he is pleaſed to take notice of thoſe unpoliſhed papers and enquire after their author, you may pleaſe, if you have not already, to tender my humble and ſincereſt ſervices with my name to his Lordſhip, and deſire his excuſe for me that I have not explained my method of calculation; I ſuppoſe it cannot be hid to thoſe who are verſed in Trigonometry. It is the accurateſt I could chooſe, and the numbers were twice, ſome thrice, repeated, for more certainty. If any deſire to be more fully ſatisfied, I hope I ſhall anſwer their expectations in an epiſtle to the excellent Hevelius, containing a commentary on, and a correction of, ſeveral particulars, in his Mercurius ſub ſole viſus, and commentary on Mr Horrox's Venus ſub ſole viſa, which I have lying by me written in Latin about half a year ſince. But my ſtyle not pleaſing ſome of my more judicious friends, I have ſince then given myſelf to the peruſal of the Claſſic, old Roman, and ſome modern authors, that ſo I may beſtow a better language on it before I expoſe it to the view of ſuch ſeverities as I ſhall be ſure to meet with. I intend to preſent it, with an epiſtle de æquatione temporis, to the view of the Royal Society, before I commit it to the public; but by reaſon of my frequent diſtempers, my parents affairs, and the coldneſs of the ſeaſon, I ſhall be forced to protract the time I have ſet myſelf for the peruſal of my papers, which yet I hope to preſent you with compleated, within theſe ſix months. I have ſolar tables by me compoſed above two years ſince, to wit, before I was twenty one years of age, which I intend to expoſe with my epiſtle de Æquatione Temporis, directed to Mr Street, whom, on occaſion, you may let know I ſhall write to him before the term be over, by my kinſman an Attorney. But I ſhall be forced to trouble you with the letter, becauſe I know not the place of his habitation. I deſire to tranſact things fairly with him as I have done with his deceaſed antagoniſt Mr Wing, with whom I had a fair correſpondence, and tho' we differed de Parallaxi & Æquationibus Syſtematis Solaris, and ſeveral other things, yet our diſſent made us not the leſs friends, and tho' I may not ſubſcribe to Mr Street's opinions, de fixatione aphelionum & nodorum in ſuperioribus, & de Æquationibus Lunæ oſcillatoriis, yet I hope that he will not refuſe that we may friendly communicate by letters, of ſuch things as concern the Heavens and our ſtudies. As to the ſeverity of calculations, I ſuppoſe that if the artiſt be but careful and curious enough, we have canons ſufficiently large. In the ſtudy of my eſpecial friend Mr Halton, I once ſaw one of Vlaccus to every ten ſexagenary ſeconds: and if our ſupputations be exact to ſeconds, I think it is enough, and more than ever we may hope by inſtruments to obtain from the Heavens; I mean in deſining the places of the Luminaries fixed, and the Planets. As for their Diameters, I dare not deny but that, by the help of glaſſes, we may be enabled to define them to ſeconds, or ſmaller parts; eſpecially if a ſhort teleſcope may be made to perform as much as a long one, which you ſay that Mr Newton hath not only proved by demonſtration, but fact. Sir, if it be no concealed ſecret, if you have the liberty, and may do it, I deſire that you would pleaſe to inform me of what glaſſes his ſmall Teleſcope is compoſed, how, or in what figures ground, and how diſpoſed in the tube. I intend to work ſome for my own uſe, and am framing ſuch an engine as Mr Hook deſcribes for the grinding and poliſhing of them. I intend to grind with ordinary fine ſand, dreſſed, and poliſh firſt with chalk, and after with putty. I know no better powders, but would be much obliged to any one that would inform me that, or any thing elſe, either concerning the uſual method or neceſſaries for grinding and poliſhing them; if you know any thing which you may freely impart, I ſhould be much obliged by a communication.'

In his letter dated at Derby July the ſixteenth, 1670, he writes thus. 'I have received another letter from you ſince, with an account of Gaſſendus's obſervations, and an information of Mengolus's book, for which I am obliged to you. Pray, when it is known, let me underſtand his opinion of the quantity of the Sun's horizontal parallaxes, and the refractions, and what refraction he allows the Sun in the altitude of twenty degrees. I ſuſpect, and have good reaſon for it, that in inland places it is nothing or not ſenſible in that altitude, for by ſome of Mr Wright's obſervations, the Sun at noon had no refraction the fifteenth of December in altitude fifteen degrees... I thank you for the advice of writing to Mr Townley.—I am at preſent calculating the Moon's Appulſes for the next year, which, when I have finiſhed, I will ſend him a ſpecimen of, to make way for our future correſpondence.... As for what I have noted in Ricciolus, beſides the frequent errors of his ſchemes, you may note theſe P. 161. he applies the horizontal parallax of the Sun in all altitudes, as if it was the ſame both in the zenith and the horizon, and ſo gathers the Ecliptic's obliquity 20″ more than his own obſervations permit. P. 435. he, in his ſecond example, is guilty of the higheſt diſingenuity, for he firſt lays down a vicious obſervation, by which he thruſts the Sun's place above ten minutes further than either Street's or my tables afford, and then derives a right aſcenſion almoſt two minutes larger than his obſervation will allow, as I can eaſily prove, but that I have neither time nor room at preſent. If you deſire it, I ſhall make it good hereafter. P. 477, in his catalogue of the fixed ſtars, he protrudes the right ſhoulder of Auriga 1 deg. 20′ forwarder than his own obſerved diſtances from Capella the brighteſt of the Pleiades and Procyon will permit, that he may make his catalogue agree with the Tychonick, from which, he was ſo conſcious of his own defects, he ſcarce has dared any where to recede; ſo that he ſeems to me rather to affect the name of having corrected our tables, than really to have amended what was faulty in any one. I had firſt notice of this ſtar's varying from the Tychonick Canon in Hevelius's Mercurius ſub ſole, but found it abſolutely confirmed by the Ricciolan obſervations. In his Appendix, p. 733, Prob. 3. he teaches how to correct the apparent time of the quadrature, as if the parallax cauſed the Moon to be really cave, when ſhe was apparently ſemi-illuminated. But this correction is needleſs, and all that is ſaid in that column and the two next, abſolutely to be rejected, ſince the parallax cannot vary the phaſis at all, as I can eaſily prove, and will appear to any one that duly conſiders what he there lays down. Laſtly, he is wholly inclined to the Peripatetics, againſt all other Philoſophy, and on this account favours Claramontius againſt Tycho, Kepler, and reaſon itſelf. And tho' he proteſts againſt it, yet I fear he was partial to Tycho, becauſe a Calviniſt, and propenſe to Claramontius, as one that was a Prieſt of his own order, and in his principles a rigid Peripatetic, and one that had left ſome perſons his relations of, and well deſerving from their ſociety.'

In a letter dated at Derby, September the nineteenth, 1670. he writes as follows. 'I ſat up this laſt night, waiting to obſerve the Eclipſe of the Moon. The Heavens were clear till midnight, after which they were by little and little covered over with thick whitiſh clouds, thro' which, when our clocks ſtruck have accounts sent him of all the mathematical books which were published either at home or

'one, I saw the Moon eclipsed almost a digit, but I 'could not find a convenient star to take its altitude, 'being on one side prohibited by the buildings, and 'the Heavens all covered with the white clouds, that 'none of the bigger stars, or any almost removed from 'the meridian, appeared, and the Moon was scarce 'an hour removed from the noonstead, so that it was 'in vain to think to take her's amongst the clouds. 'The Heavens continued covered with these till morning, and the Moon appeared very rarely through 'the clouds, so that despairing of any good observation, and seeing the Heavens thicken, I left off and 'went to my rest, when I had seen the cusps parallel 'to the horizon, and the sinister end had covered the 'occidental spot, or Palus Mareotidis, of Hevelius, 'but could not note the time. I wrote to Mr Hook 'about the observing this Eclipse. Pray if you chance 'to meet him, enquire whether he observed it or not: 'if he did, and the Heavens smiled on his endeavours, desire him to be pleased to communicate his 'observations to me: for I think the Heavens anteverted our calculations some minutes, which, if so, 'favours an equation I have long since conceived 'ought to be induced into the Lunar System..... I 'hope speedily to present you with the Phænomena 'of the next year, for I have as good as finished my 'calculations.'

In his letter dated at Derby, October the first the same year he writes thus. 'If the Lunar Eclipse last 'hath been observed by any in London, if you can 'procure the observation without trouble, please, by 'your next, to communicate it to me. I have now 'finished my calculations, and am writing them out, 'but cannot tell what tongue to expose them in, English or Latin. Let me have your opinion, that shall 'rule me. The appearances are treble, the number 'I calculated last year, and most of them some way 'truly notable. I have read a part of Fabri's Optics. I was much pleased with his acuteness and accurateness at first, but coming to his forty third propos. I find it lost, for in his sixth, seventh, and eighth 'sections, he demonstrates not what he intends, but 'by drawing his ninety and ninety one schemes too 'close, deceives and mocks his reader.'

In his letter dated at Derby, December the first following, he writes thus: 'I hope you have received 'my last, with my calculations of the last year's appearances, in my introduction to which, if I seem 'to have asserted too boldly against our Astronomical 'tables, I have now received an observation of my 'Cousin Wilson that will fully confirm my affirmations, 'which I send you inclosed. I cannot but congratulate you for your happy correspondence with P. Bertet, and I am much pleased to hear of De Mouton's 'book de mensurâ Diam. Solis & Lunæ, one of 'which, when they come to your hands, I desire you 'to send me, and pay yourself out of what you have 'in your hands. If the piece be well done it will 'conduce no little to the correction of Astronomical 'Lunar tables. When I have received and perused 'it, I shall, according to your directions, write to De 'Mouton, till then, not having any occasion offered, 'I suppose you will neither hold it convenient nor necessary. Sir, you once, I remember, proferred to 'lend me Mr Horrox's papers which are now in your 'hands. If, Sir, you have not procured them yet 'to be printed, nor any Bookseller offers to undertake them, I would accept of the offer gladly, for 'I have leisure now to peruse any author, and I would 'gladly try if that deviation which is now very perceptible in the motion of Saturn, was not, in his 'time, sensible: for, if I remember aright, one of 'his books contains the observed distances of the 'Planets from the fixed stars, with other his observations, from which, nothing as yet, hath been deduced.'

In his letter dated at Derby, January the thirtieth, 1670-1, he writes as follows: 'I have lately written 'to Mr Moore, from whom I have received an answer full of his natural civility and generosity. By 'his advice I have likewise wrote to Mr Townley, 'from whom I cannot yet expect an answer, by reason 'my letter went but on Tuesday last, and can scarce 'yet reach his hands..... I have the Transaction in 'which Mr Oldenburgh hath printed the short abstract 'of my calculations, which give the observers notice 'of such appearances, but the other requisites of the 'supputations being wanting, they will be put to a 'second trouble of calculating to gain the anomalies, 'and other parts of the calculation, before they can 'be able to guess how, or where, any thing in our 'numbers are to be corrected. I am framing tables 'of oblique ascensions for the latitudes of London, 'Dantzick, and Derby, supposing the declination 23 'gr. 30′. 00″ to second minutes, the old ones falsely 'supposing it 23 gr. $31' \frac{1}{2}$, to which I intend to add 'the angle orient, which will not a little assist calculations, and such as are minding to make Astronomical 'predictions, or compare cælestial observations, with 'our numbers.'

In his letter dated at Derby, March the 20th 1670-1, he writes thus: 'I have both your letters..... I am 'exceedingly pleased to hear that Mr Horrox's papers 'will be printed, and I suppose the Venus sub sole 'with them, to which, having well perused it, I 'know not what can be added. The notes of Hevelius I find generally needless, and those on the sixth 'chapter, page 124, absolutely false, conceding his 'own parallax, because he hath taken the angle of 'the position of Venus, which is made by a line drawn 'through her's and the Sun's center, instead of the 'angle of the vertical circle, per centrum Veneris, with 'the Ecliptic or the parallactical angle, whence he 'not only vitiates the truly computed parallaxes of 'Mr Horrox, but also supposing the parallax of Venus from the Sun in altitude 1. 57, he falsely calculates these parallaxes.

h.		of Long.		of Lat.		Par Long.		Par Lat.
3	15	1	20	1	27	which 0′	32	1′	50
3	35	1	17	1	28	ought 0	42	1	49
3	45	1	15	1	29	to be 0	44	1	48

'So that what he hath deduced, from these his vi'tious parallaxes, ought, if his comment be printed 'with the original, to be corrected. Of this you may 'please to inform the Doctor. You wrote that Dr 'Wallis desired my comment on the Mercurius of 'Hevelius might be printed with Horrox's papers. 'When I received your letter, I looked up my papers, but find that I shall scarcely have time to transcribe and fit them for the press, partly because my 'occasions, but more frequently my distempers, withdraw and detain me from my pen endeavours. For 'the spring coming on my blood increases, which if 'I should not exercise strongly, I should spit up or 'receive into my stomach with great detriment to my 'health. When I return from exercise, other occasions are ready to detain me. Farther, I have received a letter from Mr Oldenburgh, who is not 'willing that I should advert too plainly on Hevelius, 'lest he should recede from his correspondency, and 'detain his observations from us, if he be disgusted. 'However, if I might but know by what time Mr Horrox's papers would be ready for the Printer, I would 'endeavour to get my notes ready to succeed them, 'for I am resolved not to desist if my distemper will 'be forced to intermit by my usual remedies, which 'I much question not, God permitting. In the mean 'time I am preparing cases for my glasses, for which 'I hope to raise a pole to elevate them on this evening, and then I shall endeavour, when I have leisure, to observe the Heavens, that I may some ways 'benefit the science, I am enamoured of, Astronomy. '... I have received and returned letters to Mr Townley, from whom I have an account of the Solar 'Eclipse of 1668, October the 25th, and the occultation of Antares on May the 23d, 1670, of which 'I desire you to procure me Mr Hook's observation, 'if he made any, for I fear Mr Street's is wrested a 'little.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May the third, 1671, he writes as follows: 'I have your's of the twenty 'seventh last past, for the communications in which 'I heartily thank you. I am glad to hear that Mr 'Horrox's papers are gone to the press. I shall against 'that time they may be almost finished, have retranscribed my notes on Hevelius's Mercurius sub sole, 'which, lest I may offend, I shall willingly submit to or abroad. And in June 1670, his father taking notice of his correſpondence with ſeveral ingenious

'the

'the caſtigations and corrections of Dr Wallis, or any 'other ingenious perſon. My diſtempers and affairs 'of late have been ſo intermutually urgent, that I 'have performed little. I have by me a ſheet or two 'which I wrote ſome five years agone, de æquatione temporis aſtronomica, which I have laſt ſummer 'made Latin, and would gladly it might ſee the light. 'It being readieſt, I intend firſt to abſolve and ſend 'it to you, to be diſpoſed of as you ſhall think moſt 'meet. What you write of Mr Horrox's papers being in Mr Townley's hands, I am well pleaſed to 'hear of, and I hope I may do you ſome ſervice in 'that buſineſs, for Mr Townley correſponds with me 'very familiarly, and promiſes me all the ſervices he 'can do me in my ſtudies. But before this comes to 'your hands, I ſuppoſe you may hear of him in London, for he wrote to me ſome ten days agone, that 'he would ſet forward on Monday laſt for the city, 'which I ſuppoſe he will reach by this week's end. 'I am to go into Lancaſhire, and near his houſe the 'latter end of this month, where I intend to call if 'he be returned into the country. In the mean time, 'if you or Mr Jonas Moore can meet with him, you 'may do well to urge him in this buſineſs, and if I 'can do any thing when I go into Lancaſhire, let me 'have your directions and you ſhall not want my endeavours, either for collecting or methodizing any 'papers, that may fall or be intruſted into my hands. 'I deſire you, Sir, to let me hear from you concerning theſe things within this fortnight, for I cannot 'know preciſely what time this month I ſhall take 'my journey. I muſt before I end acknowledge myſelf much obliged to you and Mr Hook, for procuring me my glaſſes. They ſerve well in a tube 'of 13 ½ feet but cauſe ſome colours which will not 'be eaſily removed, tho' I put on a narrow aperture 'to the object glaſs. Pray preſent my ſervice to Mr 'Moore. I am reading his Algebra and find it not 'very difficult unto me, and intend when I ſhall have 'ſpare time to make ſome progreſs in Geometrical 'ſtudies.'

In his letter dated at Derby May the 13th, 1671, he writes thus: 'Having written to Mr Oldenburgh, 'I thought convenient to incloſe this——— I have 'ſent Mr Oldenburgh my obſervation of the moon's 'appulſe to the ſtar in virgo 9°. 53′. whoſe latitude '1°. 20′. north of the fourth light, which I ſaw covered by the dark ſide of the moon, in ſomething 'leſs latitude than the loweſt part of the Propontis, 'when Jupiter was elevated 32°. 52′ whence I deduced the hour 9. 16′. 30″. The preciſe emerſion 'I ſaw not, for I was elſewhere then engaged, but 'coming to the tube, I found that the ſtar was the 'breadth of the Caſpian Spot, or Palus Mæotis, diſtant from the moon's limb, and higher than the ſupreme part of the ſaid ſpot it's whole length; whence 'turning to my quadrant I took the height of the 'moon's ſupreme limb, 31°. 54′. therefore the ſtar's 'height was 71°. 45′. and the hour 10. 24′. 36″. 'I noted the height of Jupiter to be 22°, 36′. and 'find the hour thence 10. 25′. 00″. I am perſwaded 'that the times are pretty exactly taken, for they ſhew 'partly the ſame duration, and, all things conſidered, 'as the tables, but at leaſt 10 if not 15 minutes later. 'I deſire to hear from you, whether any of your acquaintance have obſerved this appearance, of which 'the Calculus is with the reſt in the Tranſactions. If 'you have any obſervations, pray favour me ſo far as 'to impart them to me. I have given Mr Oldenburgh a calculation of the moon's tranſit by Jupiter 'on the twentieth of September next at ſun riſe, which 'I ſuppoſe he will if you deſire impart to you, for I 'have not time to tranſcribe it at preſent, but you 'ſhall command it when you pleaſe.'

In his letter dated at Derby July the 10th, 1671, he writes thus: 'I have finiſhed my tranſcript of my 'Solar Tables, which I wait but for an opportunity to 'tranſmit ſafely unto you. Laſt week here I ſaw a 'boy, one Smedley, about fourteen years old, who 'has two perfect rows of teeth on the upper ſide of his 'mouth, round, ſave that the third tooth on each ſide 'from the fore-teeth are lately come forth, and has a 'third half cut and coming forth, more inwards towards the roof of his mouth. Of theſe two inwards 'extraordinary rows, the two foremoſt teeth of the 'ſecond row came firſt, not a year agone, the reſt all 'within this half year or leſs. —— The boy is of a 'good complexion and healthful, only in his childhood he was lamed in his knee.'

In his letter dated at Derby Auguſt the firſt 1671, he writes as follows: 'With theſe I ſend my promiſed Solar Tables, by my ſchool-fellow Mr Sergeant, though I have not added the ſun's diameters, 'yet I intend, before theſe may be printed, to ſend 'them to you to be annexed to them, or included with 'the reſt. ——— My occaſions are ſo frequent, and 'I am ſo much forced from my ſtudies, that I fear I 'can ſcarce get any time to tranſcribe what I have 'written on Monſieur Hevelius, it being ſo prolix, 'that it will coſt me more time than I can poſſibly 'ſpare to abbreviate it. I eſteem myſelf obliged to 'continue my annual præadmonitions of the lunar appearances, which is a work not only neceſſary, but, 'if I flatter not myſelf too much, ſomething honourable for our countrymen, and therefore not to be 'diſcontinued. Sir, my ſpare hours betwixt my indiſpoſitions and affairs being now but few, and 'likely to be much leſs, I cannot poſſibly perform both 'theſe taſks, therefore deſire you to excuſe me my 'papers upon Hevelius, by which perhaps I might 'diſoblige him to the Engliſh Society which he honours, and permit me only to make my new calculations, towards which I have not as yet wrote one 'figure. If you think them not ſo neceſſary I ſhall 'forbear thinking of them, and perform my notes on 'Hevelius with all ſpeed and ſweetneſs poſſible. I 'ſhall have, e'er long, an opportunity of ſending to 'Dantzick, when perhaps I ſhall write to him, and 'inform him civilly of his errors myſelf. In the mean 'time I ſubmit my intentions to your diſcretion, and 'reſolve in this to be ruled by your advice. ——— 'I cannot but joy with you in the knowledge of your 'French correſpondence, but I fear you have given 'them an account of my abilities beyond what they 'will prove. I deſire to know if you ever communicated any of my calculations, or my few obſervations, unto any of them, and what you have in return. As for the correſpondence of the French Aſtronomers, I ſhall gladly undertake it with the firſt 'convenient opportunity, but not over haſtily. I 'have ſeveral obſervations of the moon's tranſits by 'the fixed ſtars, and her diameters made by Mr Gaſcoigne, and related in his letters, which yet the like 'for accuracy not being to be had amongſt the French, 'I think not fit to communicate, nor buy their acquaintance with them. As for my exerciſe de Æquatione Temporis, I have no perfect copy of it, ſo I 'cannot ſend one, but ſhall, if you have not already, 'inform them of my obſervations of the laſt viſible 'ſolar eclipſe, and the lunar tranſit, and ſome admonitions of future appearances.'

In his letter dated at Derby November the eighth, 1671, he writes thus: 'I have now ſomewhat extraordinary to furniſh your correſpondencies, and ſhall 'have every day more and more. Laſt October I 'obſerved with my fourteen foot tube, and the Townleian micrometer, the underwritten diſtances of the 'Pleiades, which I have compared with thoſe I find 'in Mr Gaſcoigne's papers, and thoſe of Mutus in 'Ricciolus.' Here Mr Flamſteed incloſes a ſcheme of the Pleiades.

In his letter dated at Derby January the thirty-firſt, 1671-2, he writes thus: 'I have ſeen the December 'Tranſaction, in which Mr Oldenburgh has tranſcribed ſome lines from my letters concerning the appearance of Saturn, which I am glad to find agree ſo 'well with the like of the French Aſtronomers. You 'may farther intimate, that I viewed the ſame planet 'on New-year's day at night, with my long tube and 'more convex eye-glaſs. But neither myſelf, nor a 'young man with me, could diſcern any anſes, altho' 'the appearance was ſufficiently clear. I have ſeveral 'times meaſured the ſun's ſemidiameter, which none 'of my obſervations allow leſs in Perigæo than 16′. '24″ or 25″. I think I communicated to you ſome 'meaſures of his diameters when he appeared elliptical, ingenious Gentlemen, whom our author at that time had never ſeen, adviſed him to take

'tical, if I have not I ſhall when you pleaſe to command them, for I owe and eſteem a good part of my endeavours a debt to you. I am now excerping ſome obſervations from Mr Gaſcoigne's and Crabtree's reciprocal letters, in which I find exact obſervations of the moon's eclipſe, December the tenth, 1638, and the ſun's May the twenty-ſecond 1639, this by Mr Gaſcoigne, that by Crabtree; which if they were not in Mr Horrox's papers, and Mr Townley would permit, might do well if they were added to them, of which I deſire to hear how many are printed by the next. —— If Mr Jonas Moore gives any attendance on the Heavens, I ſhall early enough let him know of ſome obſervable appearances, not publiſhed nor certified in the Tranſactions, with ſome obſervations made by the micrometer he gave me, and therefore a due debt to him. I have read De Mouton de Æquatione Temporis, &c. whoſe notes upon the equations of others might eaſily be redargued, but that I would ſpare your correſpondents, of whom if any now will agree to obſerve the diameters of the planets, the ſun and moon eſpecially, with the ſatellite appearances of Jupiter, I ſhall not fail as the weather and my diſtempers permit to do my endeavour to make reſpondent obſervations. All the times I have viewed the ſun I could never ſee any macula upon him, but his whole diſk perfectly clear. —— I had ſent you a draught of my new micrometer, but that I lately ſent one to Mr Townley, whoſe ſentiments I expect concerning it, before I mind it ſhould travel further.'

In his letter dated at Derby February the tenth, 1671-2, he writes thus: 'I have wrote to you lately, ſo have not much to write at this time. —— The Heavens of late have not favoured me with any ſerenity, more than ſerved one night, viz. February the firſt, to obſerve the immerſion of the firſt ſatellite into the ſhade of Jupiter, and the application of the third to his limb, of which I gave Mr Oldenburgh an account in a late letter. I am now excerping ſome things from Mr Gaſcoigne's letters to Mr Crabtree, and his anſwers, but find ſome ſchemes and papers wanting, of which Mr Crabtree could not be careleſs, but they are ſuppoſed to be fallen into Mr Jonas Moore's hands. Pray let him know what I am doing when you ſee him, they can be of no concern by themſelves, wherefore he may do well to put them into Mr Townley's hands, who owns the letters referring to them.' In this letter he likewiſe ſends the ſun's diameters on January the 5th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 15th, and 1ſt of February 1671-2.

In his letter dated at Derby February the twentieth, 1671-2, he writes as follows: 'Mr Halton is tranſlating Kinkhuyſen's Moone-wiſer into Engliſh that I may have a view of it, and at Mr Townley's requeſt I have lately wrote and ſent him the Hiſtory of Malting. I have begun that tract concerning the diſtances and diameters of all the planets, which I promiſed in my letter to Mr Oldenburgh, but ſhall go but very ſlowly forward, by reaſon that ſometimes my infirmities, oftener affairs, interrupt me. But this I have certainly learned from my obſervations, that the ſun's parallax is not above 10″, yea probably but 7″, and his diſtance, à terrâ, 26,000 ſemidiameters, which is a diſtance to which none ever durſt remove him yet, and thrice as far as I ſuppoſed him formerly in my Solar Tables.'

In his letter dated at Derby, April the firſt, 1672, he writes thus: 'The included paper contains the laſt obſervation of Jupiter's tranſit by a fixed ſtar, and another ſince made with my deductions therefrom. Theſe (being buſy at this time of the year) to ſave a labour of tranſcription I ſend through the hands of Mr Oldenburgh, that ſo you may have the peruſal of them. I hope you had my laſt, informing you that I have received Mr Horrox's papers, and ſatisfying you concerning the contents of my laſt letter. I have peruſed Horrox's Venus ſub ſole, and find he needs no comment ſave, in this he has taken the Sun's ſemidiameter leſs by 20″ or more than really it was, ſo that this calculation will need ſome little correction, which if you think fit, I ſhall give them by way of comment. He has aſſumed the diameters of the fixed ſtars too large, which Hevelius has only well corrected, and his diameters of the Planets are much amiſs. But not having obſerved them all myſelf as I intend, if God afford me opportunity, I ſhall not meddle with them, yet only to you I may ſay, that thoſe ſettled in Hevelius, except in Venus and Mercury, are as erroneous as thoſe of Mr Horrox. Hevelius is much miſtaken in the parallactical angle in his Venus ſub ſole, but it is ſo eaſily proved that I cannot think, but if ever he again reads over that piece and his notes, he could not but ſee his miſtake. I find by my frequent obſervations, that the remoteſt ſatellite of Jupiter goes not twenty three ſemidiameters only from him, as Caſſini has it, but rather 24 ½ or ¾ as Mr Townley gave it me in a looſe note, and this you may prove by an obſervation, March the 19th, amongſt the reſt if you have it, I think thoſe obſervations the exacteſt that ever were had of this Planet, and if we had but a few more ſuch in ſeveral places of his orbit, I ſhould not doubt but to reſtore his motions more accurately than we have yet done, or perhaps can expect. I cannot think the ſatellites of Jove ſubject to any great inequalities in their motions, ſince I find their diſtances from Jupiter on each ſide him, equal in their greateſt elongations. If I had but the opportunity of obſerving one tranſit of Mars in his achronical appearance from a fixed ſtar, I ſhould not doubt but to derive the Sun's parallax and diſtance, à terrâ as well if not better therefrom, than from any obſervations as yet we poſſeſs. This I expect and have forecaſted for, but by an accident the courſe of my obſervations are, and will be, a little interrupted; for being laſt Thurſday night preparing to obſerve the diameter of Jupiter, I took my object glaſs of my long tube to ſmear it, as I had often done before at my candle. As I was holding it over the light it gave a crack, and a little piece ſplintered from it in the middle, and the glaſs cleft clear through. I durſt not remove it out of the box, becauſe I was afraid I could not ſo well make it cloſe again. I keep it by me, but dare not adventure to make any obſervations by it, tho' I have viewed the Moon with it, and find it does not perform much worſe if any than it did.'

In his letter dated at Derby, April the 17th 1672, he writes as follows. 'I have your's of the twelfth inſtant, whereby you intimate your deſire to have me ſay ſomething farther concerning the Lunar Theory of Mr Horrox, for the ſatisfaction of Dr Wallis. I am content, and therefore ſhall e'er long ſend you the whole calculation of the Moon's place at her laſt tranſit over the Pleiades, after his method, with my further thoughts upon it. I am very deſirous to be framing Lunar numbers but want obſervations of her apogæon diameters, which the inconveniency of my dwelling permits me not to make, becauſe the apogæon Moon in Sagittarius goes ſo very low this year; and further the refractions in her low meridional heights, would greatly diminiſh her vertical diameters, which upon continual experience I find can only be taken to the requiſite exactneſs, ſo that I fear I muſt wait till the year 1674, or 1675, e'er I can well obſerve them. I cannot but much approve of the form of Mr Horrox's Theory, and having conſidered it ſeveral times, I find that we might almoſt as eaſily compute her place in her orb as the elliptical place of any other Planet, if tables were fixed to his method, which therefore for facility of calculation, I intend to propoſe to myſelf to correct when I ſhall gain ſo much leiſure, and I hope this ſummer may afford it me.... The Heavens never ſince I broke my glaſs afforded me any opportunity for obſervation till yeſterday, when at noon having covered the broken part of my glaſs with the bigger piece, I took the Sun's diameter 5325=31—58 which ſtill conſpires for the exactly biſected excentricity, and the perigæon ½ diameter 16′ 25″. In this letter there are ſome remarks upon Mr Newton's letter concerning colours.'

In his letter dated May 6th, 1672, he writes thus: 'I have received two letters from you conveying the moſt current news for which I am bound to give take a journey to London, that he might be perſonally acquainted with them. He gladly

'you

' you hearty thanks.... I hope you have by this time ' received a letter from me by Mr Sargeant..... I ' intimated by that, I would ſend you the Lunar ta- ' bles by Monday next.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May the thirteenth following, he writes thus: ' With this you will re- ' ceive the promiſed Lunar tables, to which I have ' added an Epilogus directed to yourſelf. But my de- ' ſire of brevity, and not to meddle where Mr Hor- ' rox had done any thing himſelf, reſtrained my ' thoughts in that place. Here with your leave I ſhall ' enlarge. How the Apogee of the Moon is librated, ' Mr Horrox has ſhewn us very well, but why it ſhould ' be ſo librated, methinks, he ſhews no good reaſon. ' What he ſays of the Sun's attracting that end of the ' axis of the ſyſtem next him, is framed from Kep- ' ler's groundleſs notions.' Mr Flamſteed then pro- poſes his own ſolution, and afterwards proceeds thus. ' You have ſometimes deſired to know what I found ' amiſs in the Hevelian edition of Horrox's Venus ſub ' ſole, I am not willing to let all be known I have ' againſt that great man, but in his comments on that ' treatiſe the main cauſe of his error there is, that he ' hath miſtaken the parallactical angles calculated by ' Mr Horrox at

3—15	ſupputat	70—56	and uſed	46—34
3—35		68—53	inſtead of	48—37
3—45		67—55	them,	49—35

' Which were the Angles made by a line paſſing thro' ' the centers of the Sun and Venus with the Ecliptic, ' or that he hath uſed the $\angle\angle$ECV inſtead of ' $\angle\angle$NCL, whence having proceeded all thoſe ' faults and faulty corrections of Mr Horrox's works, ' which are found every where in the ſucceeding com- ments. He finds fault with Mr Horrox for having ' framed the Diameter of the Planets amiſs, whilſt his ' own, if well conſidered, tho' ſomething alike in pro- ' portion to each other, are not leſs erroneous in quan- ' tity. His greateſt Diameter of Jupiter is but 24″ ½ ' yet I find that Mr Gaſcoigne once obſerved it 51″ ' he ſays accurately. I have ſeen it above 46″ and ' Mr Townley no leſs, and that it is wholly ſo much ' the obſerved elongations of the ſatellites from Ju- piter's center, taken in minutes and ſeconds, com- ' pared with the eſtimated diameters do plainly evince. ' But Mr Horrox hath erred himſelf in the Sun's dia- meter which he ſtates only 31′—30″ which my ob- ſervations warrant 32′—42″ Hevelius has ſtated it ' 32′—30″. He has likewiſe in his comment on the ' ſixth chapter, p. 124. delivered the parallaxes of ' Longitude and Latitude in his own hypotheſis, ' which ſuppoſed the Sun's diſtance from the Earth, ' 5064 ſemidiameters of the Earth, and its horizon- tal parallax 41″. I know not what warrant he may ' have for this, ſince he ſays nothing of it in his works ' that I have ſeen, but I hope at this next achronical ' apparition of Mars, or at the latter end of Septem- ber next, to make thoſe obſervations of him which ' may ſhew his parallax, and by conſequence the Sun's, ' I hoped to have obſerved him this morning, but ' the ſkies are clouded, yet if they clear before Tueſ- day, I doubt not to gain another accurate obſerva- tion of him, and to meaſure his diameter, which ' yet I could never do conveniently. I have obſerved ' the return of Jupiter to the ſtar in Virgo, 9° 58″. ' If you deſire it I ſhall ſend you both it, and what ' I obſerve of Mars when I have heard from you.... ' Since I wrote this, I have received your's of the ' 13th inſtant. I have therefore paſted new radixes ' to the meridian of Derby, that ſo they may com- ply the better with the ſolar numbers. I have ſo ' paſted them, that if you turn them up you may find ' thoſe for London under: but if you approve the ra- dixes to Derby, that ſo they may comply the better ' with my ſolar numbers, the title may be written ' thus: Lunares numeri, ad novum Lunæ ſyſtema ex- ' cogitatum ab aſtronomo peritiſſimo Jeremia Horroxio; ' ad meridianum Derbiæ, notiſſimi coritanorum oppidi ' in ipſo ferè totius Angliæ umbilico ſiti, accommodati ' ab J. F.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May 20th, 1672, he writes thus: ' I have lately obſerved the diſtance of ' Mars from a fixed ſtar very accurately. Laſt week ' I made equations for Mr Horrox's greateſt excen- ' tricity of the moon: for the leaſt, I have them made ' ready to my hands. This week I will more accu- ' rately calculate the equations of the apogæon and ' excentricities, and reduce the mean motions to cur- ' rent time. So that you may within a fortnight or ' three weeks at fartheſt, expect the Lunar tables from ' me, if God ſpare me health. I ſhall now have more ' time than formerly. I intend likewiſe to note the ' erroneous places in Hevelius's notes on the Venus ' ſub ſole, and ſend them as ſoon as I have finiſhed ' the new Lunar tables. My obſervation of Mars, I ' intend not to ſend you till I have made ſome more, ' which I expect about the middle of next month.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May 30th, 1672, he writes thus. ' I have this morning compleated my ' numbers for Horrox's theory, which I ſhall tran- ſcribe and ſend you, with ſome little account of the ' method of calculation as my leiſure and occaſions ' will permit. Theſe I hope to ſend you on Monday ' come ſevennight. I have late obſerved the return ' of Jupiter to the ſtar in Virgo 9°. 58″ but have ' not yet had time to commit it to my book, and cal- culate the times from the obſerved altitudes, but ' with the Lunar tables you may expect them.'

In his letter dated at Derby, June the 12th, 1672, he writes as follows. ' I had delivered my Lunar ta- bles after Mr Horrox's ſyſtem to our carrier laſt ' Monday, but that ſome employments caſt upon me ' ſince the death of my uncle put me ſo behind hand, ' that I have finiſhed but this morning. However, I ' hope, they will be no whit the later in your hands, ' for I ſhall procure one of our Attorneys to deliver ' them to you, either the end of this week, or the ' beginning of the next. I have wrote in Latin an ' epiſtle to you containing what I have altered in their ' form, and what I think concerning the equation of ' time and alteration, of the excentricity and the va- riation. I ſuppoſe you print Mr Crabtree's letter ' which contains this theory with Mr Horrox's works, ' for the theory contained in the letter of December ' the tenth 1638, as I find in ſome looſe papers, and ' the exerciſes is not that which Horrox reſolved up- on, and further in it the optical part of the equa- tion varies, not but only the focus of the mean mo- tion and the phyſical equation; ſo that the diſtance ' of the moon à terrâ, varies not above five ſemidia- meters of the earth, which in his later papers he ' ſays all eclipſes, require to alter above ſeven. You ' have done well therefore to omit that letter, but in ' the room of it, I ſuppoſe you will give Mr Crab- tree's which will lead to mine.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the tenth, 1672, he writes thus. ' Included I ſend you the catalogue I ' promiſed. I have choſen thoſe towns where celeſtial ' obſervations have been made, and where I have ' found none, I have ordered them by comparing their ' poſitions to one another in our maps, which yet I ' dare not truſt, for by celeſtial obſervations of the ' pole's height, and eclipſes made in ſeveral places at ' once compared together, I find they place Italy too ' near, and all the towns of Poland, Germany, and ' France over remote. The maps I uſed were Speed's ' where I wanted, but I find them not good.——— ' I would gladly make ſome further enquiry into the ' nature of light and colours, but want a priſm for ' experiments, which may have two faces of an equal ' breadth, the third not half ſo broad as either of ' them, that ſo the angle included by the broader ' faces may be leſs than 30 gr. It needs not be large ' ſo it be but clear glaſs and well wrought. If you ' can procure me ſuch an one, provide it me againſt ' the latter end of the next week.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the 23d, 1672, he writes thus. ' I have received Dr Wallis's letter to ' you of the 18th of this month, which finding me ' at an unuſual leiſure, I thought fit not to delay an ' anſwer that might give you ſatisfaction, tho' I hope ' you are ſatisfied already. The difference of the ' leaſt and greateſt extrencities in my tables, is as the ' Doctor makes it, 2323 $\surd^3$ qualium Radius 100000 ' $\surd^\circ$. That I wrote 22235 was a miſtake in the

'first transcript of my number, and ought to be made 'every where 2323 $\sqrt{5}$ for that I have used in all 'my calculations, and the table of equations is framed 'upon that difference else the greatest distance could 'not be 7°—40′ as I have calculated it. The other 'faults of my copy pray correct after the Doctor's in-'timations. You need alter nothing in the example 'of the calculation, for the fault exceeds not one se-'cond, which since we cannot observe with such ex-'actness, I willingly yield in any calculation, and few 'expect that severity. I mention in my Epilogus the 'letter in which you have an account of Mr Horrox's 'theory, I mean that you sent me the copy of, the 'theory from which, if I remember, you wrote me 'word, that Dr Wallis had long since translated. 'This I suppose you intend to print, and it is neces-'sary to be placed before my tables, and supposing 'that you intend it, I have said nothing of any thing 'contained in that letter, but only of such things as 'Horrox has said nothing of.———I have lately pro-'cured some lough water (so the miners call it) for 'one Webster the author of the Metallographia. It 'is found in the midst of a firm stone in the lead 'mine. This I have is very transparent, but looks a 'little whitish and smells of sulphur. I am promised 'some stones which being made of water, that con-'geals as it drops, are yet all of them hollow in the 'middle. These are rarities seldom met with or 'heard of.'

In his letter dated at Derby, August the fifth, 1672, he writes thus. 'Your last I received on Wednesday, 'and having then a letter new written to Mr Town-'ley, I sent the included papers of your's to him ac-'cording to your desire. When he returns them, I 'shall impart them to Mr Halton, to whom I be-'lieve they will be as welcome as to myself.——— 'But the business of this letter is to let you know, 'that you mistook my meaning concerning the letter 'I mentioned in my Epilogus, which was not that of 'December the twentieth, 1638, but one of Crab-'tree's to Mr Gascoigne, dated Junii 21 1642, in 'which he describes Mr Horrox's system upon the 'author's second thoughts, which he might find in his 'exercises, and his calculations on some loose papers. 'This differs much from that in the December Epi-'stle, for, 1. In that he makes the greatest equation 'of the apogæon less than in his later papers. 2. The 'greatest physical equation 5° 10′, the greatest optical '2° 30′, whereas afterwards he made either of them '3° 50′ equal to each other. 3. In that epistle he 'directs to take $\frac{5}{6}$ of the Tychonic variation, but on 'after-thoughts he assumes $\frac{9}{10}$. Lastly, that calcula-'tion is compiled by aid of Lansberg's and Kepler's 'tables, which in this epistle is done more artificially 'by Trigonometry. Add, that he directs no correc-'tion of the mean motions, which yet I find in his 'Exercises and in Crabtree's letter. These considered, 'the difference betwixt this first system of Mr Horrox 'in the letter of December the 20th 1638, and that 'collected from his later papers by Mr Crabtree is so 'wide, that I believe you would not think fit to be 'placed before tables from which they differ so much. 'I have therefore translated so much from that epistle 'of Crabtree, as contains the system and trigonome-'trical method of calculation, which you may cause 'to be printed before the tables, which are framed 'from them and agree punctually with them.'

In his letter dated at Derby, August the thirteenth, 1672, he writes thus. 'I have your's of the tenth in-'stant.———I am glad you are satisfied of Horrox's 'system by the letter I sent you. The precepts I 'found translated by the ingenious Mr Shakerley, 'which I transcribed from him, because I thought 'them clearer expressed than the English ones in 'Crabtree's letter, tho' they are in substance the very 'same. I remember not that he bids any where dou-'ble the co-sine of an arch, or that he uses natural 'numbers at all. I doubt you mistake, and that the 'third precept may have caused the error. It is 'Duplicetur argumentum annuum & duplicati co-sinui; 'and the last two words I fear you read to the dou-'bled co-sine, by which nothing can be understood, 'but to the co-sine of that argument doubled, which 'is clear another sense and sound enough. For his 'method of calculating the Prosthapheiresis of the orb, 'it is so framed as that it may include that little arch 'which Street applies at the focus of mean motion 'and calls the variation; otherwise, the difference be-'twixt Anomalia media, and Anomalia excentri dou-'bled, as Crabtree finds it, will give Bishop Ward's 'elliptic equation or Street's without that variation. As 'for that inequality in the moon's motion which Hor-'rox calls the variation, and in his letter of Decem-'ber the 20th, confesses he knew not how to apply, 'and Crabtree alike in that of June the 21st, 1642. 'I esteem it purely physical, and have not forgotten 'to say something of it in the Epilogus to the tables, 'as you will find if you peruse it again. Nor can 'Horrox be thought to have judged it otherwise on 'his after-thoughts, since he makes no use of it in 'computing the moon's distance from the earth, which 'if it were not only physical it must necessarily vary. 'I thought Crabtree's precepts sufficiently clear for 'calculation. If they shall not be so to some, our ta-'bular method and direction will explain them and 'render them easy, though we need not fear that any 'will give themselves the trouble to calculate by them 'trigonometrically, when the tabular calculation is so 'easy, accurate, and expeditious. I think it is not any 'ways evident from Crabtree's letter, that his friend 'Mr Horrox died not the third of January 1640, ex-'cept I have amiss translated something. Pray peruse 'it again and let me know, for besides the note on 'the back of the letters, I find that in a letter of 'Crabtree's to Gascoigne, dated March the 18th '1640-1, he much laments the death of Horrox. Mr 'Gascoigne was slain in our wars, I believe in the 'year 1642, for I find no letters either of his or Crab-'tree's to him, after that of Junii 21, 1642, if I 'have not miswritten. Crabtree lived much longer, 'I believe till 1652, if his neighbour Mr Wroe in-'formed me truly. I shall write to morrow to Mr 'Townley, and will make one part of my desires to 'be ascertained of the time of his death.' In the post-script he writes thus, 'when I came to compare Hor-'rox's own system in the letter of December the 20th, '1638, with his in Crabtree's letter, June the 21st, '1642, I found that Crabtree had demonstrated it in 'Horrox's own words, from that letter in December '1638, I mean the libration of the apogæon, concern-'ing which what I have written to you formerly, I 'intended once to have composed into the Epilogus, 'but upon second thoughts, judged it better to take 'your opinion of it. I consent that you should in-'sert it, since I perceive you esteem of it not amiss, 'and I doubt not but hereafter to have something 'that may further illustrate and confirm it, if occasion 'be given.'

In his letter dated at Derby, May the 5th, 1673, he writes as follows. 'I received the sheet omitted in 'Mr Horrox's book, without which I think it may 'do as well as with it; for the corrections in Crab-'tree's letter I find by Mr Horrox's exercises are the 'very same, he intended, only by this addition we 'shall see the progress of Horrox's endeavours, and 'how he framed that in the rough which he after 'mended, but left to his successors to polish and per-'fect. I have spent my spare hours of late in cor-'recting Kepler's numbers in the planet Mars, so as 'they may represent my observations which I think 'they will do very accurately, I mean those of Sep-'tember last, which I made for finding his parallax 'and the sun's. To make them fit all others is im-'possible, by reason that the places of the fixed stars 'are erroneously sometimes stated by Tycho. But if 'we should once be so happy as to have them restored 'by telescope observations on large instruments as 'Tycho's, I should not doubt in a short time to frame 'numbers that should represent all the celestial ap-'pearances at least of one age, and perhaps, the next 'very exactly. What I have done, I think will fit all 'observations as well as any, but my great desire is 'to have them represent my own well, which being 'made with larger and more accurate instruments than 'were ever used before Mr Townley's time, must 'needs be more exact than any before his. I hoped

him to Mr Jonas Moore, who preſented him with Mr Townley's micrometer, and undertook to procure him glaſſes for a teleſcope at a moderate rate. At Cambridge he viſited Dr Iſaac Barrow, and Mr Iſaac Newton, and Dr Wroe, then Fellow of Jeſus-college there, with whom he correſponded frequently for the four following years. He alſo entered himſelf a Student of Jeſus-college. In the Spring of the year 1672 he excerpted ſeveral obſervations from Mr Gaſcoigne's and Mr Crabtree's letters, which had not been made publick, and which he tranſlated into Latin. He finiſhed the tranſcript of Mr Gaſcoigne's papers May 12, 1672. Amongſt that Gentleman's letters he found ſome, in which Mr Gaſcoigne ſhewed how the images of remote objects were formed in the diſtinct baſe of a convex object glaſs. From theſe our author got his Dioptrics in a few hours, having read Des Cartes's Dioptrics before, but learned little from them, becauſe Des Cartes diſcourſes not of this ſubject, his main buſineſs being to ſhew, how, by elliptical or hyperbolar glaſſes, all the rays of light which fall on the object parallel to the axis, may be collected into one point of the image in the diſtinct baſe, ſuppoſing all the rays of light of the ſame ſpecies, and liable to the ſame law of refraction, which yet Mr Iſaac Newton has demonſtrated they were not, by many experiments publiſhed in this year's Philoſophical Tranſactions. 'And this, ſays our author, is the only thing that 'I can perceive, for which Des Cartes's Dioptrics have been ſo celebrated.' The ſpare hours of the remaining part of the year 1672, were employed in his obſervations as the weather

'to have had many accurate obſervations this ſpring 'of all the planets, but the clouded Heavens have 'almoſt conſtantly deprived me of my foreſeen opportunities in all but Jupiter, of whom what I have 'obſerved Mr Oldenburgh can now inform you.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the 7th, 1673, he writes thus. 'I wrote to you about a week agone. '——— I might have informed you in my laſt, that 'after I had diſcovered the ſun's diſtance in September laſt, to be near 21000 ſemidiameters, I place 'it juſt ſo much in perigæo, then will his parallax be 'juſt 9″ 82, which is preciſe the hundredth part of 'the ſun's ſemidiameter there i. e. 16′ 22″; ſo that 'I find the earth is but the millioneth part of the ſun. 'This cauſed me to think of putting it in a problem, 'which I did to puzzle ſome boaſting pretenders to 'ſkill. Thus the ſun's diſtance from the earth is '21000 of the earth's ſemidiameters, whoſe body is 'but the $\frac{1}{1000000}$ part of the ſun. Quere, What is 'the ſun's diameter.'

In his letter dated at Derby, July the twenty ſixth, 1673, he writes thus. 'Thurſday laſt I received a 'letter from Mr Gregory about the Scotch obſervatory and inſtruments. I had written a good way of 'an anſwer, but when I came to deſcribe my new 'micrometer, I find my papers in which I had deſcribed it removed. I have not time to ſearch for 'it at preſent, and am on Monday next to go ſome 'thirty miles from home, but ſhall return within three 'days, God willing. After, I ſhall ſearch for my 'papers, and return him an anſwer in the mean time. 'Yeſterday I wrote to Mr Townley to ſend you his 'advice, and think it convenient you would viſit Sir 'Jonas Moore, who has one of Mr Townley's micrometers, which Mr Gregory may there ſee fitted 'to the tube better, if I miſtake not, than by Mr 'Hook's.'

In his letter dated at Derby, Auguſt the twentieth, 1673, he writes thus. 'If Vlac's canon would be had 'for a crown or a noble, I ſhould be glad of it, but 'I cannot go beyond that rate, for my father takes 'notice of my expences, and I am at the outſide of 'my allowance. I have more than half finiſhed my 'Hecker, for ſo I call my Ephemeris, and after the 'next week hope to get time to conclude him, ſo 'that you may have him before Michaelmas. My 'ſervice to Mr Gregory, if he be ſtill in the city. I 'ſhall be glad to know what inſtruments and books 'he takes into Scotland with him.'

In his letter dated at Derby September the twenty-ninth, 1673, he writes thus: 'This day I have received one from you, by which I underſtand you 'have found thoſe tables of Vlac's I deſired. —— 'I am very well pleaſed with the news of Hugenius's 'treatiſe being come over, but more to hear of Caſſini's book of refractions being expected. I am of 'his opinion that they ought to be continued to the 'zenith, becauſe the refractive air reaches ſome heighth 'above our heads. But from Tycho's obſervations, 'ſuch as I find in Ricciolus's Almageſt, and ſome late 'experiments of mine own, which I intend to repeat 'as ſoon as I can borrow a convenient room, I have 'good reaſon to think that he makes them too large 'a little in the horizon, and their decreaſe over ſlow, 'or themſelves much too big in altitudes above 'thirty degrees. I ſhall ſhortly write to Mr Townley 'to engage him to make ſome ſuch experiments as I 'have thought of, and perhaps if mine own ſucceed I 'ſhall in the mean time let you know the event of 'them. —— I wiſh I could have any ways aſſiſted 'Mr Sherburne's Catalogue (5) with particulars of 'Mr Gaſcoigne's Life, who I believe was the firſt that 'applied ſcrews to teleſcopes. He made with them 'ſeveral curious obſervations ab anno 1638 to 1642. 'Such as could be found in his letters I have digeſted 'into a ſmall book, with notes of my own to them 'where they were needful for my own uſe. But I 'fear we have loſt many more, and that paſt hopes of 'recovery.'

(5) Subjoined to his verſion of Manilius.

In his letter dated at Derby December the 27th, 1673, he writes thus: 'Your's informs me of the 'reaſons why my Ephemeris is not printed, with 'which I am very well ſatisfied. But if you have not 'already done it, I would not have you propoſe the 'printing it at the charges of the Royal Society, leſt 'they loſe by it, to whom I am ſo much already obliged for their reſpects, that I deſire not to be made 'their further debtor. As for Mr Gregory, after I 'wrote the letter to him with the deſcription of the 'micrometer in it, I never heard any thing from him, 'and therefore forbore to write, ſuppoſing he would, 'if deſirous to have any correſpondence with me, have 'given me an occaſion to continue it by ſome anſwer 'to mine. I deſire to know from you what inſtruments he took into Scotland. If he deſire any intercourſe of letters, if he pleaſe to give me a good 'occaſion, he ſhall ever find me ready to ſatisfy and 'comply with his deſires.'

There is another letter of his from Derby, but without any date, in which he writes thus: 'I intend 'to ſend you my Hecker, which I hope to finiſh either 'this day or to morrow. If that my father's affairs 'had not preſſed me extraordinarily, I had long ſince 'finiſhed it, but hope now will be ſoon enough. I 'find a table of the equation of natural days in Hugenius's piece ſeemingly much different from mine, 'from which it keeps a conſtant diſtance of about 'fourteen minutes of time, which that ingenious perſon has ſo contrived, that the equation may always 'be of the ſame ſpecies. I doubt not but that though 'it be ſeemingly different, I ſhall find it, on further 'examination, to agree exactly with ours, but not fit 'to be applied to aſtronomical calculations, or any 'experiments but thoſe about his watches; but of 'theſe more hereafter. In the mean time, when you 'find an opportunity to write to me again, I ſhall be 'glad to know what Mr Gregory has done in reference 'to the inſtruments he was about procuring, and what 'is the opinion about my alteration of Mr Townley's 'micrometer.'

weather permitted, and in preparing advertiſements of the appulſes of the moon and planets to the fixed ſtars, for the following year, which were printed by Mr Oldenburgh in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, and ſome obſervations of the planets which Mr Flamſteed imparted to him (d). In 1673 he wrote a ſmall tract in Engliſh, concerning the true diameters of all the planets, and their viſible diameters when at their neareſt diſtances from the earth, or their greateſt removes from it, which I lent, ſays he, to Mr Newton in 1685, who has made uſe of it in the fourth book of his Principia. By Mr Oldenburgh's means he exchanged ſome letters with Monſieur Caſſini. In 1673-4, beſides his uſual taſk, he wrote an Ephemeris, in which he ſhewed the falſity of Aſtrology, and the ignorance of thoſe who pretended to it, and gave a table of the moon's riſing and ſetting carefully calculated, together with the eclipſes and appulſes of the moon and planets to the fixed ſtars. This fell into the hands of Sir Jonas Moore, for whom, at his requeſt, Mr Flamſteed made a table of the moon's true ſouthings for that year, from which, and Mr Philips's Theory of the Tides, the high-waters being made, he found that they ſhewed the times of the turn of the tides very near, whereas the ordinary ſeamens coarſe rules would err ſometimes two or three hours (e). In the ſummer of the year 1674, our author paſſing through London in the way to Cambridge, Sir Jonas Moore informed him that a true account of the tides would be highly acceptable to his Majeſty, and offered the help of his ſervant to make the table, or any other work of the like nature. Upon this they reſolved to compoſe a ſmall Ephemeris for the King's uſe, which was in good part finiſhed before Midſummer, but not compleated till near Chriſtmas after, by reaſon of Mr Flamſteed's return to Derby about Michaelmas. Sir Jonas had heard him often diſcourſe of the weather-glaſs or Barometer, and the certainty of judging of the weather by it. Mr Townley having communicated to our author his obſervations and the rules deduced from them, Mr Flamſteed ſet up a barometer at Derby, where, for three years together before this, he had noted, thrice a day commonly, the height of the mercury in the barometer, and of a tinged ſpirit in the thermometer, and found, conſidering the different ſituation, that Mr Townley's remarks agreed very well with his, which were, That upon every ſinking of the mercury the air was more moved, and that either wind or rain followed, not the ſame day always, but one, two, three, or four days after, according to the time and height it had been ſtationary at. Something of this had been noted by Mr Boyle but not proſecuted, by reaſon that the daily watching it's motions and noting them, was thought perhaps a trouble which ſuch a trifling ſubject as the weather did not deſerve. But now, at Sir Jonas Moore's requeſt, Mr Flamſteed ſet up for him a pair of theſe glaſſes, and left him materials for making more. It had been long ſettled fair weather when Mr Flamſteed left London, ſoon after which the mercury in the glaſſes began to ſink, but no rain followed till the fourth or fifth day after. This made Sir Jonas eſteem the glaſſes and rules very much, of which informing the King and Duke of York, he was ordered to prepare them the next day, which he did, together with Mr Flamſteed's directions for judging of the weather from their riſing or falling. Sir Jonas had ſhewed the King and Duke our author's teleſcopes and micrometer before, and whenever he acquainted them with any thing which he had gathered from Mr Flamſteed's diſcourſe, he told them frankly from whom he had it, and recommended him to the Nobility and Gentlemen about the Court (f). Mr Flamſteed having taken his degree of Maſter of Arts at Cambridge, deſigned to enter into Orders, and to ſettle in a ſmall living near Derby, which was in the gift of a friend of his father's, and therefore went to Okeham in order to proceed to Peterborough at Chriſtmas, but it happened that there was no ordination there. In the mean time Sir Jonas Moore having been informed of his deſign, wrote to him to come to London, upon which he returned thither in the beginning of February 1674-5, and was entertained in the houſe of that Gentleman, who deſigned an employment for him, wherein Mr Flamſteed might have been aſſiſtant to his ſon, for whom Sir Jonas had procured the reverſion of his place, which, though in nothing like his father, he enjoyed for the few years he lived. But Sir Jonas finding Mr Flamſteed perſiſt in his reſolution to take Orders, and that his ſon's temper was ſuch as would make him as uneaſy as himſelf, he did not continue to diſſuade him from his intent. March the fourth following he brought Mr Flamſteed a warrant to be the King's Aſtronomer, with the ſalary of an hundred pounds per annum, payable out of the Office of Ordnance, to commence from the Michaelmas preceding (g). The Eaſter following our author was ordained at Ely houſe by Biſhop Gunning, who ever after converſed freely with him, and particularly upon the new Philpſophy and opinions, though that Prelate had always maintained the old. Auguſt the 10th, 1675, the foundation was laid of the Royal Obſervatory at Greenwich [E].

[E] Of the Royal Obſervatory at Greenwich] Between the time of Mr Flamſteed's coming up to London in February, and the Eaſter following, an accident happened which haſtened, if not occaſioned, the building of the Obſervatory. The Sieur de St Pierre, a Frenchman who had ſome ſmall ſkill in Aſtronomy, and made an intereſt with the Ducheſs of Portſmouth, propoſed no leſs than the diſcovery of the longitude, and procured a kind of commiſſion from King Charles the Second to the Lord Brouncker, Dr Seth Ward Biſhop of Sarum, Dr Chriſtopher Wren, Sir Charles Scarborough, Sir Jonas Moore, Col. Titus, Dr Pell, Sir Robert Murray, Mr Hook, and ſome other ingenious perſons about the town and Court, to receive his propoſals, with power to elect and receive into their numbers any other ſkilful perſons, and to give the King

While it was building Mr Flamſteed reſided at the place laſt mentioned, his quadrant and teleſcopes being kept in the Queen's houſe; there he obſerved with them the appulſes of the moon and planets to the fixed ſtars. In 1681 his DOCTRINE OF THE SPHERE [F] was

King an account of them, with their opinion. Sir Jonas Moore carried Mr Flamſteed to one of their meetings, where he was choſen into their number. The Frenchman's propoſals were then read, which were, I. To have the year and day of the obſervations. II. The height of two ſtars, and on which ſide of the meridian they appeared. III. The height of the moon's two limbs. IV. The height of the pole. All of them to degrees and minutes. It was eaſy to perceive from theſe demands, that the Sieur de St Pierre knew not that the beſt Lunar Tables differed from the heavens, and that therefore his demands were not ſufficient for determining the longitude of the place where ſuch obſervations were or ſhould be made, from that to which the Lunar Tables were fitted. This Mr Flamſteed immediately repreſented to the company. But they, conſidering the intereſt of his patroneſs at Court, deſired to have the Sieur de St Pierre furniſhed according to his demands. Mr Flamſteed undertook it, and having gained the moon's true place by obſervations made at Derby, Feb. 23, 1672, and November 12, 1673, gave him obſervations ſuch as he demanded. The Sieur de St Pierre did not think that they could have been given him, but anſwered that they were feigned. Mr Flamſteed delivered them to Dr Pell Feb. 19, 1674-5, who returning him his anſwer ſome time after, Mr Flamſteed wrote a letter in Engliſh to the Commiſſioners, and another in Latin to the Sieur de St Pierre, to aſſure him that they were not feigned, and to ſhew that if they had been ſo, yet if we had Aſtronomical Tables which would give us the true places of the fixed ſtars, and moon's true places, both in longitude and latitude nearer than to half a minute, we might hope to find the longitude of places by lunar obſervations, but not by ſuch as he demanded; but that we were ſo far from having the places of the fixed ſtars true, that the Tychonic Catalogues often erred ten minutes or more; that they were uncertain to three or four minutes, by reaſon that Tycho affirmed a faulty obliquity of the ecliptic, and had employed only plain ſights in his obſervations; that the beſt Lunar Tables differed $\frac{1}{4}$ if not $\frac{1}{3}$ of a degree from the Heavens; and, laſtly, that he might have learned better methods than he propoſed from his countryman Morinus, whom it was proper to conſult before he made any more demands of this nature. Mr Flamſteed heard no more of the Sieur de St Pierre after this, but was informed that his letters being ſhewn King Charles the Second, he was ſtartled at the aſſertion of the places of the fixed ſtars being falſe in the Catalogues, and ſaid with ſome vehemence, That he muſt have them anew obſerved, examined, and corrected, for the uſe of his ſeamen. And further, when it was urged to him how neceſſary it was to have a good ſtock of obſervations taken for correcting the motions of the moon and planets, with the ſame earneſtneſs he declared, That he muſt have it done; and being aſked, Who could or ſhould do it? replied, The perſon that informs you of them. Upon this Mr Flamſteed was appointed, with the allowance abovementioned, and aſſurances, at the ſame time, of ſuch further additions as ſhould be found requiſite for carrying on the work. The next point to be thought of, was a place to fix in. Several were propoſed, as Hyde Park and Chelſea College. Mr Flamſteed went to view the ruins of the latter, and judged it might ſerve the purpoſe, and the better becauſe it was near the Court. Sir Jonas Moore enclined to Hyde Park; but Dr Chriſtopher Wren mentioning Greenwich, it was reſolved on. The King allowed five hundred pounds in money, with bricks from Tilbury Fort, where there was a ſpare ſtock, and ſome wood, iron, and lead, from a gatehouſe demoliſhed in the Tower, and promiſed to grant what more ſhould be neceſſary.

[F] His Doctrine of the Sphere.] In the preface he obſerves, that, in this treatiſe, he has ſhewn how all the diurnal appearances of the ſun and ſtars are naturally made, and how, laying aſide all thoſe old projections of the ſphere which falſly ſuppoſe the earth's ſtability, they may be repreſented, and the problems concerning them anſwered, by new ones grounded on that true ſyſtem of the world, which ſuppoſes the annual and diurnal motions of the earth, propoſed at firſt by Pythagoras, aſſerted by Copernicus, demonſtrated by Kepler, and, as moſt agreeable to reaſon and experience, approved and entertained by the ableſt Aſtronomers of our times. He tells us, that, in the ſecond part, he has taught how to find within what ſpace of the earth the ſolar eclipſe is viſible, and where the principal phaſes appear by calculation, as alſo how all the requiſites of the ſame eclipſe may be found for any given place, without the calculation of parallaxes; which uſeful invention, ſays he, having never appeared in publick before, I find myſelf obliged to give the following account of it's original, that I may not hereafter be accuſed of injuſtice to two of my ſingular good friends, the admirably ingenious Sir Chriſtopher Wren, Maſter Surveyor of his Majeſty's buildings, and our ſouthern Tycho, Mr Edmund Halley. It was in the winter of the year 1676, that Mr Flamſteed lighted upon this method. The autumn before ſome ſpots had appeared in the ſun, and then he was obſerving a compact one that made more than two entire revolutions before it was wholly extinct. Examining his obſervations to find the reaſon of their different appearances, he collected from them that the ſpots adhered to the ſuperficies, and that they were carried round his centre once in twenty-five days and a quarter, the northern half of that axis on which this revolution was performed being inclined about eight degrees to the plane of the ecliptic, between the twelfth and eighteenth degrees of Virgo, which being concluded, he found that allowing what alterations muſt neceſſarily happen in their appearances by reaſon of the earth's diurnal progreſs in her orbit, all his obſervations would be repreſented as nearly as he could expect. And now having ſeen how the poles, axis, equator, and parallels in the ſun, altered their appearances to the eye placed on the earth, according as ſhe changed her place in her orbit, and 'being ill of the ſtone, that he might have ſome-'thing to think of beſides his pains,' he ſet himſelf to conſider how the axis of the earth, and the ſeveral paths and parallels imagined on it, would appear from the ſun, and how the diurnal phænomena would be repreſented by an orthographical projection of our globe on a plane, ſtanding at right angles to the ecliptic, and the line connecting the centers of the ſun and earth. Here he found what he has delivered in the firſt ſection of his treatiſe of the Doctrine of the Sphere, viz. how the parallaxes of altitude, longitude, and latitude, were made and given by conſtruction; and upon a little farther conſideration, how the times of any appearance of a ſolar eclipſe, the part then darkened, with the inclination of the cuſps, might be determined without any calculation of them, by the help of projection. Much pleaſed with this diſcovery, he immediately conſtructed an eclipſe which he had obſerved at Derby, October 25, 1668, and, with a brief deſcription of the method, tranſmitted it to his kind friend and patron Sir Jonas Moore, by whom it was communicated to the Royal Society at one of their meetings. It happened that Sir Chriſtopher Wren was there preſent, who having viewed the figure only, told Sir Jonas, that himſelf had known the ſame method ſixteen years before, and, to aſſure him of it, ſent him ſoon after a like projection neatly drawn on paſtboard, and fitted with ſeveral ingenious contrivances of numbers and ſcales, for the conſtruction of ſolar eclipſes in our latitude. This Sir Jonas brought to Mr Flamſteed, then labouring under ſome diſtempers, to Greenwich, whereby the latter was ſatisfied, that the honour of the firſt diſcovery of this uſeful invention was abſolutely due to Sir Chriſtopher Wren, whom, of all mortals, he believed to have been the firſt who knew how to find the times of the beginning, middle, digits then darkened, inclination of the cuſps at any phaſis, and end of a ſolar eclipſe, without the calculation of parallaxes. In ſome diſcourſe which our author had with Mr Halley, before he went to obſerve the ſouthern conſtellations at St Helena, the latter mentioned the conſtruction of eclipſes (6) as poſſible, but, out of a tender affection, ſays Mr Flamſteed, to his own inventions, was publiſhed in a poſthumous work of Sir Jonas Moore (h). We may expect a new and accurate edition of this treatiſe of Mr Flamſteed, with a great many alterations and additions by him, from the very ingenious Mr James Hodgſon, F. R. S. About the year 1684 he was preſented to the living of Burſtow near Blechingley in Surry (i), which he enjoyed during his life. It appears from hence that he was but very moderately provided for, and yet it ſeems to have contented him, for notwithſtanding he had a warm and aſpiring mind, yet this diſcovered itſelf only in the purſuit of knowledge, which, like all other violent paſſions, occupied him in a manner entirely, and, by withdrawing his thoughts from ordinary conſiderations, enabled him to give the publick ſo many, and thoſe ſuch inconteſtible, marks of true genius. As theſe raiſed him to the notice of the world, and recommended him to the royal favour and protection; ſo they likewiſe procured him the friendſhip and confidence of ſome of the greateſt perſons in point of ſcience this nation could boaſt, ſuch as the incomparable Sir Iſaac Newton, who correſponded with him from 1680 to 1699; Dr Edmund Halley, William Molyneux of Dublin, Eſq; (k), Dr John Wallis, and ſeveral others; and of the celebrated M. Caſſini, for which indeed he was fitted by nature, as being himſelf very communicative, and bleſſed with ſo much candour and juſtice, that none of his correſpondents ran the leaſt hazard from their making him acquainted with their diſcoveries. He was alſo exceedingly ready to give any aſſiſtance in his power for facilitating the ſtudies of his friends, and took as much pleaſure in contributing to the reputation of others, as ſome do in leſſening the fame of their rivals that they may exalt their own. He ſhewed the ſame indefatigable aſſiduity in the proſecution of his labours for the improvement of Aſtronomy after this moderate proviſion was made for him—that he did before, the Philoſophical Tranſactions affording ſuch clear evidences of his activity and diligence, as well as of his penetration and exactneſs, as muſt fully ſatisfy any candid enquirer of the truth of this aſſertion [G]. He ſpent the latter, as he had

ventions, or for what other reaſon I know not, he was pleaſed to conceal his method both from me, who then thought it ſcarce poſſible, and for ought I can underſtand from all others. Nor is it to be wondered at, that three of us ſhould make this diſcovery ſeverally, and without any intimation of the method from each other. For to me it ſeems very unlikely, that any one who admits the motion of the earth, and apprehends how the moon paſſing between the ſun and it, eclipſes ſome part of him to all thoſe people who lie under its paſſage ſhould ever miſs of it. But we might rather admire, had I not intimated the reaſon of it in the fifth ſection of the ſecond part, that the acute wit of the ſagacious Kepler ſhould overlook it, when he had diſcovered the method of finding by calculation, within what ſpaces on our globe the ſolar eclipſe is bounded, and where the principal phaſes of it would appear. Mr Flamſteed then tells us, that he had almoſt finiſhed what he had here delivered concerning the conſtruction of eclipſes, when it was intimated to him by his ingenious friend Mr Perkins, that there was little extant in the Engliſh tongue concerning the general method of calculation abovementioned, and that therefore he might do well to explain it. He conſidered then, that this might be performed more eaſily than is taught by the firſt famous inventor, and without his nonageſimary table. Waving therefore his firſt intent, which was not to engage himſelf in any thing which had been expreſsly handled by others before him, he thought it neceſſary to undertake this further taſk, and accordingly wrote the precepts relating to that ſubject after, tho' for method's ſake they are inſerted before the conſtruction of the ſolar eclipſe. He obſerves likewiſe that in 1670, he firſt publiſhed predictions of the moon's appulſes to fixed ſtars, which he continued eight years after ſucceſſively, firſt in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, after in the royal Almanack, propoſing them as an uſeful and the moſt practicable expedient for finding the longitude or difference of meridians betwixt any two places, by reaſon both of their frequency, and that a ſingle perſon might obtain whatever is required in obſervations of them, with a ſmall apparatus of inſtruments. But the calculation of parallaxes required in their application cauſed them to be leſs regarded than he hoped they would have been. He has therefore ſhewn how this tedious labour may be avoided, and the occultation or emerſion of a ſtar from the moon, or time of its viſible conjunction with the center and diſtance, then from her next limb, may be found by conſtruction as the phaſes of a ſolar eclipſe, and the difference of meridians betwixt two diſtant places by obſervations of the ſame appulſe made at each. And now, ſays he, the main difficulty being removed, I would again recommend this method to the ſtudy and practice of the ingenious Aſtronomer and Navigator.

[G] Of the truth of this aſſertion.] We find before the cloſe of the year 1675, a large and accurate account of a lunar eclipſe, December the twenty firſt, obſerved by our author, and communicated by him to Sir Jonas Moore in a letter from Greenwich, December the 24th (7). This paper, written in Latin, being communicated to the famous Signior Caſſini, he ſent over alſo his obſervations, with ſome remarks upon thoſe of Mr Flamſteed; in which he pays very high complements to that gentleman, in reſpect as well to his diligence and accuracy, as to his great ſkill and learning (8). Upon this Mr Flamſteed wrote him a ſhort letter, in which are contained ſome very curious celeſtial obſervations. Our author publiſhed likewiſe a very copious and clear account of the eclipſe of the ſun, June the twenty third, 1676, to which he added alſo the account ſent him by Mr Townley and Mr Halton, in the ſucceeding months of July and Auguſt. Himſelf at Greenwich, and Dr Edmund Halley at Oxford, obſerved ſome ſpots in the ſun very carefully, and publiſhed both their obſervations (9). On the twenty firſt of Auguſt the ſame year he obſerved, and publiſhed, an occultation of the planet Mars by the Moon, for the benefit of ſuch as were deſirous of ſettling thereby the difference of meridians (10). May the 18th, 1677, he obſerved a comet very carefully, of which he gave an account by a letter to Mr Oldenburgh. Upon the interruption of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, he ſent a moſt accurate account of his obſervation of an eclipſe of the moon, Auguſt the eighteenth, 1681, at Greenwich to Dr Hook (11), to whom he likewiſe communicated ſome obſervations upon tides, the practical knowledge of which with any tolerable degree of accuracy we owe entirely to his labours, as appears from the following account annexed to his tide table for the year 1683 (12). ‘ Sir, ‘ conſidering how much the river of Thames is fre- ‘ quented by ſhipping, and how long it has been the ‘ chief place of commerce in theſe parts of the world, ‘ one would think our ſeamens accounts of its tides ‘ ſhould be very exact, and their opinions concerning ‘ them rational; whereas if they be enquired into, no- ‘ thing will be found more erroneous and idle.

‘ For they taking notice that the high waters at, and ‘ near, the new and full moons, run an hour and a half ‘ or two points of the compaſs longer than at the quar- ‘ ters, conclude generally that 'tis the inconſtancy of ‘ the winds that cauſes it, never conſidering how im- ‘ probable it is that ſo inconſtant and changeable a ‘ cauſe, ſhould effect ſo conſtant an inequality.

had done the former, part of his life, in promoting true and uſeful knowledge, by the conſtant exerciſe of his own great abilities, and by taking all poſſible methods to obtain whatever lights the endeavours of others might afford him. In the latter end of the month of December, 1719, he was ſeized with a ſtrangury, which brought him to his end on the laſt day of the ſame month and year (l). He left a widow behind him by whom he had no children. His Hiſtoria Cœleſtis Britannica was publiſhed at London in 1725, in three volumes folio, and dedicated to the King, by his widow Mrs Margaret Flamſteed and Mr James Hodgſon; great part of this work was printed off before his death, and the reſt compleated, except the Prolegomena prefixed to the third volume. In the Preface we are informed, that, in 1704, he having communicated by a friend an account of his collection of obſervations to the Royal Society, they were ſo highly pleaſed with it, that

' In which opinion the tide tables of our Almanacks ' have contributed much to confirm them, for therein ' the moon's age is got by the epacts, thence the time ' of her ſouthing by the allowance of forty eight mi- ' nutes of time for every day's age, as if her diurnal ' motions and returns to the meridian were altogether ' equable, than which nothing is more falſe; and then ' the time of the high water at London Bridge is ' made by adding three hours to the time of her ' ſouthing ſo got, as if there were the ſame conſtant ' ſpace of time betwixt the moon's ſouthing and the ' high waters, which by this means are often made ' two hours different from truth and experience.

' To amend this fault, ſome of the more ſkilful ' have calculated the times of the moon's ſouthings ' exactly, and then made their tide tables by adding ' three hours conſtantly to them, by which means tho' ' they agreed nearer with experience at the ſpring ' tides, or near the new and full moon, yet they erred ' not much leſs than by the old way of account they ' would have done at the quarters or in the neap ' tides, the inequality of the tides being above dou- ' ble to the error committed in finding the moon's ' ſouthings by her age.

' Mr Booker was the firſt that gave any directions ' for the amendment of this reckoning, and that was ' only to ſubſtract an hour from the times in his tide ' table about the firſt and laſt quarters of the moon, ' becauſe the neap tides did not flow ſo long as the ' ſprings by one point of the compaſs. But Mr Henry ' Philips, a perſon well known by his works of navi- ' gation, was certainly the firſt that brought the ine- ' quality to a rule, whoſe theory of the tides, and a ' table grounded on it for the year 1668, was printed ' in Mr Oldenburgh's Philoſophical Tranſactions for ' the month of April that year, numb. 34. which was ' found much more conformable to experience than ' was expected.

' Having frequent occaſion to paſs betwixt London ' and Greenwich by water ſome two years agone, I ' took notice that the tides ſeldom held out ſo long ' as Mr Philips's calculation gave them; and therefore ' in the months of October and November, I began ' to obſerve them more diligently, and procured them ' to be carefully noted by an ingenious friend at ' Tower wharf. From theſe obſervations I raiſed a ' correction of Mr Philips's numbers, and cauſed a ' tide table to be made agreeable to it, which was ' printed by Mr Hook in his Philoſophical Collections ' numb. 4.

' But the weather then proving ſtormy and unſea- ' ſonable, I durſt not rely on thoſe obſervations nor ' that correction, and therefore in the ſpring and ſum- ' mer months following of the year 1682, I ſet to ' obſerve them again; and with the help of my friends ' and ſervants, I noted the times of above eighty ' high waters at Tower-wharf and Greenwich, where- ' by I found that the greateſt and leaſt differences be- ' twixt the moon's true ſouthing and the high waters, ' were not as Mr Philips had placed them at the full ' or new and quarter moons, but the greateſt nearer ' to the neaps, the leaſt to the higheſt ſpring tides. I ' found alſo that the inequality was not the ſame that ' he had made of it, and after a trial or two, that I ' could repreſent and anſwer above ſix hundred of ' theſe obſervations, with leſs than one quarter of an ' hour's difference, which, conſidering how difficult it ' is to determine the time of an high water exactly, ' I cannot but eſteem a very good agreement.

' Hitherto, our tide tables have only ſhewed the ' time of that one high water which next follows the ' moon's ſouthing, but in this new table I have given ' the times of both; concerning which I deſire it may ' be noted, that when by reaſon of great droughts ' in ſummer, or extreme froſts in winter, the ſprings ' are low, and the freſh waters leſs than uſual, the ' tides may hold up longer than the times noted in ' the table; as alſo when ſtrong north-weſterly or ' northerly winds blow, which bring in an extraordi- ' nary flood from the northern ſeas and keep it up ' longer than other times.

' So, on the contrary, when the winds blow hard ' on the oppoſite points of the compaſs, or when we ' have much rain and great freſhes, the tides hold out ' not ſo long as the times ſhewed in the table, the ' freſhes over-powering and checking them ſooner. ' Yet have I never found that the differences betwixt ' the calculated and obſerved high waters have much ' exceeded half an hour; moſt commonly they are ' ſcarce half ſo much.

' This table may be reduced, and made to ſerve ' for any other port of his Majeſty's dominions or ' neighbouring countries, by only ſubſtracting or ad- ' ding ſo much time to the high water noted in it, as ' the high water obſerved in the ſaid place, ſhall be ' found to precede or follow the time of the high ' water the ſame day herein noted. For by ſuch ac- ' counts as I have met with and received of the tides ' in remote places, I find there is every where about ' England the ſame difference betwixt the ſpring and ' neap tides, that is here obſerved in the river of ' Thames.

' I could eaſily have made and given you a table ' for this reduction, if I durſt have relied on the ac- ' count our mariners give of the tides in other ports; ' but I find their opinions different, except where they ' have copied from one another in their Kalendars, ' by reaſon of the aforementioned difference betwixt ' the times of the moon's ſouthings and the true high ' waters, for which reaſon I forbear it till further ex- ' perience ſhall have informed us better.'

He continued to publiſh tables of the like nature, with continual improvements for many years together. We have choſen this familiar inſtance, that every reader might have it in his power to judge of the nature of Mr Flamſteed's enquiries, and of the value of his improvements. He took the ſame method in reſpect to things of a ſuperior nature, his diſcoveries end always at ſomething uſeful; and when he had once found errors in the common ſchemes of computation, he never left examining, ſearching, and comparing, till he found the ſource of the error, and was able to point out the ſureſt and ſpeedieſt way of inveſtigating the truth.

It would be tedious and trifling to give the heads of almoſt numberleſs papers, addreſſed by our author himſelf to the Secretaries of the Royal Society, or communicated to them by him from others. Let it ſuffice that through a long courſe of years Mr Flamſteed was never deficient in ſending his excellent remarks, which were of greater uſe in promoting the progreſs of that ſcience to which he applied, than the compaſs of a note will afford us by any means the power of deſcribing; ſo that the goodneſs of his royal maſter in erecting that poſt he ſo worthily filled, and his choice of ſo able, ſo indefatigable, and ſo communicative, a man to diſcharge it, were equally conſpicuous. How far he puſhed his enquiries, and to what a bulk his learned labours ſwelled by degrees, the reader will learn in the next note.

that they recommended the work to his Royal Highneſs Prince George of Denmark, who ordered Francis Roberts, Eſq; Sir Chriſtopher Wren, Sir Iſaac Newton, Dr David Gregory, and Dr John Arbuthnot, to inſpect Mr Flamſteed's papers, and accordingly a report was made in their favour. Upon this, ninety-ſeven ſheets were printed at the Prince's expence before his death, after which the remainder was publiſhed at the charge of our author and his executors, and will prove a noble and laſting monument to his memory (m) [H]. [H] And will prove a noble and laſting monument to his memory.] The firſt volume contains the obſervations of Mr William Gaſcoigne, the firſt inventor of the way of meaſuring angles in a teleſcope by the help of ſcrews, and the firſt who applied teleſcopical ſights to aſtronomical inſtruments taken at Middleton near Leeds in Yorkſhire, betwixt the years 1638, and 1643, collected from his letters to Mr Crabtree, with ſome of Mr Crabtree's obſervations of the ſame year; as alſo obſervations of the ſun's and moon's diameters, configurations, and elongations of Jupiter's ſatellites from him, ſmall diſtances of fixed ſtars, with appulſes of the moon and planets to them, obſerved with a teleſcope and micrometer at Derby by Mr Flamſteed, betwixt the years 1670, and 1675, with the larger intermutual diſtances of fixed ſtars, and of the planets from them; eclipſes of the ſun, moon, and Jupiter's ſatellites, ſpots on the ſun, comets, and refractions, taken with a ſextant of near ſeven foot Radius, a voluble quadrant, and the abovementioned inſtruments, betwixt the years 1675 and 1689, at the Royal Obſervatory; ranked under proper heads; with the places of the Moon, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury, deduced from the obſervations; and alſo neceſſary tables to be uſed with them. The ſecond volume contains his obſervations made with a mural arch of near ſeven foot Radius, and 140 degrees, on the limb of the meridional zenith, diſtances of the fixed ſtars, ſun, moon, and other planets, with the time of their tranſits over the meridian; together with obſervations of the ſun's and moon's diameters, eclipſes of the ſun, moon, and Jupiter's ſatellites, variations of the compaſs, from 1689, to the end of the year 1719, &c. tables ſhewing how to render the calculation of the ſtars and planets places, from the obſervations, eaſy and expeditious; to which are added the places of the moon (at the oppoſitions, quadratures, and on her limits, &c.) and the places of Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury, derived from the abovementioned obſervations. The third volume contains a catalogue of the right aſcenſions, diſtances from the pole, longitudes and magnitudes, of near three thouſand fixed ſtars, with variations of their right aſcenſions and diſtances from the pole, whilſt they change their longitudes one degree, whereby the right aſcenſions and diſtances from the pole of the ſtars and planets being given, their longitudes and latitudes may be found by inſpection. To this volume is prefixed a very large preface, containing an account of all the aſtronomical obſervations made before his own time, with a deſcription of the inſtruments made uſe of, as alſo an account of his own obſervations and inſtruments, together with a new Latin verſion of Ptolomy's catalogue of 1026 fixed ſtars, from the Greek and Uleg-beigs places annexed on the Latin page, with the corrections, ſmall catalogues of the Arabs, Tycho Brahe's of about 780 fixed ſtars in a proper order, the Landgrave of Heſſe's of 386, Hevelius's of 1534, in a proper order; a catalogue of ſome of the ſouthern fixed ſtars not viſible in our hemiſphere, reduced to right aſcenſion, diſtance from the pole, longitude and latitude, with variations of right aſcenſions and diſtances from the pole, calculated from obſervations made by Dr Halley at St Helena, and Mr Flamſteed's ſtars places, and fitted to the year 1726.

[I] At the bottom of the page.] The merit of Mr Flamſteed, as an Aſtronomer, would be but very indifferently ſupported by producing general characters of him from hiſtorical or biographical writers, little known or diſtinguiſhed in the world for their ſkill in that ſcience: we will therefore preſent the reader with teſtimonies of another kind, that is, from ſuch as were themſelves eminent for their knowledge in Aſtronomy, who could not therefore be deceived, and who out of regard to their own reputation would never attempt to deceive others. Mr Stephen Gray in a letter of his dated from Canterbury, May the fifth 1701, deſcribing a very ingenious inſtrument invented by him for drawing a true meridian line by the pole ſtar (13), and alſo for finding the hour of the day or night by the ſame, has the following paſſage. 'That moſt learned, 'accurate, and judicious Aſtronomer, Mr John Flam-'ſteed, Mat. Reg. and F. R. S. has lately diſcovered 'that there is a parallaxis of the earth's annual orbit 'at the pole ſtar, of about forty or forty five ſeconds, 'whereby the diameter of the ſtar's parallel is greater 'in June than in December, by about 1 minute 2 ſe-'conds, which he has evinced from ſeven years ſuc-'ceſſive obſervations, whereby the earth's motion is 'indubitably demonſtrated, as appears from his learned 'letter to Dr Wallis on that ſubject. Now if on the 'edge of this index there be drawn a ſcale of degrees, 'minutes, and ſeconds, to the Radius of the glaſs, we 'ſhall not only have a very accurate inſtrument for 'the hour, but be furniſhed with one whereby we 'ſhall ſee the truth of the earth's motion confirmed 'by the acceſs and receſs of our ſtar, towards and 'from the pole, according to the earth's place in the 'ecliptick, as that learned perſon abovementioned has 'diſcovered, and that not only when the ſtar tranſits 'the meridian, but in clear air at any time of the 'day, one ſhall likewiſe obſerve that annual increaſe 'of the pole ſtar's declination cauſed by the proceſſion 'of the equinox. My own obſervations aſſure me, 'that the pole ſtar may be ſeen in the day time with 'a teleſcope of ſixteen foot, for with one of this length 'I ſaw that ſtar on the 26th of April, this preſent 'year 1701, from four o' clock in the morning till 'ſeven, and could have ſeen it longer had not clouds 'interpoſed; and again the firſt of May, I did not 'look for the ſtar till the ſun had been up more than 'half an hour, viz. at five in the morning, yet I 'ſoon found it and ſaw it afterwards as oft as I pleaſed, 'till half an hour after nine the ſame morning; ſo 'that I doubt not this ſtar may be ſeen in a clear day 'throughout the whole year.' The very learned Dr William Wotton (14), who was a perſon of univerſal knowledge, produces the labours and diſcoveries of Mr Flamſteed to prove, that the antient Aſtronomy was not at all comparable to the modern; or, which is the ſame thing, that modern Aſtronomers have far ſurpaſſed the antients in point of accuracy, as well as extenſiveneſs in their obſervations. 'Galileo Galilei, ſays he, 'was the firſt who diſcovered four planets moving con-'ſtantly round Jupiter, from thence uſually called his 'ſatellites, which afterwards were obſerved to have 'a conſtant, regular, and periodical motion. This mo-'tion is now ſo exactly known, that Mr Flamſteed, who 'is one of the moſt accurate obſervers that ever was, 'has been able to calculate tables of the eclipſes of 'the ſeveral ſatellites, according to which, Aſtrono-'mers in different quarters of the world, having no-'tice of the preciſe time when to look for them, have 'found them to anſwer to his predictions, and publiſhed 'their obſervations accordingly. This is an effectual 'anſwer to all that rhapſody which Stubbe has col-'lected in his brutal anſwer to Mr Glanville's Plus 'ultra, about the uncertainty of all obſervations made 'by teleſcopes; ſince it is impoſſible to calculate the 'duration of any motion juſtly, by fallacious and un-'certain methods. By the eclipſes of Jupiter's ſatel-'lites, longitudes would ſoon be exactly determined, 'if tubes of any length could be managed at ſea.' That ingenious and intelligent Mathematician, William Molyneux, Eſq; of Dublin, gives our author a very high character and mentions ſeveral teſtimonies of his friendſhip. Dr Edmund Halley, in a parallel drawn by him,

He was ſucceeded in his poſt of Aſtronomer Royal by the late learned and ingenious Dr Edmund Halley, though the Reverend Mr William Whiſton, as he has informed us, made ſome application during the vacancy, in which, though not ſucceſsful, he was not much diſappointed (o). There has been, while this article was in the preſs, a ſhort pamphlet of our author's publiſhed (p), being indeed no more than the copy of a letter to a gentleman at Turin in Piedmont, dated April 10, 1693, in relation to the dreadful earthquakes that had done ſo much miſchief the year before in Jamaica and Sicily, and had been, though but ſlightly, felt here. Our author does not ſeem to have employed much time in the conſideration of this difficult ſubject; he collects from theſe circumſtances, viz. That earthquakes always happen in calm ſeaſons; that a ſmall hollow noiſe in the air precedes them; that they are felt at ſea as well as on ſhore; that ſometimes they ſhake a whole country at once, ſometimes only a very ſmall part, and that gradually; that they are frequently attended with eruptions; that the upper ſtories of houſes are more affected than the lower; and that ſome people are made ſick by the ſhock: that moſt of them are really occaſioned by ſome tremor or exploſion in our atmoſphere, and he endeavours to ſhew how this will anſwer all the phænomena beforementioned. But in the end he admits, that ſome earthquakes may, indeed muſt, happen, from nitro-ſulphureous vapours taking fire in the earth, being induced thereto from the conſideration of what happened in Jamaica, Sicily, and other places. He expreſſes a very ſtrong reluctancy to the ſeeing this little work of his in print, for fear of cavils and diſputes, which he ſeems to have abhored as much as any man could, and which, in the preſent caſe, he took all imaginable pains to prevent. It had in all probability been buried in obſcurity, but for the late melancholy accidents, which brought it firſt to the Bookſeller's knowledge, and made it not improbable that it might be alſo acceptable to the publick. There are certainly in it ſome very juſt hints and uſeful obſervations, but it is too ſhort, and too haſtily written, conſidering the weight of the argument, to give that full ſatisfaction to an inquiſitive and judicious reader, which the name of ſo great a man might lead him to expect. It may be very ſerviceable however to ſuch as turn their thoughts this way, as it gives a fair and full inſtance of the true method of collecting the capital heads of an enquiry, that may conduct us in diſcovering, ſo him, and who could draw it better? between the antient Aſtronomers and the moderns diſcourſes thus. 'Now in this ſcience to compare the antients with 'the moderns, and ſo make a parallel as juſt as may 'be, I oppoſe the noble Tycho Brahe, or Hevelius, 'to Hipparchus, and John Kepler to Claudius Ptolomee, and I ſuppoſe no one acquainted with the 'ſtars will doubt, that the catalogue of the fixed ſtars 'made by Tycho Brahe above C years ſince, does 'beyond competition far excel that of Hipparchus, 'being commonly true to a minute or two, when the 'other many times fails half a degree both in longitude and latitude; and this is the fairlier carried, for 'that it was as eaſy for Hipparchus to obſerve the 'fixed ſtars, as for Tycho or Hevelius, had he made 'uſe of the ſame induſtry and inſtruments, the teleſcope, wherewith we now obſerve to the utmoſt poſſible nicety, being equally unknown to Tycho, as to 'Hipparchus, and not uſed by Hevelius. But what 'may juſtly be expected from Monſieur Caſſini, and 'Mr Flamſteed in this matter, does yet further advance in preciſeneſs as not capable to err half a minute, though made with inſtruments of the production of Greſham.' We are likewiſe told by that judicious Aſtronomer, Dr John Keil (15), 'That Mr 'Flamſteed, with indefatigable pains for more than 'forty years, watched the motions of the ſtars, and 'has given us innumerable obſervations of the ſun, 'moon, and planets, which he made with very large 'inſtruments exactly divided by moſt exquiſite art, 'and fitted with teleſcopical ſights. Whence we are 'to rely more on the obſervations he hath made, than 'on thoſe that went before him, who made their obſervations with the naked eye without the aſſiſtance 'of teleſcopes. The ſaid Mr Flamſteed has likewiſe 'compoſed the Britiſh catalogue of the fixed ſtars, 'containing about three thouſand ſtars, which is twice 'the number that are in the catalogue of Hevelius, to 'each of which he has annexed its longitude, latitude, 'right aſcenſion, and diſtance from the pole, together with the variation of right aſcenſion and declination, while the longitude increaſes a degree. This 'catalogue, together with moſt of his obſervations, is 'printed on a fine paper and character, at the expences (16), of the late Prince George of Denmark.' To all theſe authorities we will preſume to add, that of a foreign writer of great eminence, M. Sigorne, Member of the Sorbonne, and Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Paris, who mentions the approbation of Mr Flamſteed (17), as the very ſeal of the Newtonian Philoſophy, by which with reſpect to the ſyſtem of the heavens, or rather of the heavenly bodies, it came to be eſteemed certain and beyond all diſpute. Quant aux planettes principales, dit il, l'attraction ſeule du ſoleil doit les aſſujettir à decrire des ellipſes, &c. that is, 'With reſpect to the primary planets, the 'attraction of the ſun only is ſufficient to oblige them 'to deſcribe ellipſes, but as they ought alſo to attract 'each other, there was ſome room to apprehend that 'the regularity of their motion might be thereby 'ſomewhat diſturbed. We ought, however, to take 'Sir Iſaac Newton's word upon this head, ſince we 'ſhall preſently ſee from what he has done, that there 'is no reaſon to be in pain upon this account; according to his obſervation, bodies attract each other in 'a direct proportion of the quantities of matter they 'contain, and the converſe proportion of the ſquares 'of their diſtances, and in this proportion it is, that 'the planets affect each other. Now if the Newtonian Philoſophy be true, there is a certain method 'of knowing the quantity of matter in the planets, 'and conſequently of calculating the force of their 'impreſſions; ſuch a calculation being made, it appears that Mars, our Earth, Venus, and Mercury, 'attract each other ſo little, in proportion to the force 'with which they are attracted by the ſun, that the diſorder ariſing from thence muſt be altogether imperceptible in many revolutions; and hence there 'appears a wonderful agreement between the principles of this philoſophy and the phænomena. But 'this agreement appears ſtill more clearly in what 'happens, with reſpect to Jupiter and to Saturn, the 'quantity of matter in Jupiter is ſo great, that the 'calculation demonſtrates the effects of its attraction 'upon Saturn, ought to be very ſenſible in the time 'of their conjunction. Sir Iſaac Newton predicted 'this to the Aſtronomers, Flamſteed and Halley, but 'the former of theſe great men gave no credit at all 'to that prediction. However, the conjunction of 'thoſe two planets approaching, this ſingular obſervation was made for the firſt time, and the conſequence 'was, that the calculation was exactly verified. This 'procured the Newtonian Philoſophy the approbation 'of ſo great an Aſtronomer as Flamſteed, indeed it 'would have been very difficult for him to have denied it.' We might add much more of the ſame kind, kind, but the deſign of this note being fully anſwered, by our having ſhewn how high the fame of Mr Flamſteed has riſen, amongſt the beſt judges both at home and abroad, we ſhall conclude. E

FLEETWOOD (WILLIAM) a very eminent Lawyer, and Recorder of the city of London in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the ſon of Robert Fleetwood, who was the third ſon of William Fleetwood of Heſketh in the county palatine of Lancaſter, Eſq; and conſequently deſcended of a very antient and worthy family (a). He had a liberal education, and was for ſome time a member of the univerſity of Oxford, but whether of Brazen-Noſe-college or of Broadgate-hall, is a point not now to be certainly determined; but of one of thoſe two learned bodies he was (b). There being no intention of breeding him to Divinity, Civil Law, or Phyſick, he left the univerſity without a degree, and went to London, where he was entered of the Middle-Temple (c), and having very quick natural parts, and, which rarely happens in the ſame perſon, wonderful diligence and application, he became in a ſhort time a very diſtinguiſhed man in his profeſſion (d). In 1562 he was elected Summer-Reader of that houſe, and the very next year choſe again, but however did not read (e), which it may be preſumed was the reaſon, that, in 1568, he was elected Double Reader in Lent (f). His reputation was far from being confined to the Inns of Court, for it having been thought neceſſary to appoint Commiſſioners in the nature of a Royal Viſitation in the dioceſes of Oxford, Lincoln, Peterborough, Coventry and Lichfield, Mr Fleetwood was of that number (g). In 1569 he became Recorder of London, which was then held an employment of great credit and importance. It does not appear whether his intereſt with the Earl of Leiceſter procured him that place or not, but it is very certain that he was conſidered as a perſon entirely addicted to that Nobleman's ſervice, and conſequently one, who, in any caſe of neceſſity, could never want protection at Court (b). It was a very wiſe maxim in thoſe times, That every great tranſaction ſhould have a colour of law, and whenever any extraordinary meaſure was taken, the motives to it were ſo far from being kept ſecret, that the Queen took care that the whole world ſhould be made acquainted with it, to prevent falſe rumours from gaining ground. Thus, in 1571, upon the commitment of the Duke of Norfolk for treaſonable practices, the Recorder, Fleetwood, was directed to repair to the Guild-Hall (i), and there to declare in a proper manner to the Lord Mayor, his brethren the Aldermen, and the Commons, the nature of this conſpiracy, and the danger to which the Queen and her government had been expoſed, which he accordingly did, and acquitted himſelf with great reputation [A]. As in this, ſo in every thing elſe, he was extreamly

[A] And acquitted himſelf with great reputation.] We have more than once, had occaſion to ſpeak of the heavy misfortunes and untimely death, of this Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, whoſe great-grandfather was ſlain in Boſworth field, whoſe grandfather was condemned for high-treaſon, in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and remained a priſoner under that ſentence, during the whole reign of Edward the Sixth, and whoſe father, the learned and witty Earl of Surry ended his days, as himſelf did, upon a ſcaffold (1). This noble perſon, by a contrivance of the Earl of Leiceſter's, was, in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, drawn into a deſign of marrying the Queen of Scots, to which Leiceſter pretended, that he would obtain Queen Elizabeth's conſent; inſtead of which he revealed to her all he knew, which brought diſgrace, ſuſpicion, and impriſonment upon the Duke of Norfolk. He was releaſed out of the Tower in 1570, chiefly by the intereſt of Sir William Cecil, who appears to have been his true friend, by the advice he gave him to marry as ſoon as poſſible, if he would avoid taking up his lodgings there again (2). The Duke neglected this caution, was the very next year drawn into new intrigues, in the management of which, he received ſeveral letters and papers from Mary Queen of Scots, which, when he had peruſed, he delivered to Mr Higford with orders to burn them, but inſtead of doing that, he hid them under a mat in the Duke's bedchamber; when ſomething of theſe matters was diſcloſed, the Duke again put under an arreſt, and Higford caſt into priſon, he confeſſed all he knew, and amongſt the reſt where the papers were to be found, amongſt which was a draught of the whole deſign, tranſcribed from one in the Queen of Scot's own handwriting; and alſo informed them that Barker, one of the Duke's ſervants, was privy to the delivery of the money to Brown, who was to have carried it into Scotland, and from whom it was pretended this diſcovery originally came. When the council had received this draught, the letters abovementioned, and others ſent by the Pope, and when Barker being apprehended had confeſſed every particular, Sir Ralph Sadler was ordered to keep a ſtrong guard upon the Duke's houſe at London, formerly belonging to the Carthuſian Friers (3). The third day after the Duke himſelf was examined, and not knowing what his ſervants had confeſſed, but ſuppoſing the draught with the letters were burnt, he ſtiffly denied all which they had confeſſed. Hereupon within a day or two, namely the ſeventh of September, he was, to the great grief of the people, carried back to the Tower of London, from whence the year before he was releaſed, by Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Henry Nevill, and Doctor Wilſon. Afterwards Baniſter, the Duke's Counſellor at Law, the Earl's of Arundel and Southampton, the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham, and Thomas his brother, Henry Percy, Lowder, Powel, Goodier, and others, were clapt in priſon, who every one of them in hopes of pardon, confeſſed what they knew. 'As ſoon, 'ſays Camden, as the Council produced theſe mens 'confeſſions, the Queen of Scots and Roſs's letters, 'with the draught, to the Duke's face, he was ſtrangely 'confounded. But upon ſight of the draught, and 'the letters, which he ſuppoſed to have been burnt, 'he was amazed, and at laſt brake forth into theſe 'words; I am betrayed and undone by my confidents, 'not knowing how to diſtruſt them, tho' diffidence is the 'very eſſence of wiſdom (4). However, he humbly 'prayed the Council to intercede for him to the Queen, 'promiſing to conceal nothing he knew, and ſolemnly 'proteſting, that he had never conſented to any thing, 'which might prejudice the Queen, or injure the 'realm, but had declared heartily againſt the plots 'they laid for ſurpriſing the Queen, for ſeizing upon 'the Tower of London, and ſetting the Queen of 'Scots at liberty, and that he never thought of calling 'over extreamly vigilant and active, looking upon himſelf as obliged in his office of a Miniſter of Juſtice, not only to do what he was commanded, or what appeared requiſite for the ſervice of the State, but to do it with alacrity and ſpirit, which without all doubt recommended him highly to the Stateſmen of thoſe times, but at the ſame time did not prevent his meeting ſome very untoward rewards for ſuch ſeaſonable and important ſervices (k). As for inſtance; in the year 1576, being informed that there was a great reſort of ſome of the Queen's ſubjects to a certain Popiſh chapel, kept in the houſe of one who was reputed to be a foreign Miniſter, he reſolved, in conjunction with the two Sheriffs and proper aſſiſtance, to go thither, thinking it a reproach to the city of London that the laws for preventing ſuch aſſemblies ſhould be therein openly broken, and this with the utmoſt impunity. He accordingly executed his purpoſe, not without communicating it, as has been thought, to ſome of the great Miniſters of State, without whoſe approbation he ſeldom did any thing. But however that might be, the perſon who kept this houſe, and who ſtiled himſelf an Ambaſſador from Portugal, complained to the Queen of this act of violence, in direct breach, as he affirmed, of the law of nations; and it ſo falling out, that a moſt advantageous treaty of commerce being juſt concluded with the Court of Portugal, the negotiation of which had been entruſted with this Miniſter, it was by the Queen therefore held neceſſary that he ſhould have ſatisfaction given him, and that in ſuch a manner as might be acceptable to his Court. Upon this motive both the Sheriffs and Recorder were arreſted, brought before the Privy-Council, remanded, and a Committee appointed to examine into the whole affair; by this Committee, or rather by Poſtſcript to the Committee's Order written by the Lord Treaſurer, the Recorder was directed to draw up a ſtate of his own caſe, his adverſary having repreſented to the Lords, that his houſe was firſt inveſted, and then entered by force of arms, ſeveral perſons coming in with their ſwords drawn, and not only himſelf inſulted and his ſervants maltreated, but his Lady and her women frighted almoſt out of their wits (l). Mr Fleetwood, upon the ſignification of their Lordſhips pleaſure, ſpeedily returned them ſuch a paper, which, for it's ſingularity, the reader will find at the bottom of the page [B]. But notwithſtanding this this repreſentation, and his being heard in perſon before the Council, where he made a long and good defence, he was, for this breach of the Ambaſſador's privilege, committed again cloſe priſoner to the Fleet, where he continued for ſome time, and at length, upon the Ambaſſador's departing the kingdom, was releaſed. One may collect from his behaviour and ſubmiſſion, as well as from a variety of circumſtances attending this affair, that the Privy-Council and the Recorder (not to carry the matter any higher) underſtood each other very well, and that the whole tranſaction was with a view to two different points; firſt, to deter the Papiſts from reſorting to theſe chapels; and next, to give the Merchants and traders in the city of London, a high opinion of her Majeſty's concern for whatever regarded commerce (m). This is certain, that whatever happened upon this occaſion did not in the leaſt injure either the credit of the Recorder in the city, or his intereſt at Court, as appears from his name being the firſt in the writ for calling Serjeants in Michaelmas term 1580, when, with Edward Flowerdue, Thomas Snagge, William Periam, and Robert Halton, he was advanced to that degree (n). It alſo appears that it did not in the leaſt abate his zeal againſt the Papiſts, on the contrary, he was as active in diſturbing their maſs-houſes, committing Popiſh Prieſts, and giving informations of their intrigues, as ever. Some inſtances of which are remarkable enough to deſerve the reader's notice [C]. In 1582, when he preſented Mr Thomas Blank to her Majeſty, upon

' was, that as well the Engliſh Maſsmongers, as alſo ' the free Denizons, for the covering of their own ' offences, practiſed rather to have murther committed ' than to be taken as they were. All this while the ' Maſs-ſayer ſtood at the north end of the altar, and ' no man living ſaid a word to him, nor touched him, ' ſaving that he did give to divers of our ſervants ' ſinging cakes, wherewith I was offended with them, ' for receiving that idolatrous bread. And all being ' done, and we ready to depart, it was ſaid by a ' ſtanderby, if ye look in at that door near the altar ' ſaid he, you ſhall find a number of Maſsmongers. ' And then did the Prieſt take a key out of his pocket, ' and ſmiling opened the door, and Mr Sheriff Kimpton with the Prieſt looked in, and there was no body. ' And then Anthony Guarras took me by the hand to ' ſee the altar how trim it was. For Mr Barnes and ' I ſtood aſar off in the gallery. And I ſaid to Guarras, Sir, if I had done my duty to God and to the ' Queen, I had taken two hundred here upon All-hollown day laſt, and as many upon All-ſouls day alſo. ' Ho, Sir, ſaid Guarras unto me, become of this religion, and ſurely you will like it well, and it will ' be a ready means to make you a good Chriſtian. And ' ſo we went near the altar, where neither he nor I ' touched any manner of thing. And ſo we bade ' the Prieſt farewell, who gently ſaluted us. And I ' ſuddenly looking back, ſaw the Prieſt ſhake his head ' at us, and mumbled out words, which ſounded diable and male croix, or to that effect. And then I ' ſaid to Mr Sheriff, Sirs, let us depart for the Prieſt ' doth curſe. And ſo we departed. Anthony Guarras brought us to the utmoſt gate, where Mr Sheriff ' and I invited him to dinner with us, but he departed ' back to hear out the aforeſaid Maſs. The foreſaid ' Guarras at this buſineſs ſaid, that he himſelf was an ' Ambaſſador to a greater perſon than the ——— ' and ſo did ſhake his head. What, quoth I, do you ' mean a greater perſonage than the Queen our Miſtreſs? Na, na, ſaid he, I meant not ſo. No, quoth ' I, it were not beſt for you to make compariſon with ' the Queen our Miſtreſs. Whoſe Ambaſſador are you ' then, quoth I? The Pope's? And then he departed ' further off in an anger. This Guarras was a very ' buſy fellow in this action. Among all theſe ſtrangers, ' I marked one Swygo, who is a free Denizon, married to an Engliſh woman. He is a broker, and ' hath his chief living by our merchants. This fellow ' made himſelf more buſy than it became him. There ' was a tall young fellow an Italian, that was very ' wanton with us. And it hath been told me, ſithence, that he and others are kept here for two cauſes, ' the one for uttering the Pope's allom, and the other ' to ſerve for intelligencer. Which I think are very ' ſpies. This youth was very buſy, and beſtirred him ' as tho' he had been treading of a galliard. There ' was one John Chivers, an Iriſhman, a Student of the ' Inns of Chancery, who, as it appeared unto me, I ' having a vigilant eye of all ſides, was a great ſtirrer ' of the ſtrangers againſt us. This young man when ' he could not prevail, then he got up to the ſouth ' end of the altar, and there he confronted the Maſs-ſayer with his cap on his head, who was on the other ' end, and ſtood there as tho' he had been an Italian. ' His garments were a cloak and a rapier after the ' Italian faſhion. And when I demanded what he was, ' he bowed on the one ſide and the other, as tho' he ' had not underſtood me, much like the faſhion of ' Signor Giraldie. By which I did not note that he ' had been often there. This is all that I do remember, and in my conſcience, and as I ſhall anſwer before God at the latter day, we uſed ourſelves with ' ſuch humble reverence unto his lady and her family, ' as more we could not do to the Queen our Miſtreſs, ' ſave kneeling. I ſent Signor Giraldie word as I remember at Eaſter laſt, by Mr Benedict Spinello, that ' he ſhould not ſuffer the Queen's ſubjects to repair to ' his Maſs: yea, and that other things alſo ſhould be ' amended, wherewith the people did wonderfully ' grudge at him: and I am ſure, Mr Spinello did my ' meſſage to him in a decent order. This is not ' the firſt time, that his houſe hath been dealt withal ' by the Sheriffs. Strumpets have been gotten with ' child in his houſe: and we of the hoſpital driven to ' take order for their keeping. The maſters ſhall juſtify this. I never ſaw any Ambaſſador ſent out of ' England, but that he was both wiſe and vertuous, ' and was not indebted to any. And whether Signor ' Giraldie was an Ambaſſador or not, ſurely my Lord, ' I knew not, until my Lords of the Council had told ' me thereof upon Monday laſt at the Council Board.'

[C] The reader's notice.] The laborious Mr Strype, who has preſerved from deſtruction and oblivion a multitude of paſſages, ſerving to illuſtrate the perſonal hiſtory of moſt of the eminent men for two centuries paſt, will furniſh us with ſufficient materials to make good all that is aſſerted in the text; what follows will ſhew, how cloſe a correſpondence there was between the great Miniſters and Mr Fleetwood, the former having an eye even to the ſmalleſt matters, and the latter ſtriving to make his court to them by his punctual adminiſtration of juſtice (7).

(7) Amongſt Lord Burleigh's papers.

' A French merchant, in a bag ſealed, delivered ' forty pounds to a carrier's wife of Norwich, to be ' carried thither to ſome certain correſpondent of his. ' But ſhe ſecretly conveyed the money to an houſe a ' good way off the inn, and within a quarter of an ' hour the French merchant came again to ſee his money packed up. But the woman denied that ſhe ever ' received one penny, with moſt horrible proteſtations. ' Upon this Secretary Walſingham, who was made acquainted with it, wrote to Fleetwood Recorder of ' London, from whoſe letter I have this relation, and ' the Frenchman. And after great ſearch made, the ' money was found and reſtored, ſhe not knowing ' of the ſame. The Recorder examined her in his ' ſtudy privately. But by no means would ſhe confeſs ' the ſame: but did bequeath herſelf to the devil, both ' body and ſoul, if ſhe had the money or ever ſaw it. ' And this was her craft that ſhe then [when ſhe ſaid ' ſo] had not the money, for it was either at her ' friend's, where ſhe left it, or elſe delivered. Then ' he aſked her, whether the French merchant did not ' bring her a bag ſealed, full of the metal that was ' weighty, upon his being choſen Lord Mayor of London, he made a florid and copious ſpeech of the felicity of the nation in general, and of the advantages derived to the city of London in particular, by her Majeſty's religious, wiſe, and fortunate adminiſtration (o). The Queen, upon that occaſion, gave a gracious reception to the Mayor, and ordered the Lord-Chamberlain to confer upon him the honour of knighthood, but reprimanded ſeveral of her ſervants for ſuffering ſome of the young citizens to crowd ſo near her perſon as to trample upon the cloth of ſtate, and ſignified to the Recorder, that ſhe had been better pleaſed if he had been more ſparing of his praiſes. Mr Serjeant Fleetwood, who underſtood the language of a Court perfectly well, ſtates this matter at large in a letter to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, but inſtead of expreſſing any great mortification from the Queen's reprimand, he inſiſts that he was in the right. My good Lord, ſays he, I ſaid nothing but truly and juſtly, as it was indeed (p). It ſeems he was one of thoſe bold men that thought Princes may reprove without diſlike, and that however unpleaſant the anſwer, his diſcourſe did not give her Majeſty any real uneaſineſs. One thing was very remarkable in Mr Recorder's conduct, and deſerves to be remembered as an extraordinary feature of thoſe times. He kept a very exact Diary of all his proceedings, from which, from time to time, he made extracts, and tranſmitted them to the Lord-Treaſurer, who from thence perfectly underſtood whatever paſſed in the city of London, and indeed every where elſe if it fell within the compaſs of Mr Serjeant Fleetwood's notice, who in this reſpect ſeems to have been incredibly diligent, and to let nothing eſcape him that was either worth his patron's attention or his own (q). We may diſcern from ſome fragments of his Diary that are yet remaining, that we have no great reaſon to look upon the preſent as an age of more wickedneſs and debauchery than any that have preceded it, or that ought not to be compared with the times of that glorious Queen, the Recorder's ſecret hiſtory plainly ſhewing, that though juſtice was never more ſtrictly adminiſtered, yet the idle, the extravagant, and the vicious, were even then a very numerous party, and capable of committing as great outrages on the laws, ſacred and civil, as perhaps were ever committed at any time (r) [D]. This courſe of life, for the ſpace of many years, wore out at length the patience

' weighty, were it either plate, coin, counters, or ' ſuch like. Then ſaid ſhe, I will anſwer no further. ' And then the Recorder uſing the Lord Mayor's ad- ' vice, beſtowed her in Bridewell: where ſhe was pu- ' niſhed being well whipt. It was obſervable what ſhe ' ſaid then, that the devil ſtood at her elbow in the ' Recorder's ſtudy, and willed her to deny it. But ſo ' ſoon as ſhe was upon the croſs to be puniſhed, he ' gave her over.

' The ſame Recorder Fleetwood about this time, ' acquainted Secretary Walſingham in a letter to him ' of another ſtrange accident, of a woman named Mrs ' Norton that had drowned herſelf. She was mother- ' in-law to one Thomas Norton, a perſon of ſome re- ' putation in London, whoſe father was then aged and ' ſick in bed, in her youth, ſhe was bred up in Sir ' Thomas More's family. In which place ſhe learned ' idolatrous toyes (I tranſcribe from the Recorder's let- ' ter) and uſages in the night, ſo as thereby ſhe was led ' by evil ſpirits, ſometimes to hang herſelf, and ſome- ' times to drown herſelf, as ſhe did at laſt. Some part ' of her lewd demeanour, was in the exerciſe of ne- ' cromancy: that is to ſay, in conferences and ſpeeches ' had (as ſhe thought) with dead bodies being of her ' old acquaintance. The Recorder writ this accident, ' the rather to the ſaid Secretary, becauſe ſhe had left ' behind her divers children, brothers to the ſaid Tho- ' mas Norton which were ſhrewdly given. And that ' if the old man ſhould then die, it was to be feared ' all his goods would come to ſpoil. And therefore ' he propoſed, that if Mr Peter Oſborn, who was a ' worthy Citizen and Remembrancer of the Exchequer, ' had a commandment, he could deviſe ſome good or- ' der, as he the Recorder thought, for the ſaving of ' things that might be loſt. And he prayed his ho- ' nour to make the Lord Treaſurer, who was Maſter ' of the Wards, acquainted with the unfortunate caſe. ' Such was the care of this good Recorder of the chil- ' dren of the city.' This laſt ſtory plainly proves how little he liked the Papiſts, and if it was not for tiring the reader's patience, we could afford him large accounts of his hunting out Jeſuits, Maſſmongers, and Recuſants, without diſtinction of rank, age, or ſex. In ſhort, he was the greateſt plague theſe people had, and therefore in all the numerous libels againſt Queen Elizabeth's government, the Recorder of London is painted in the blackeſt colours, as a man without either moderation or pity, reſtleſs and officious, and willing to make his court to the Adminiſtration, in the way that was moſt in faſhion.

[D] As perhaps were ever committed at any time.] When we read in ſome of our old plays of ſo much quarrelling, fighting, and duelling, we are apt to fancy that things are magnified, whereas the naked truth is, that there were more diſturbances then in a week, than we now hear of in a year; in order to be ſatisfied of this, we need but caſt our eyes upon one of our old Chronicles, where the author ſpeaking of the pains taken to pave Smithfield, gives us the following ſhort hiſtory of the company that frequented it, during the whole period of Mr Fleetwood's Recorderſhip (8).

(1) Stow's Annals, p. 1024.

' This field commonly called Weſt Smithfield, was ' for many years called Ruffians-hall, by reaſon it was ' the uſual place of affrays and common fighting, during ' the time that ſword and bucklers were in uſe. When ' every ſerving-man from the baſe to the beſt, carried ' a buckler at his back, which hung by the hilt or ' pomel of his ſword, which hung before him. This ' manner of fight was frequent with all men, until ' the fight of rapier and dagger took place, and then ' ſuddenly the general quarrel of fighting abated, which ' began about the twentieth year of Queen Elizabeth, ' for until then, it was uſual to have affrays, fights, and ' quarrels upon the Sundays and Holidays, ſometimes ' twenty, thirty, and forty ſwords and bucklers, half ' againſt half, as well by quarrels of appointment as ' by chance. Eſpecially from the midſt of April, un- ' til the end of October, by reaſon Smithfield was then ' free from dirt and plaſhes. And in the winter ſeaſon, ' all the high ſtreets were much annoyed, and troubled ' with hourly frays of ſword and bucklermen, who ' took pleaſure in that bragging fight, and altho' they ' made great ſhew of much fury, and fought often, yet ' ſeldom any man hurt, for thruſting was not then in ' uſe, neither would one of twenty ſtrike beneath the ' waſte, by reaſon they held it cowardly and beaſtly. ' But the enſuing deadly fight of rapier and dagger, ' ſuddenly ſuppreſſed the fighting with ſwords and ' buckler.' This may ſerve as an introduction to the following extract from our Recorder's Diary, tranſmitted to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh about Michaelmas 1584 (9).

' At Bridewell, on Saturday we had a miniſter's ' wife of Cardiganſhire, who confeſſed, that ſhe was ' greatly ſought unto by young women, when they ' were gotten with child. She confeſſed that ſhe gave ' them ſaven, &c.

patience and the conſtitution of Serjeant Fleetwood, notwithſtanding his high ſpirit, and the pleaſure which he apparently took in diſcharging his duty as a Magiſtrate with the utmoſt ardour and application. He thought, it ſeems, that ſome regard ought to be had to his paſt ſervices, and that he deſerved to be removed to ſome poſt of greater honour and leſs fatigue, to obtain which, upon a vacancy of one of the Queen's Serjeants, he ſollicited the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh in a very warm and moving manner, in 1582, which ſollicitations however were without effect (s) [E]. It ſeems the Miniſters were ſo well pleaſed with his behaviour where he was, and found ſo much advantage from his dexterity in managing affairs in the city, that they were not willing to part with him; and therefore Serjeant Rhodes was preferred at that time to the poſt of which he was ſo deſirous, and Mr Fleetwood continued in his Recorderſhip ten years longer; but at length, when he was in a manner quite wore out, viz. Jan. 27, 1592, in the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth (t), when he had ſerved the Crown upwards of thirty years, he was made one of the Queen's Serjeants at Law, in which poſt however he did not continue long, dying, about that time twelvemonth, at his houſe in Noble-ſtreet in Alderſgate ward, which he had built but a little before (u), from whence his corps was carried to great Miſſenden in Buckinghamſhire, where he had purchaſed a good eſtate, and buried in the pariſh-church there. As for the private character of this our Magiſtrate, he was certainly of a very lively and facetious diſpoſition, which made him very acceptable in the city, and enabled him to do his patrons great ſervice there, which perhaps may account for his being ſtiled, in one of the bittereſt libels of thoſe times, Leiceſter's mad Recorder (w), with an inſinuation that he was placed in his office to encourage thoſe of this Lord's faction in the city; but it is very certain, that, whatever reſpect he had for, or obligations he might lie under to, that powerful Nobleman, he applied himſelf very aſſiduouſly to the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh, and from him received both countenance and promotion. Amongſt the Latin poems of Thomas Newton of Cheſhire, who celebrated many of the great men in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (x), there is one addreſſed to our Recorder Fleetwood; and other inſtances might be brought to prove how much he was eſteemed, as well for his wit as his learning, in thoſe days [F]. He was perfectly well verſed in the Hiſtory of England, as

' Mr Dockwray's ſon of Chamberhouſe in Berkſhire, ' was arraigned for ſtealing of a portmanteau, with ' eighty four pounds in the ſame: taken out of an inn ' in London. But he was acquitted.

' There was one Heton a Preacher, who contended ' to be Parſon of St Andrew's Holborn, being main- ' tained by ſome of the Pariſh, did confront Mr Vice- ' Chamberlain (Sir Chriſtopher Hatton) therein, was ' brought to us for * * * a lewd vice which he hath ' been often accuſed of before this time. We bailed ' him. For my part, I was loth to have that vice ' openly ſpoken of, until further conſideration were ' had thereof. This Heton's father was at Newgate ' arraigned, and convicted for inceſt with his own ' daughter: and ſtood upon the pillory for the ſame.'

(10) So in the Burleighan Papers, and in Strype.

Another extract of his Diary (10), there remains written in the year 1586, which runs thus. ' Whit- ' ſunday May 23. upon Friday at afternoon, I ſat in ' the Commiſſion Eccleſiaſtical at Lambeth, with my ' Lord's Grace: where three Oxford Preachers were ' charged, for that they would have all temporal cauſes ' to be decided by the ſeniors of the church. And ' that her Majeſty had not to deal in cauſes eccleſia- ' ſtical, with ſuch like matters. My Lord Almoner ' did bear much with them.

' Saturday was by me employed, to abbreviate and ' explain a new commiſſion, granted for the relief of ' the Fleet and King's Bench. And that I did by the ' command of my Lord of Canterbury his Grace.

' Wedneſday was ſpent at the Goal of Newgate, ' where we had little or nothing to do. The matters ' there were ſlender, and of no great importance. ' There were none executed.

' Your good Lordſhip peradventure may marvel, ' why we have had ſo few dealings in criminal cauſes ' at this our late ſeſſions. The reaſon is this. We ' have in priſon, here in Newgate, the moſt principal ' thieves of this realm. We lack none but Mannings, ' who doth daily gather into his ſociety lewd perſons, ' who commit in all parts of the realm moſt dangerous ' robberies. I hear that the Genn or Ingen (Engine) ' is in your Lordſhip's cuſtody. The want whereof is ' a great ſtay of many burglaries.'

September the 6th (11) he wrote and intended to have ſent another Diary, which after he had cloſed, he broke open again to tell the Lord Treaſurer, what mighty joy there was all over the city the next morning, and of his being invited out to ſix or ſeven places to ſupper, on the ſcore of its being the Queen's birthday, at firſt ſight this will appear a very inſignificant thing, but when it is conſidered that juſt at that juncture, Babington's plot was either diſcovered or divulged, it becomes a thing of conſequence; for very probably the Lord Treaſurer made his court, by being the firſt to inform the Queen, what a tender regard her ſubjects in the City of London, at ſo critical a ſeaſon, expreſſed for her health and ſafety.

(11) Strype's Annals, Vol. III.

[E] Were without effect.] The foregoing note is a very proper introduction to what we ſhall ſay here, becauſe it ſhews in what manner, Mr Recorder Fleetwood ſpent his time, and how ſtrict an account he thought it neceſſary for him to give of it; induſtrious Strype, to whom we have been before obliged, has preſerved this paſſage, and a very ſingular one it is, the letter to the Lord Treaſurer, was dated Eaſter Eve 1582, from Bacon-houſe, which, if I miſtake not, was in Chancery-Lane, and is ſometimes ſtiled Bacon's-Inn, or Curſitor's-Inn, from the Curſitors keeping their office there, and this appears to have been the reſidence of Serjeant Fleetwood, till he removed to Noble Street. The letter runs thus (12). ' My ſingular Lord, &c.

(12) Amongſt Lord Burleigh's papers.

' I never reſt, and when I ſerve her Majeſty the beſt, ' then I am for the moſt part the worſt ſpoken of, ' and that many times in the court. I have no man ' to defend me, and as for my Lord Mayor, my chief ' head, I am driven every day to back him and his ' doings. My good Lord, for Chriſt's ſake be ſuch ' a mean for me, as that with credit I may be re- ' moved by her Majeſty from this intolerable toil. ' Certainly, I ſerve in a thankleſs ſoil. There is, as I ' learn, like to fall a room of the Queen's Serjeants. ' If your Lordſhip pleaſe to help me to one of thoſe ' rooms, aſſure your Honour, that I will do her Ma- ' jeſty as painful ſervice as ſix of them ſhall do: help ' me, my good Lord, in my humble ſuit, and I will, ' God willing, ſet down for your Lordſhip ſuch a book ' of the Law, as your Lordſhip will like of.'

[F] As well for his wit as his learning in thoſe days.] In reference to this Thomas Newton mentioned in the text, he appears to have been not only a good Latin Poet, but the profeſſed Panegyriſt of the whole

as alſo in it's Antiquities, with reſpect to which he was at great expence in procuring, and ſpent much time in the peruſal of, manuſcripts relating to theſe ſubjects, and for this reaſon was often conſulted by the learned perſons of thoſe times, who made ſuch things their chief ſtudy, and with whom alſo, when he had any leiſure, he was glad to confer. He was farther eſteemed a ſhrewd Politician, and indeed that character was moſt likely to recommend him to his patron Leiceſter. He was a good popular ſpeaker, and, when occaſion required, wrote very well upon ſubjects of government (y). Theſe matters however, drew him not at all from his profeſſion, in which he made a very great figure, being equally celebrated for his eloquence as an Advocate, and for the ſolidity of his judgment as a Lawyer. His employments hindered him from writing much, yet ſome pieces of his there are extant, and a great many more are loſt; thoſe however which remain are ſufficient to juſtify the character that has been given him [G]. Serjeant Fleetwood married Mariana, daughter to John Barley of Kingſey in the county of Bucks, Gent. by whom he had two ſons and two daughters. The ſons were both Knights; Sir William Fleetwood, the eldeſt, had his father's eſtate in Buckinghamſhire; and the younger, Sir Thomas Fleetwood, was of his father's profeſſion, became very eminent therein, and was made Attorney-General to Henry Prince of Wales. The daughters were both married to Knights; Cordelia, the eldeſt, to Sir David Foulis, of Ingleby in the county of York, Baronet; and Elizabeth to Sir Thomas Chaloner, Tutor to Prince Henry beforementioned (z). Theſe memoirs, however ſhort and imperfect, may ſerve in ſome meaſure to acquaint poſterity with the merit of this ingenious and accompliſhed Lawyer; and it is certainly to be regretted, that more care has not been taken to preſerve the perſonal hiſtories

[G] That has been given him.] We have hitherto had but very indifferent accounts of our author's performances; Mr Wood aſſures us, that tho' he wrote many things, yet none of them, except one, appeared in his life-time, in which however he was certainly miſtaken, as will appear from the following catalogue, tho' we are far from aſſerting that this is perfect, but the reader may be aſſured, that it is as perfect as we could make it.

I. An Oration made in Guildhall, before the Mayor, &c. concerning the late attempts of the Queen's Majeſties evil ſeditious ſubjects, October 15th 1571. London by John Day 12mo.

II. Annalium tam Regum Edwardi quinti, Richardi tertij, & Henrico ſeptimi, quam Henrici octavi, titulorum ordine alphabetico multo jam melius quam ante digeſtorum Elenchus. Studio & labore Gulielmi Fleetwoodi, Recordatoris Londinenſis, in ædibus Janæ Yetſweirt 1579, 1597 that is 'an index of the Year Books 'as well during the Reigns of Edward the Fifth, Richard the Third, and Henry the Seventh, as under 'that of Henry the Eighth, digeſted under titles in an 'alphabetical order, in a much better method than 'before.'

The bare tranſcribing this title at length, will perhaps be ſufficient to convince the reader, that a certain great critick might have ſpared his cenſure of our author's work, which he has delivered in the following words (14). 'The ſhort Epitome of this (Edward the 'Fifth) and the three following reigns, that was writ-'ten and publiſhed by William Fleetwood Serjeant at 'Law, is ſo thin a piece, and refers ſo particularly to 'the tranſactions in the Courts at Weſtminſter, that 'it has been rather looked on as a table or index to 'the Year Books of thoſe times, than any hiſtorical 'treatiſe.' It is very difficult to underſtand, what he means by ſaying, it ought rather to be looked on as an index, than an hiſtorical treatiſe, when there is not ſo much as a ſyllable of hiſtory in it, and the running title throughout is, Index temporum E. 5. R. 3. & H. 7. and through the ſecond part, Index temporis Henrici octavi; ſo that in plain Engliſh, our critick miſtook an index of the Year Books, for Annals of the Reigns of theſe Princes. There is however a very remarkable dedication, prefixed to the Lord Chancellor Brumley, dated from Bacon-houſe, Auguſt 23d 1579. in which there are contained abundance of curious things. He obſerves, that the Year Books of the three firſt reigns, are infinitely better written, than thoſe of Henry the Eighth, which was the reaſon that he divided his work into two parts; the reaſon he gives for compoſing it is worthy of notice, he mentions the great Abridgment by Sir Robert Brooke, as a very ingenious performance in its kind, and, properly managed, very uſeful; but intimates, that he thought the chief cauſe why it was ſo much preferred to that of Fitzherbert, was on account of its being divided into a greater number of titles, there being only two hundred ſixty two in the former, and no fewer than ſix hundred thirty three in the latter. This, as he intimates, recommended it ſtrongly to young Students, who were but too apt to ſpend their whole time therein, without recurring to the books from whence it was taken, againſt which he remonſtrates to the Lord Chancellor as a very lazy and ineffectual method of ſtudy, by which men might come to perſuade themſelves they were Lawyers, when in truth they were nothing leſs. He obſerves, and obſerves very juſtly, that abridgments are of admirable uſe to thoſe who make them, and of very little uſe to any body elſe, with many other things to the ſame purpoſe. The deſign therefore of his labour, was to render the Year Books familiar to young ſtudents, by putting into their hands a copious and methodical index, which would enable them to make abridgments for themſelves, not by ſeeing in a narrow compaſ-

There is ſomething laid down as certain in this table which ought to be corrected, as appears from the following paſſage in a diſcourſe by a learned Antiquary (15). 'Touching the Inns of the Serjeants, the houſes 'which they now have in Fleet-Street and Chancery-'Lane are but of late erection, and altho' Mr Ser-'jeant Fleetwood in his table to Ployden's Commen-'taries, would infer that there was no Serjeant's-Inn 'in the time of Henry the Seventh, there was a Ser-'jeant's-Inn in Holdborn over againſt St Andrew's 'Church, now called Scrop houſe, whereof you ſhall 'have the record itſelf, being an inquiſition taken at 'Guildhall in the pariſh of St Laurence in Old 'Jury, in the Ward of Chepe in London, 13 Octob. E

FLEETWOOD (James) a pious and loyal Divine, and Biſhop of Worceſter in the reign of Charles II. He was deſcended from the ſame ancient family of Fleetwood of Heſketh in the county of Lancaſter, being the grandſon of Thomas Fleetwood, Eſq; Maſter of the Mint, by his fifth ſon Sir George Fleetwood, of the Vache in Chalfunt St Giles, in the county of Bucks, Knt. by Catherine, daughter of Henry Denny, of Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire, Eſq; and Honora his wife, daughter of William Lord Grey of Wilton, and ſiſter to Edward Denny Earl of Norwich (a). As he was his father's ſeventh ſon he was intended for the Church, and as ſoon as he arrived at a proper age was ſent to Eaton ſchool (b), through which having paſſed, with great reputation to himſelf and ſatisfaction to his family, he was from thence removed to King's-college in Cambridge, of which he was admitted a Scholar in 1622 (c). He continued there near ten years, till he was removed by his kind patron Dr Robert Wright, Biſhop of Lichfield, who preſented him to the vicarage of Prees in the county of Salop (d), and, in September 1636, beſtowed on him the prebend of Eccleſhal in his cathedral, void by the reſignation of the Reverend Mr Higgons (e). He was hardly ſettled there before the Civil War broke out, which obliged him to leave his preferments in order to provide for his ſafety (f). He was a man of a very mild and gentle diſpoſition, but extreamly fixed in his purpoſes, which he aſſumed with much deliberation, and from which he could not be removed. A great many of his family ſtuck to the Parliament, and amongſt them ſome of his neareſt relations. Mr Fleetwood's ſubſiſtence was gone, but he ſtuck to his old principles, and became Chaplain to that noble Peer John Earl Rivers, in his capacity of Colonel of a regiment of foot, which he raiſed for the King's ſervice (g). In this ſituation he acquired fame though he could hardly get bread. For, in 1642, he was, by the univerſity of Oxford, created Doctor of Divinity by the King's ſpecial command (h), for the ſervice he rendered him in Edge-hill fight [A]. Soon after he was made

[A] He rendered him in Edgehill fight.] It might be reckoned none of the ſmalleſt of the calamities which attended this deplorable war, that as it diſſolved the relation between the King and his ſubjects, ſo it diſturbed likewiſe the peace of private families, and divided, in point of ſentiments, intereſts, and behaviour, thoſe who by the ſtrongeſt ties of blood and nature were united. Our Divine's eldeſt brother George Fleetwood, Eſq; went into the Parliament's ſervice, where he had the rank of a Colonel, and was one of thoſe that were not only named, but ſat and acted as one of the King's Judges, for which he loſt his eſtate (1), and a grant being made of it to his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, he ſold it to Sir Thomas Clayton (2). Another relation of our Divine, tho' I think in no nearer degree than that of a couſin, was Charles Fleetwood, Eſq; who married Mrs Ireton, Oliver Cromwell's daughter, and had for a time the title of Lord Fleetwood, was General of the Parliament forces, but by degrees loſt his credit and power, and returned again to the ſtate of a private gentleman (3). Our worthy Divine was in the battle of Keynton, or Edgehill, the firſt that was fought between the King and the Parliament, on Sunday October the 23d, 1643 (4), and which had been certainly deciſive, if Prince Rupert's conduct had in any degree been allied to his courage, but having routed the enemy's left wing, and purſuing them beyond their camp, he left the King with his infantry uncovered, which advantage was taken by ſome of the beſt officers in the Parliament's army, who immediately charged the King's own regiment which they put into great diſorder, killed his General, the loyal Earl of Lindſey, his Standard-bearer Sir Edmund Verney, and put the perſons of the King and his two ſons in very great danger. Some who were near his Majeſty adviſed him to withdraw with the two Princes, which counſel he approved in reſpect to his children, but not for himſelf. He would have recommended them to the care of the Duke of Richmond, but his Grace ſaid it was his duty to follow his Majeſty, and not to think of ſafety when he was in danger (5); the King then ſpoke to the Earl of Dorſet, who replied ſmiling, that all the Kings in the world ſhould not command him out of the field, when ſo good a cauſe required his ſword (6). At laſt the Princes were committed to the care of the gentleman penſioner who attended them, Sir Henry Blount (7), who with Mr James Fleetwood convcyed them from the field, for which ſervice the former was afterwards queſtioned by the Parliament, but juſtified himſelf from the duty of his office, and probably the latter would not have eſcaped ſo well, if he had not taken care to keep conſtantly out of their reach (8). It was his clear and ſingular fidelity upon this and every other occaſion, that kept him in conſtant favour with both his royal maſters, to whom through all their misfortunes he ſteadily adhered, tho' there is very little doubt to be made, that if he would have ſacrificed his principles, he might have made his peace from the intereſt of his powerful relations, but he never had a thought of that nature, and therefore choſe to remain in exile till he returned in triumph, and received the reward made Chaplain to Charles Prince of Wales, and had alſo the rectory of Sutton Colefield in Warwickſhire (i) beſtowed upon him, for which preferment however he was little the better; for the King's affairs falling into confuſion, Dr Fleetwood travelled with the Earls of Kildare and Sterling, as he alſo did with that hopeful young Peer Eſme Duke of Richmond, who, dying at Paris in 1660, his title devolved upon Charles Stuart Earl of Lichfield (k), who was likewiſe a pupil of Dr Fleetwood's. After the Reſtoration of the King he returned to England, and was moſt graciouſly received by his Royal Maſter, being the firſt Divine that was ſworn one of his Chaplains in Ordinary. In June 1660 he was made Provoſt of King's college in Cambridge (l), and had alſo the rectories of Anſtey in Hertfordſhire, and of Denham in Bucks, being Proctor likewiſe in the Convocation for the clergy of the dioceſe of Lichfield (m). On the 29th of Auguſt 1675 he was conſecrated Biſhop of Worceſter, in the room of Dr Walter Blandford, in the church of St Peter le Poor in Broad-ſtreet, London (n). He diſcharged his epiſcopal function with great punctuality, and was exceedingly beloved both by the clergy and laity in his dioceſe, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in doing himſelf, and exhorting others to do good. He deceaſed July 17, 1683 (o), when he was ſomewhat above fourſcore, and lies interred under a monument, behind the high-altar, erected in his life-time, with an inſcription thereon by his own command, and of his own compoſition, of which the reader will find a very exact copy in the notes [B]. He was ſucceeded in the government of King's-college Cambridge by Sir Thomas Page (p), Knight, a perſon of incomparable abilities and of an unblemiſhed character; and in the See of Worceſter by Dr William Thomas, who was ſuſpended for not taking the oaths at the Revolution, but died before deprivation which was intended (q). To him ſucceeded the worthy and learned Dr Edward Stillingfleet, who, at his deceaſe, directed his body to be buried behind the high-altar, near the tomb of this pious and venerable Biſhop Fleetwood, which was accordingly performed.

[B] A very exact copy in the notes.] This monumental inſcription which affords the higheſt teſtimony of the ſincere piety, and incomparable humility of this good prelate, who paſſed through all the viciſſitudes of this troubleſome life without the ſmalleſt reproach, has been frequently but faultily printed, ſo that the ſenſe of it was ſcarce to be collected, which is the reaſon of our giving it a place together with a tranſlation here. As for his youngeſt ſon Mr Archdeacon Fleetwood, by whoſe care it was in purſuance of his father's will engraved upon his tomb, he was alſo Rector of Ripple in his own Archdeaconry, to which he was collated by his father in 1676, upon the demiſe of Dr Hodges. He died in 1705, and lies buried in the Church of Ripple (10).

This Epitaph
Living, and having the uſe of my faculties, I have written,
Let it be inſcribed by thoſe into whoſe hands it comes.
I James Fleetwood Dr of Divinity of the Cathedral Church of Worceſter the (*) ninetieth Biſhop, of ſinners the moſt miſerable lie here. Moſt worthy to lie here for ever: but by the merciful love of the LORD
I attained his Grace.
What to me imports varniſhed Nobility.
This is my only boaſt,
That CHRIST took on him my Fleſh.
Therefore,
Let none with tears deplore me, CHRIST ſhall aſſert,
His right and from the yauning Tomb redeem me,
Soon ſhall I climb the heavenly way and view,
Recloth'd with Fleſh, my LORD in Fleſh too cloth'd.
I have lived; I have ſpoken.

(*) According to Biſhop Godwin's Catalogue he was the ninety-firſt.

FLEETWOOD (William) a learned Divine, an excellent Preacher, and ſucceſſively Biſhop of St Aſaph and Ely in the XVIIIth century. He was deſcended from the Fleetwoods of Lancaſhire beforementioned, and inherited an eſtate in that county (a). His father was Jeffery Fleetwood, Eſq; and his mother Anne, daughter to Mr Richard Smith, Prothonotary of the Poultry Compter (b). He was born January 21, 1656, and, as we are told, in the Tower of London (c); but perhaps there may be ſome miſtake as to that circumſtance, ſince his father died in the Tower April 18, 1665, leaving his widow with ſix ſmall children (d); ſo that it is poſſible this circumſtance of his father's death, by tranſpoſing the two laſt figures of the year, might be confounded with his ſon's birth (e). He received the firſt tincture of letters at Eton ſchool, and was from thence elected to King's-college in the univerſity of Cambridge (f). About the time of the Revolution he entered into Holy Orders, and was conſidered as a celebrated Preacher almoſt at his firſt ſetting out. Having preached the anniverſary ſermon on the founder's day before the univerſity in his own college, March 25, 1689, it fell to his turn to preach before them on the Sunday following at St Mary's, when the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of colleges deſired him to print both ſermons, but he declining one part of the honour, printed only the firſt [A]. He was ſoon after made Chaplain to King William and Queen

[A] Printed only the firſt.] The true characteriſtick of a genius is this, that it not only penetrates but irradiates every ſubject, and how common or beaten ſoever gives it freſh life, ſets it in a new light and compels us to acknowledge that we are pleaſed both beſide and beyond our expectation. This obſervation could never be more properly made than at our entrance on the notes to this article, ſince our whole buſineſs in them will be to exhibit inſtances of the truth and juſtice of this remark.

I. A Sermon preached before the Univerſity of Cambridge in King's College Chapel on the 25th of March, 1689, being the Anniverſary for Commemoration of King Henry VI. the Founder, London 1689. 4to.

Our author made a very judicious choice of a text (1), upon this occaſion, viz. For the adminiſtration of this ſervice not only ſupplieth the want of the Saints, but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings unto God. Which, having firſt handled with great perſpicuity and prudence as a Divine, he proceeds next to the application, and therein gives us not only a fine picture of Henry the Sixth, but interſperſes alſo a variety of hiſtorical paſſages, which the learned reader will allow me to ſay are hardly to be met with any where elſe.

(1) 2 Cor. ix. 12.

'Firſt, ſays he, if St Paul ſo earneſtly exhorts to and 'commends a piece of private, caſual, temporary, 'tranſient charity, how much is due, what might be 'ſaid of ſuch a publick, ſo deliberately deſigned, ſuch 'a laſting one (an everlaſting one I hope) as I ſtand 'here the grateful ſubject of? A private man may caſt 'his bread upon the waters in hopes to find it after 'many days, and give a portion to ſeven, and alſo to 'eight, becauſe he knoweth not what evil ſhall be 'upon the earth. And if notwithſtanding this deſign, 'and theſe ſelf-intereſted principles, the work is excellent and acceptable both to God and Man, it muſt 'needs be infinitely more, ſo when a Prince becomes 'the donor, under whoſe conſideration none of thoſe 'hopes or fears can reaſonably be thought to fall. 'And if the relieving private and ſome few perſons, 'wants not its praiſe and glory, they muſt both of 'them riſe as the merit does, where the publick is 'obliged, and all may put in equal claim and title to 'the benefaction, that will be content with his way 'of education. The ſtory is well known to us be 'ſure, but he that would record the virtuous qualities 'and fair endowments of our glorious founder, to 'thoſe that are without or to poſterity, could not by 'any means forget that moſt remarkable and noble 'inſtance of his large and comprehenſive ſoul, in generouſly rejecting one of our firſt governors for his 'too partial fondneſs to his native county, and endeavouring to appropriate all the royal bounty to it 'only, conſidering with himſelf that tho' a private man 'might do the ſame with reaſon enough and juſtice 'too, yet that a Prince ſhould both in this and every 'thing beſides approve himſelf a father of the publick. 'Secondly, a formed premeditated and deliberate 'work of charity, has certainly the advantage of a 'caſual accidental one, this may be wreſted only by 'the importunity of ſome that want, compliance with 'the cuſtom of the place, forced by the example of 'the company and ſhame of being ſingular, or expreſt 'from men by the lamentable moans and preſence of 'ſome piteous object, and men are often ſeen upon 'removal of thoſe objects, and the going down of 'thoſe mechanick ſprings of tenderneſs, to harden and 'return again to their ill-natured tempers, and frequently repent them of the good they did, wiſhing 'themſelves again poſſeſſors of their riches. But he 'that acts deliberately, that forms his deſigns beforehand, without any preſent artificial motives, and certainly intends them for a laſting benefit to all poſterity, muſt be preſumed, in reaſon and in juſtice, to 'build upon the beſt and ſureſt grounds, to proceed 'upon the nobleſt and moſt perfect principles. It cannot indeed be ſaid, that this foundation was the deſign of many years before, for the King himſelf was 'then but twenty three at the moſt, an age moſt commonly of little thinking with great men, or at beſt 'of little elſe, than how to paſs away that ſpring of 'life in gaiety and pleaſure. But yet it was his earlieſt undertaking and deſign, and had for ſome conſiderable time been the whole employment of his 'thoughts, and his heart was ſo intent upon the matter, that he had little reſt till he had brought it to a 'hopeful proſpect, and to ſome degree of its perfection. 'It was no ſudden accidental thing that moved him, 'it was not the effect of his relenting thoughts after 'the ſhedding ſome innocent blood by the rage of his 'own hand, or by the haſty execution of ſome furious 'order, for he was meek and merciful, ſparing of 'blood, and tender to his ruin; of ſuch a gentle and 'forgiving diſpoſition, that when a rude and impious 'ſoldier ſtruck him knowingly in priſon, he afterwards upon the throne rebuked him only with a 'piece of Scripture, told him he ſhould not ſtrike the 'Lord's anointed; nor was it an effect of his repentance upon the cooling of his youthful blood, nor of 'the injunction of his confeſſor for ſome extravagancies common to that age. For what was ſaid of 'virtuous Gratian may be ſaid of him with equal 'truth, not Veſta's altar, Pontifex his bed, nor Flamen's pillow, was more pure and holy than his 'chamber. No honourable wife, no noble virgin, 'private maid, or conſecrated ſpouſe of Chriſt, called 'at his hands for ſatisfaction to their injured honour. 'He was of ſuch white innocence, and ſuch unſullied 'ſanctity in that behalf, that he could not bear thoſe 'liberties and freedoms, that ſince make up the very 'innocence and modeſty of Courts. This virtue was 'in truth ſo much his own, and ſo peculiarly engroſſed 'up by him, that he ſeems to have carried her to 'heaven along with him, and not to have left ſucceeding Kings the very virtue of hypocriſy, no, not 'ſo much as the grace to diſſemble any kind of liking 'to that purity. Nor was it an atonement for ſome 'loud oppreſſion, violence, injuſtice, or ſome ſacriledge. It is, ſaid one of old, the laſt defence of 'wicked Kings to take away from ſome to give to 'others, and deprecate the envy and the odium of 'their preſent rapines by ſome large works of bounty 'to poſterity; but it was not ſo with him, for tho' his 'reign were long and troubleſome, and its years might 'have been named and numbred from ſome remarkable calamity befalling his perſon or his government, 'his

Queen Mary, and by the intereſt of Dr Godolphin, at that time Vice-Provoſt of Eton and Reſidentiary of St Paul's, he was made Fellow of that college, and Rector of St Auſtin's, London, which is in the giſt of the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's (g). His own great merit brought him ſoon after into the lecture of St Dunſtan's in Fleetſtreet, where his ſermons were generally admired. He maintained that high reputation which he acquired at the univerſity, by publiſhing a moſt admirable Introduction to the Knowledge of Antiquities, which has been very highly and very juſtly admired [B]. His love for that ſtudy, which he preſerved as long as he lived, did not hinder him from applying to the modern languages, and to every branch of polite learning. He was as candid a Critick as he was an indefatigable Scholar, and could readily admire and recommend the performances of others, and, where it was neceſſary, yield them any other aſſiſtance, of which he gave a pregnant inſtance in tranſlating a celebrated book of devotion, which was rendered

' his affairs perpetually embroiled by the prevailing ' faction of his powerful rival and competitor for ſo- ' vereignty, and by the paſſions of his own imperious ' and intriguing Queen, by the rude works of war ' abroad, and by the miſeries of a worſe at home, ' and conſequently a great deal of injuſtice muſt be ' done, yet no man ever had the hardineſs to charge ' the King with any evil, and that not for good man- ' ners or reſpect, but for the truth and juſtice ſake. ' And it is ſo little likely he would cement our build- ' ings with the blood or tears of the oppreſſed, that ' when he was in want of money to expedite his in- ' tentions, and was ſhown the way by ſeizing to that ' uſe the eſtates of ſome that had forfeited them by ' treaſon, he generouſly rejected their advice, and could ' not bear the thoughts, that any one in after-times ' ſhould curſe our walls, and call with bitterneſs and ' anguiſh of their ſouls for their forefathers patrimony. ' ——In compliance therefore with the text, I thank ' the immortal God for that munificence, by which ' two royal great ſocieties were founded and endowed, ' which notwithſtanding all the depredations they ' have undergone, do yet ſubſiſt in fair and honour- ' able manner, and are if not the envy yet at leaſt ' part of the praiſe and glory of their neighbours, for ' making a King, a young and mighty King, the in- ' ſtrument of ſo much good, for inſpiring into his ſoul ' ſuch chriſtian and ſuch generous purpoſes, inſtead ' of all thoſe vain, ambitious, towering imaginations, ' thoſe wicked, wanton, and luxurious thoughts, that ' fill the heads and hearts of common Princes; for giv- ' ing us a founder, whoſe bounty makes us not more ' happy men than his example would, if followed, ' happy Chriſtians: for the advantage of all thoſe ex- ' cellent graces and illuſtrious virtues that adorned his ' life, and ſhone ſo eminently in him: for his early ' zeal and piety, his ardent and unparallel'd devotion ' towards God, for his innocent and uncorrupted ' youth, for his ſanctity, ſobriety, and temperance, ' in every kind, for his great love to learning, and ' greater yet to good morality and true religion, for ' the firm and ſteddy virtues of his manhood, for his ' care of all his life, and that incredible watchfulneſs ' over all his thoughts, and words, and works, inſo- ' much, that in twelve years time, his confeſſor found ' no occaſion to enjoin him any ſort of penance, for ' his ready reſignation to the will of God in all con- ' ditions, for his admirable patience under all the ſor- ' rows and diſtreſſes, the dangers and the difficulties, ' the exiles and impriſonments, with which his life ' was exerciſed for one and fifty years, and laſtly, for ' his holy end and ſufferings, being found at his de- ' votions, by that inhuman Prince Richard the Third, ' that ſtabbed him to the heart, and left expiring out ' his ſoul amidſt his prayers. Theſe are the virtues, ' I can thank God for without a bluſh or ſecret check ' for flattering or enlarging, rare and unſeen in Kings, ' and read by private men with wonder and confu- ' ſion; ſo that I doubt, if moſt of us were left to judge ' of them, by the faint purſuits and feeble imitations ' we have made, there would be great temptations to ' conclude againſt their truth and poſſibility. Theſe ' are the virtues better far beſit the fame and memory ' of chriſtian Kings, than thoſe of glorious heroes and ' triumphant Conquerors, enlargers of their Empires, ' and terrors of their Generations. For the true Eng- ' liſh of thoſe pompous titles is, that they have been ' the plagues of the earth, and mighty murderers of ' mankind, that they have made millions of wretched ' widows, orphans, and relations, have turned fair ' kingdoms into fields of blood and horror, and over- ' run the world with barbarous waſte and deſolation. ' And tho' theſe bears and tygers, wolves and foxes, ' are in ſome manner neceſſary and uſeful in the world, ' and make a glorious buſtle whilſt they live, and we ' are pleaſed with the relations of their acts when dead ' (better when dead); yet no man in his wits that can ' conſider and might chuſe his ſtate himſelf, but would ' prefer the palms of innocent and ſuffering Kings to ' all the laurels, and enſanguined wreaths of thoſe ' renowned Nimrods. Theſe are the virtues we can ' thank God for, becauſe they are ſo uſeful and ſo ' edifying to the world, ſo ſafe to recommend to all ' mankind, but eſpecially ſo proper for our private ' imitation, ſo ſuited to our way of living, that one ' would think the godly King had lived on purpoſe ' for our uſe and ſervice, and that our ſtatutes had ' been copied from his practice, with ſome deſign to ' ſhame us into duty, or make us inexcuſable if we ' could otherwiſe abuſe ſuch bounty, neglect ſuch vir- ' tue, and refuſe to write after ſo fair and goodly an ' original.'

[B] And very juſtly admired.] There is nothing more natural than for a man of letters, to exert his utmoſt as well as his earlieſt endeavours, to recommend and promote his favourite branch of ſcience, which as it was our author's intention in the following work, ſo he made no difficulty of owning it in his two dedications, one to the Students in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and more eſpecially in King's College, and the other to Dr Henry Godolphin, Fellow of Eton, and Reſidentiary of St Paul's. The title of this work at large runs thus.

Regal. apud Cantab. Socio.* Londini Impenſis Guil. Graves, Bibliopolæ Cantabrigienſis 1691. 8vo. It conſiſts of two parts. The firſt contains remarkable Pagan inſcriptions, collected from Gruter, Reineſius, Spon, and other writers, which is digeſted into five claſſes, the firſt, of Gods; the ſecond, of Publick Works; the third, of Emperors; the fourth, of Prieſts, Magiſtrates, Soldiers, &c. and the laſt, of various perſons, as parents, children, huſbands, wives, brothers, ſiſters, &c. The ſecond part contains the antient chriſtian monuments. The notes are very conciſe, and partly formed from the obſervations of others, and partly our author's own. If there ſhould ever be publiſhed another edition of this book, it would be of great advantage to the reader to give accurate indexes, eſpecially of the proper names, for there is at preſent only one which may be ſtiled a Gloſſary of the Antiquities, that occur in the monuments (z). It would likewiſe be very proper to add to the titles of the inſcriptions, the letter G. or R. or S. A. B. P. F. or W. in order to ſhew whether they were taken from Gruter, or Reineſius, or Spon, Aringhus, Baronius, Papebroch, Ferretius, Wheeler, &c. For by this means we might have recourſe to the ſources themſelves, if there ſhould be any ſuſpicion of a typographical miſtake, or we ſhould be deſirous of a more particular account of them.

rendered thereby as ſucceſsful here as it had been abroad (b) [C]. But after all he was chiefly diſtinguiſhed by his great talents for the pulpit, which rendered him ſo much and ſo generally admired, that he was frequently called upon to preach in the moſt publick places, and upon the moſt ſolemn occaſions; ſuch as, before the King, the Queen, the Houſe of Commons, the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, and elſewhere, as the reader will ſee at the bottom of the page [D]. He was deſired to undertake the defence of the Chriſtian religion according to the pious and noble deſign of the Honourable Mr Boyle, but it pleaſed God, that, at this time, he found himſelf not in a condition to diſcharge that duty in a manner ſatisfactory to himſelf, but to ſhew that he meant not to ſpare his pains, or to decline hazarding that credit which he had already attained, he digeſted and publiſhed his thoughts upon miracles, which was the ſubject he intended to have handled in caſe his health had permitted him to have preached thoſe Lectures; which work of his might have drawn him into a controverſy, if that had not been a thing which he ſtudiouſly declined [E]. Such were the labours of this great man during that reign, in which many were ſurprized that he did not obtain higher preferment; for, notwithſtanding

[C] As if it had been abroad.] This note relates to one of the beſt known and moſt admired pieces that fell from our author's pen, tho' it is not inſerted in the folio collection of his works, or ſo much as mentioned in the diſcourſe that is prefixed to them, tho' for what reaſon it is not eaſy to imagine; the title is this:

III. A plain Method of Chriſtian Devotion, laid down in Diſcourſes, Meditations, and Prayers, fitted to the various occaſions of a religious life, in three parts, tranſlated and reviſed from the French of Monſieur Jurieu, by William Fleetwood, D. D. Lond. 1692. 8vo.

The licence for printing it is dated April the 22d 1692, the author of the book was a Miniſter much admired in Holland, tho' his reputation ſunk afterwards, partly from his entertaining enthuſiaſtick opinions, and partly through the arts and credit of ſome whom he had provoked to be his enemies. This book however kept up its credit, as the tranſlation has likewiſe done, there having been a large impreſſion printed this very year (1750) and in the title of the book, this is ſaid to be the twenty ſeventh edition. It is impoſſible to read it with any degree of care without being affected by it. The deſign is perfectly good, the language plain and preciſe, there is not an expreſſion in it, that is not worthy of the pure light of the Goſpel; and upon the whole, there is nothing in it that hinders us from exerciſing our reaſon to heighten our devotion; and very probably it was the conſideration of theſe intrinſick excellencies in the book, rather than the great run which it had abroad, that induced our author to give it an Engliſh dreſs, and withal to prefix a moſt admirable preface, in which he ſhews the true uſe, and cautions the pious reader againſt the too frequent abuſes to which works of this kind are liable. Amongſt theſe, with great judgment and integrity, he ſhews the ſincere Chriſtian how to diſtinguiſh between the effects of a true chriſtian faith, and the accidental elevation or depreſſion of the natural ſpirits, which he has ſo ſkilfully deſcribed, and touched the general ſources of enthuſiaſm with ſo delicate a hand, that it is impoſſible for any candid writer to peruſe what he ſays, without owning him to have an equal diſcernment in Divinity and Philoſophy.

[D] At the bottom of the page] The pieces of which we are to ſpeak in this note, are thoſe Sermons preached by Mr Fleetwood within the compaſs of the period aſſigned in the text, upon particular or ſolemn occaſions, which he afterwards thought fit to publiſh, and which might in a great meaſure contribute to procure him the reputation of being one of the compleateſt orators in the pulpit in his time, when able and eloquent preachers were very far from being ſcarce.

XIV. An Eſſay upon Miracles in two Diſcourſes. Lond. 1701. 8vo.

In the firſt diſcourſe he ſhews what a miracle is, viz. an extraordinary operation of God againſt the known courſe of the laws of nature appealing to the ſenſe; then he proceeds to prove, that the power of working miracles is in God alone, and delegated by him to whom he pleaſes, the character of Moſes in this reſpect is afterwards examined, as alſo the caſe of the Egyptian Diviners who oppoſed him before Pharaoh; laſtly, the Law in Deutronomy againſt falſe Prophets, for pretending to work miracles, is very fully ſifted; ſo that in the cloſe this poſition is laid down as fully proved, that the doctrine in general which is to be eſtabliſhed, muſt be fully and fairly ſtated before the miracles are wrought in ſupport of it. The ſecond diſcourſe relates to the miracles of Jeſus Chriſt; he ſhews therein, that it was foretold that Chriſt ſhould work miracles, and that it was expected, that Jeſus anſwered this expectation and fulfilled thoſe predictions; he examines ſome of the miracles at large, explains the end for which thoſe miracles were wrought, he diſcuſſes the great queſtion, whether we muſt judge of miracles by doctrine, or of doctrine by miracles, proves that ſigns and wonders are not true miracles, that ſtrange events are no miracles, anſwers all the objections that are uſually made, and ſets the evidence drawn from miracles in favour of the Chriſtian religion in a proper point of light.

The then reverend Mr Benjamin Hoadly now Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter, ſoon after publiſhed a letter to Mr Fleetwood occaſioned by a late Eſſay on Miracles. This letter is reprinted in Mr Hoadley's Tracts. The author of the account of the life and writings of Biſhop Fleetwood obſerves, that it has been often affirmed, and paſſes with ſome for a certain truth, that the Biſhop in a letter to the Reverend Mr Hoadley . had given up his ſcheme. But this the reader may be aſſured is a report altogether falſe. Nor is the Biſhop's not replying any juſt ground for ſuch a ſurmiſe, for it was almoſt a principle with him never to enter into controverſy, to which he had an extream averſion, the acrimony with which diſputes were too often carried on, being not at all agreeable to the calmneſs and meekneſs of his temper, for which reaſon he would not be drawn to defend what he had written. I write

withſtanding his being ſo early made a Chaplain to his Majeſty, and his conſtant attendance in that capacity, yet he never received any thing in the way of favour from the Crown, till, juſt before King William's death, he beſtowed upon him a canonry of Windſor at the requeſt of the Lord Godolphin (i). But it ſo fell out, that the grant for this canonry did not paſs the Seals before the King's demiſe, upon which the Houſe of Commons addreſſed Queen Anne to beſtow it upon their Chaplain. Her Majeſty however being acquainted by the Lord Godolphin with the true ſtate of the caſe, immediately aſſured him, that if the King intended to have given Mr Fleetwood this preferment he ſhould certainly have it, and ſhe was as good as her word (k). He continued Chaplain to the Queen as he had been to her predeceſſor, was much eſteemed at Court, greatly beloved in the city, and univerſally eſteemed one of the beſt preachers in the kingdom. In this ſituation it is not eaſy to conceive what the motives were which induced him to take a reſolution of reſigning his rectory and lectureſhip, and retiring into the country; but, whatever his motives were, he adhered ſteadily to that reſolution, and this, notwithſtanding his pariſhioners offered to keep a curate at their own expence, and to do whatever elſe he ſhould deſire to make him eaſy. He executed therefore what he had reſolved, and retired to the ſmall rectory of Wexham, which was of no greater value than ſixty pounds a year, where he enjoyed a neat houſe and pleaſant gardens, within a ſmall diſtance of his beloved college of Eton, living there in that privacy and retirement which he ſo ſtrongly affected. He withdrew himſelf from the world, but he could not withdraw that eſteem which all good men had conceived for his perſon, or extinguiſh that high reputation which reſulted from his writings. Indeed he ſometimes uſed his endeavours with reſpect to the latter, and being contented with the pleaſure of doing good, took pains to avoid being commended for the good he had done [F]. But other caſes there were which would not admit of this kind of management, what he publickly preached he could not avoid owning in print, and if never any thing of his had appeared but his ſermons on relative duties, thoſe alone had given ſufficient cauſe to look upon the retreat of ſuch a man as a loſs to the publick; and it was impoſſible that this ſhould ſlip out of the minds of ſerious and attentive people, while his duty, as the Queen's Chaplain, obliged him to attend upon particular occaſions, and to give, though leſs frequently, as ſtrong marks as ever of his ſingular abilities [G]. As for himſelf, he fully enjoyed the benefits my own ſenſe as well as I can, was his ſaying upon ſuch occaſions: If it be right it will ſupport itſelf, if it be not it is fit it ſhould ſink.

In 1706, there was printed at London in 8vo. Reflections upon Mr Fleetwood's Eſſay on Miracles, ſhewing the abſurdity, falſhood, and danger of his notions, with a ſupplement wherein is repreſented the extent and ſtrength of the evidence which Miracles give to Revealed Religion. Mr Jenkins likewiſe, in his obſervations on the life of Apollonius Tyanæus, makes ſome animadverſions upon the principles which Mr Fleetwood's Eſſay proceeds upon, but without naming the author or the book.

There have been ſeveral editions of it. It was aſcribed to another hand, and is expreſsly given to Mr Theophilus Dorrington, Rector of Wittreſham in Kent, in the Catalogue of the Tracts diſtributed by the Society for propagating Chriſtian Knowledge. But notwithſtanding this there is not the leaſt doubt of its being our author's, who in his preface aſſigns this cauſe for his writing it, viz. 'that he might not be obliged 'to repeat continually the contents of it to ſuch of his 'Pariſhioners, as from time to time came to be in-'ſtructed how to become worthy partakers of the Sa-'crament.'

XVI. A Sermon preached on September the 7th 1704, being the day for the Thankſgiving. Lond. 1704 4to.

As this Sermon was preached on a ſolemn occaſion, ſo the author's publiſhing it aroſe from a very particular circumſtance, which as it was a ſtrong tho' diſagreeable proof to him of the great reſpect paid to his performance, it is neceſſary the reader ſhould have an account of it, which cannot be better given than in his own preface, more eſpecially as it is very ſhort.

'It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that I who have been 'forward enough to ſubmit to the orders of my ſupe-'riors, and comply with the requeſts of my friends, 'in publiſhing many ſermons, ſhould now be con-'ſtrained to publiſh one againſt my will, without 'command, and without requeſt. But ſo it is, that 'a certain perſon unknown to me, who took this ſer-'mon from my mouth in characters, muſt needs think 'himſelf obliged to print it without my conſent, and 'was reſolved it ſeems to do ſo, if I would not take 'care of it myſelf. He had indeed honeſty enough 'to give me notice by another hand of his intentions, 'but not enough to keep him from invading his neigh-'bour's right, which I muſt needs blame in him, tho' 'I have reaſon to think his purpoſe proceeded from 'no ill principle or diſreſpect to me. It is to this ſe-'cret violence I give this ſermon up, and rather chuſe 'to publiſh it from the original, than let it come from 'a copy which cannot poſſibly be perfect, thinking it 'much better to prevent miſtakes, than to be at the 'pains to correct them afterwards, tho' I very much 'diſlike the being under a neceſſity of doing either.'

XVII. The Relative Duties of Parents and Children, Huſbands and Wives, Maſters and Servants, conſidered in ſixteen practical Diſcourſes; with three Sermons upon the caſe of ſelf-murther. Lond. 1705. in 2 vol. 8vo.

This was certainly in its kind one of the moſt ſatisfactory and practical ſyſtems of Chriſtian morals, that was ever publiſhed by any Divine, in our own or in any other language. It was dedicated to the inhabitants of the united Pariſhes of St Auſtin and St Faith, to whom, as the author obſerved, theſe ſermons did in ſome meaſure peculiarly belong, as having been compoſed for their ſervice, preached in their hearing, and ſent abroad at their requeſt. All theſe circumſtances are highly honourable for this great man, inaſmuch as they plainly ſhew, that while he had the care of a pariſh, he applied all his time to the juſt diſcharge of his duty, made choice of ſubjects proper for their knowledge and practice, and treated thoſe ſubjects in benefits he propoſed to himſelf in his retirement, and indulged, in thoſe vacancies which that kind of life procured him, his natural inclination to the ſtudy of Britiſh Hiſtory and Antiquities, which as no man underſtood better, ſo none knew how to apply that kind of knowledge to uſeful and beneficial purpoſes in a clearer or more ſatisfactory method than he did, as appeared from a work of his, which, though publiſhed without his name, was immediately known to be his from it's excellence (l) [H]. We need not wonder, when all theſe particulars are conſidered, that this great man was not ſuffered to remain long in that privacy, which, though it was his own choice and very agreeable to his inclinations, was by no means ſo either to the welfare of the Church or the inclination of his friends, amongſt the moſt ſincere of which we may ſay, without flattering her memory, was the Princeſs then upon the throne. On the death of Dr William Beveridge Biſhop of St Aſaph, March 5, 1707 (m), her Majeſty of her own motive determined that Dr Fleetwood ſhould be his ſucceſſor, and this not only without the leaſt application on his behalf, but abſolutely without his knowledge, ſo that it was no ſecret to the publick when the firſt news of it was brought to him. The manner in which this preferment came appeared to him a ſufficient reaſon not to decline it, ſince it ſeemed to be the appointment of Providence, and as ſuch he embraced it, and was conſecrated June 6, 1708 (n). He ſoon found that Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil government is a very difficult taſk. There was a ſpirit then abroad which he utterly diſapproved, and this ſpirit appeared more in that part of the kingdom where his dioceſe lay than in moſt others; yet his great and clear reputation, his uncommon abilities, and unblemiſhed life, which ſet off the epiſcopal character with much luſtre; his obliging and eaſy deportment, free from the leaſt tincture of pride or ſhew of ſuperiority, did not only place him above all indecent treatment, which was a great point gained in thoſe unequal times, but procured much reverence and affection to his perſon, from a clergy, that, almoſt to a man, differed from him in principle. He preached often before the Queen, and ſeveral of thoſe ſermons were printed [I]. He attended the Houſe of Lords conſtantly, and acted there with ſuch a manner as ſuited beſt with their occaſions. Another excellence in this work is, that it is a moſt clear and convincing demonſtration of the truth of the Chriſtian religion, ſince it exhibits ſo full, ſo rational, and ſo inviting a plan of moral duties, as muſt perſwade whoever conſiders them attentively, that the principles from whence they are deduced are inconteſtably the true principles of ſocial happineſs.

XX. Chronicon Precioſum; or, An account of Engliſh Gold and Silver Money, the price of Corn and other Commodities, and of Stipends, Salaries, Wages, Jointures, Portions, Day-labours, &c. in England for ſix hundred years laſt paſt; ſhewing from the decreaſe of the value of money, and from the increaſe of the value of Corn and other Commodities, &c. that a Fellow who has an Eſtate in Land of inheritance or a perpetual penſion of five pounds per annum, may conſcientiouſly keep his Fellowſhip, and ought not to be compelled to leave the ſame, tho' the Statutes of his College (founded between the years 1440, and 1460*) did then vacate his* Fellowſhip on ſuch condition. Lond. 1707. 8vo.

'The reader ſees from this large title the nature of this treatiſe; but it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the great learning and labour neceſſary for compoſing it, does not ſo readily appear, and therefore our dwelling upon it a little, cannot be diſagreeable to thoſe who are deſirous of knowing on what foundation the high and univerſal character of this Prelate ſtands. The great point to be determined was, what annual income in the reign of Queen Anne was equivalent to five pounds a year in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and this with a view to a caſe of conſcience of very conſiderable extent, for the old ſtatutes remaining in force, there was nothing plainer than that the Fellows of Colleges to whom they related, and their ſuperiors, were equally concerned to know what five pounds in an equitable ſenſe might be extended to, on account of the changes that had happened to money, and to every thing purchaſed with money, the rather, becauſe if this could be done, it would afford an eaſy and invariable rule for determining the like caſes for the future, a thing that might alſo be highly ſerviceable another way, or rather many other ways. Now the method he took in reſolving this queſtion, was, without diſpute, the faireſt and the moſt ſatisfactory that could be deviſed. Firſt, he undertook to ſettle the value of money in the two different periods, and then by enquiring into the price of neceſſary commodities, and into the correſponding alterations of ſalaries and wages, he gave a clear account of all the variations incident to that ſum, which through this ſeries of time the ſtatute ſuppoſed ſufficient to purchaſe a ſingle man in a collegiate ſtate the neceſſaries of life; in conſequence of which deduction it appears, that the true equivalent of five pounds in King Henry the Sixth's reign, was thirty pounds in the reign of Queen Anne; that is to ſay, a man in the latter reign might live juſt as well, and no better, upon a clear annuity or rent charge of thirty pounds per annum, than he could have done, if he had been to live in the reign of Henry the Sixth upon five pounds.

It was thought very extraordinary in this learned Prelate, that in a Sermon preached upon a State Faſt, which called for univerſal obſervation, he ſhould equally defeat the expectation of all parties; for the whole tenor of it was directly oppoſite to the ſentiments of thoſe who were ſtiled high churchmen, and the following picture at the cloſe was as little calculated to pleaſe ſome other people; nay, there are a few ſtrokes in it which he knew could not be pleaſing even to the royal ear; but in all his converſation with Courts, Biſhop Fleetwood had never picked up ſo much knowledge of this world, as to conceive his intereſt in it, comparable to the obligation he was under of ſpeaking in that place only what was juſt and right; and perhaps, it was this noble zeal for truth, which gave that ſpirit that glows in the following periods.

'As for the praiſes that are beſtowed upon King 'Charles the Firſt, I know not who ſhould envy them, 'nor how a Church of England Miniſter can honeſtly 'decline them: he muſt know nothing of that Prince's 'hiſtory; he muſt have little ſenſe of juſtice, grati'tude, or honour, by whom his memory is not held 'moſt precious. It were a ſmall thing to ſay, no Prince with that dignity and ſpirit which might have been expected from his private character, and which was perfectly agreeable to his function. He viſited his dioceſe, and his charge upon that occaſion ſhews, that he was a zealous, though not a furious, churchman (o). It has been thought one of the moſt perfect things in it's kind, and contains with much plainneſs and perſpicuity various inſtances of his great learning, not introduced with any view of ſhewing it, but perfectly adapted and abſolutely neceſſary to the ſubject [K]. The diſlike he had to the prevailing ſpirit in thoſe days, of magnifying the regal power in ſuch an indiſcreet manner as to repreſent tyranny in the light of the ordinance of God, and the moſt abject ſlavery as founded in the principles of religion, induced him to write upon that ſubject in ſuch a manner, as he thought moſt ſuitable to the temper of the times, and to which therefore he did not think proper to fix his name, but choſe rather that it ſhould go abroad into the world under an aſſumed character. On other occaſions he preached and publiſhed his ſermons as uſual, and their peculiar merit always procured them that reception they deſerved [L]. His Lordſhip, who was a man of much wiſdom and penetration, had not only an earneſt concern for the peace and proſperity of his own country, but a tender and Chriſtian-like ſenſe of the miſeries that might be felt in other nations, from that arbitrary ſcheme of extending her dominions through a great part, and her influence to the very extremities of Europe, which had been the characteriſtick of the policy of France, during the ſpace of a century at leaſt (p). It was this that made him diſſatisfied with the meaſures taken at the latter end of the Queen's reign, which diſſatisfaction, as it proceeded entirely from principle, ſo he never ſtudied to conceal it on one ſide, or ever ſhewed the leaſt inclination to vary from it on the other. A friend of his has ſet his conduct in this reſpect in a very true light [M]. He maintained his credit, notwithſtanding

' (altho' his father was a learned one) but I will ſay ' no private gentleman, did ever underſtand the con- ' ſtitution of our Church better, defend it with ſtronger ' arguments, adhere to it with more judgment, adorn ' it with better manners, live up to its good princi- ' ples with more virtue, nor in performance of its ' offices ſhew more devout and exemplary good beha- ' viour. I will not in theſe things, except the Queen ' upon the throne, nor that bleſſed Saint in heaven ' her ſiſter, than did King Charles the Firſt. No Prince ' did ever ſhew more perſonal favour to its miniſters, ' nor give more countenance and credit to its diſci- ' pline and orders. And muſt I ſay, no Prince but he ' did ever die in its defence to juſtify the high eſteem ' we have him in? I may; becauſe it is ſo true, that ' they who envy him the glory of that title upon all ' accounts beſides, will yet allow he fell a Martyr for ' the Church of England. Would not that Church be ' moſt deſervedly the hatred and reproach of all the ' world, that ſhould be ſparing of her praiſes and beſt ' incenſe, but let it ever be unhallowed incenſe to his ' memory? Let them to make an end take heed, leſt ' ſome degree of guilt be thought to make thoſe people ' over tender, who are ſoon offended with the praiſes ' of King Charles the Firſt. And let even us our- ' ſelves take heed, that ſuch our praiſes may appear ' ſo well deſigned, and be managed with that good ' temper, ſobriety, and modeſt truth, that they pro- ' voke thoſe men to nothing but compunction, and ' relentings, and repentance, where theſe things are ' wanting, and both ourſelves and them to the imita- ' tion of all thoſe excellent good qualities, thoſe civil ' virtues, and thoſe religious Chriſtian graces that ' made him appear ſo highly exemplary both in life ' and death.'

[K] And abſolutely neceſſary to the ſubject.] The title of this celebrated charge runs thus.

XXIV. The Biſhop of St Aſaph's charge to the Clergy of that Dioceſe in 1710, and now made publick by his Lordſhip's permiſſion. Lond. 1710. 4to.

A Biſhop's charge at his viſitation ſeems to be, and indeed is, a thing ſo much of courſe, that the bare mention of it amongſt our Prelate's works might appear ſufficient upon the ſubject, but the caſe is far otherwiſe. Our Biſhop conſidered every thing not in the way of its being eaſieſt or ſooneſt, but of its being beſt done. Certain it is, that as he carried many things in the opinions of the beſt judges as high as they could go, ſo he aimed at perfection in all. He had obſerved that a Biſhop's charge was often ſo much a piece of oratory, that there was little in it of reaſon or conviction; that for the ſake of brevity, even the moſt important points were ſeldom dwelt upon, and yet that the ſhorteſt charge ſeemed tedious, by being repeated over and over again, at different places during the ſame viſitation. Againſt theſe inconveniencies our Prelate reſolved to guard; therefore his charge is as ſerious a thing as the ſubject, to which it chiefly relates, the care of men's ſouls. It is very methodical, and every point of it is illuſtrated at large, in which there is much learning, more good ſenſe, but above all a true ſpirit of ſincere piety. It was, contrary to the uſual method, printed before the viſitations, and ſent to the Clergy of his Dioceſe a conſiderable time before the Biſhop made his viſitation, that they might have leiſure not only to read, but to weigh, to conſider, and to comply with it. It has been ſaid, that his diſcourſes on relative duties formed an excellent ſyſtem of the doctrines; it may with equal truth be affirmed, that this charge is an admirable epitome of the diſcipline of the Church of England. In ſhort, like the reſt of Biſhop Fleetwood's writings, it is a true model of what ſuch a thing ſhould be, it is full of thoſe ſentiments, it is delivered in that language, it breaths the ſpirit, and carries in it the authority of a Chriſtian Biſhop. This I am ſenſible is ſaying a great deal, but I am at the ſame time as ſenſible, that it is ſaying no more than it deſerves, or than muſt be ſaid by any man who peruſes it with tolerable attention.

[M] In a very true light.] Our Biſhop ſays he, ' Who was a ſteady friend to the old Miniſtry, be- ' cauſe he ſaw they had ſerved their country well and ' faithfully, could not be drawn to give any counte- ' nance to the meaſures of the new one, though en- ' deavours had been uſed, and intimations given by ' the Queen herſelf who had a great value for him, ' how pleaſing his frequent coming to Court would be ' to her. But his ſentiments will beſt appear from his ' own words, in a letter to a friend to whom he uſed ' to ſpeak and write his mind freely; " When my duty " to the Queen, and the good of my country, will per- " mit it, my gratitude will never let me vote againſt " my friends. When I have ſaved my conſcience, I give " myſelf up to what I call my honour, and therefore " under all the diſcouragements I can be, I ſhall always " be on the ſide of the late Miniſtry, becauſe I know " they ſerved the Queen and nation ſo well, that I am " morally withſtanding his difference with the Miniſtry, ſo entire, that when a faſt was appointed while the peace was in agitation, he was made choice of by the Houſe of Lords to preach before them upon that occaſion (q); but, by ſome means or other, the contents of his ſermon were either gueſſed at or known, and ſuch as thought they ſhould hear nothing from him that would pleaſe them, contrived to get the Houſe of Peers adjourned beyond the day, which indeed put it out of our Prelate's power to deliver what he had collected before the Houſe of Peers in a body, but notwithſtanding this he printed and put his ſentiments into the hands of the people [N]. This gave much offence to ſome great Miniſters of State, who very eaſily knew, from the ſpirit and language of the ſermon, from whom it came, and reſolved not to let ſlip any future opportunity of ſhewing their reſentment, for, how much ſoever it provoked, this, could give them none. It was not long, however, before the warmth of our Prelate's temper furniſhed them with the occaſion they wiſhed for, nor did they neglect it. Before this, however, the Biſhop of St Aſaph ſent abroad another tract of his without his name, in reference to Lay Baptiſm, about which a controverſy had been raiſed that made a great deal of noiſe. Our Prelate very well knew on how ſandy a foundation

(q) Account of his Life and Writings, p. 7.

" morally aſſured they never will be ſerved better, and " whenever they are I ſhall certainly be on their ſide " who do that ſervice; I think I may be allowed to " act as clear and diſintereſted a part as any man of " our order, for ſure, if I could ſhift my ſide I might " be well accepted, conſidering what relation I have " had to one (the Earl of Rocheſter) who governs all, " and who is very civil to me upon all occaſions; but " the meaſures we are in are by no means pleaſing to " me, as what will never do the nation's buſineſs; and " I foreſee that all our millions and our blood ſpent " for theſe twenty years paſt, will end in a deſpicable " peace, which yet we muſt pitifully ſue for too." When he was aſked about two years after this, his opinion of the ſituation of our publick affairs, his anſwer was. ' I have been, and am ſtill in ſo ill humour ' with relation to them, that I hardly can endure to ' think of them. We were in the greateſt honour ' abroad of any nation in the earth, we are now the ' ſcorn of all people: our friends hate us, and our ' enemies laugh at us. We ſhall neither have a good ' peace nor a good war, France will not give us the ' firſt, and we ourſelves have cut off the means of the ' laſt. The diſgrace of the Duke of Malborough was ' worth a million at leaſt, and yet I do not hear we ' got a farthing by it, which I impute not to our ho- ' neſty and virtue, but to our folly, malice, infatua- ' tion, and the great haſte we are in to be undone. ' The Parliament has paſſed ſuch a cenſure upon the ' Duke, that I dare aver no equal number of men in ' all the world, of what nation or religion ſoever, ' would have done. But the laying him aſide is ſo ' ſtrange a thing, that people are put to all their ſhifts ' to account for it, and to make it go down with the ' world, muſt invent, exaggerate, and ſay, and do ' any thing to make him appear worthy of ſuch uſage; ' but I expect it will turn to his enemies miſchief, as ' it certainly does to his honour, that after ſo keen ' and malicious an inquiſition into his conduct, their ' great maſter ſhould be able to accuſe him of nothing, ' but of doing what all Generals have done before ' him, and what King William always did.'

[N] Into the hands of the people.] The title of this extraordinary diſcourſe, which, as we have obſerved in the text, was printed, tho' never preached, ran in the following words.

XXVII. A Sermon on the Faſt-day, January the ſixteenth, 1711-12. againſt ſuch as delight in war. By a Divine of the Church of England. Lond. 1712, 8vo. The text is, Pſalm lxviii. 30. Towards the end he has the following paſſage. ' The war we are ' engaged in is acknowledged to be juſt, and the ſuc- ' ceſſes God has crowned it with have been aſtoniſh- ' ingly great. And therefore they who now tell us ' that we entered wrong into it, are thoſe I doubt ' who would have us go wrong out of it; or if they ' mean that we have been at too great charge, it is ' manifeſt they know not how to value thoſe ſucceſſes. ' But I would ſpeak to Engliſhmen. Theſe great ſuc- ' ceſſes it is plain have not been overbought, becauſe ' we are told it is by them that the enemies have been ' ſo far reduced, as to make propoſals for treating of ' a general peace. Would they have done it then ' without theſe great ſucceſſes? Or could we have ' obtained theſe great ſucceſſes at a leſs expence? I ' am as glad to confront ſo ſenſeleſs a ſlander with ſo ' great an authority, as I am to ſay, that our enemies ' have been at as great expence at leaſt to loſe their ' country, cities, and their armies, as we have been ' to win them, take them, and overcome them; and ' that their children, and their childrens children, ' will be paying debts (if arbitrary governments pay ' debts) contracted by diſgraces, loſſes, and defeats, ' which left them fighting ſtill in chains and ſlavery; ' while our poſterity ſhall be diſcharging debts, con- ' tracted by their fathers to leave them the Proteſtant ' Religion, a Proteſtant Succeſſion, and which muſt ' keep them both their liberties. Our enemies them- ' ſelves will hardly have the malice or the confidence ' to ſay this nation is an enemy to peace, or that ' whatever could be done has not been done, in order ' to the obtaining it. But we ſhall alſo give them ' cauſe I hope to ſay, that all that can be done, in ' order to the carrying on the war, is alſo done. The ' firſt without the laſt would only give them a plea- ' ſure that we owe them not, and make us their ſcorn ' who have been hitherto their terror. But let us not ' ſo much as preſage the leaſt evil. I know very ' well in whoſe hands, under God, we are. This is a ' peace or war, that is not like any other peace or ' war, that we or our fathers have ſeen. It is one of ' the greateſt misfortunes that could befal a nation at ' this time, if peoples conſideration can be ſo ſhort ' and ſlight as to think this treaty will determine ' only, whether they ſhall ſave a little money by ' peace, or ſpend a little more by carrying on the ' war. Whereas, it will determine, in all likelihood, ' whether they ſhall ever have abilities and power ' again of giving or refuſing. I do not mean, that ' we ſhall article for or againſt a new Religion, a ' new Government, and a new King; but I mean, ' that unleſs the peace be good, thoſe things will cer- ' tainly follow in their time, without and againſt all ' articles. And therefore no man can be too ſollici- ' tous about this great event, that will determine the ' fortune of Europe for many years, and it may be ' for many ages, and, for our own particular, deter- ' mine in its conſequence of all we have. And there- ' fore they who are in earneſt, zealous for the glory ' and the ſafety of the Queen, the preſervation of ' the Proteſtant Religion, and the Proteſtant Succeſ- ' ſion, and for the Engliſh laws and liberties, will ' certainly beg of God ſo to direct, guide, and aſſiſt ' thoſe whom the Queen employs in this moſt nice ' and perilous affair of treating, that ſuch a peace ' may be obtained as will ſecure them all to us and ' our poſterity, or ſhould the war be ſtill found neceſ- ' ſary, that he would go forth with our armies in the ' moſt glorious and ſurpriſing manner he hath hi- ' therto done, and raiſed us up (he only can) a Ge- ' neral wiſe, and brave, and fortunate, as was our ' laſt.' This was indeed exceeding ſtrong, but it ap- pears to have flowed from a true ſpirit of patriotiſm, and not from any private prejudice or perſonal diſlike to thoſe who were intruſted with power, tho' it is ſo far from being impoſſible, that, to ſpeak the truth, it is not at all improbable, they took it in quite another light, and believed that they were by this very ſermon denounced to the Britiſh nation, as the betrayers and enemies of their country.

foundation that ſuperſtructure ſtood which he judged it expedient to demoliſh, and he did his buſineſs very effectually, but in ſo maſterly a manner that his hand was known, and many people concluded from the method and manner of the piece that it could be none but his, which perhaps added ſomewhat to the reputation it obtained [O]. In the month of May 1712, his Lordſhip ſent abroad four ſermons that he had preached upon particular occaſions, the lateſt of them in the year 1710, and the earlieſt above twenty years before; to which he prefixed a preface, ſhewing the occaſion of their being committed to the preſs at this time, in which there was nothing very extraordinary, at leaſt in compariſon of what befel it, and the noiſe it made (r). There was no taking advantage of the ſermons, for they were received with applauſe when they were preached, and therefore there could be nothing criminal in printing them either at this or any other time; but for the preface it was a new thing, it had the Biſhop of St Aſaph's name, and in that was diſtinguiſhed from the ſermons which had excited their diſlike. Of this preface therefore they took hold, and, upon a motion made for that purpoſe in the Houſe of Commons, an order was made to burn it. What end this anſwered is not eaſily underſtood, for it made both preface (s) and ſermons more generally read, and conſequently more generally admired [P]. It

[O] To the reputation it obtained.] This diſpute took riſe from a perſon's publiſhing a book againſt Lay-Baptiſm, who had been himſelf baptized by a perſon not epiſcopally ordained, and who therefore judged it expedient to be rebaptized; ſo that his book was calculated to defend his own practice which was likewiſe juſtified and recommended, by the Reverend Dr Hickes a very learned man, but very rigid in his principles, and a very warm writer. The title of our author's book, was as follows.

XXVIII. The Judgment of the Church of England in the caſe of Lay-Baptiſm, and of Diſſenters Baptiſm. By which it appears, that ſhe hath not by any public Act of her's, made or declared Lay-Baptiſm to be invalid. The ſecond edition. With an additional letter from Dr John Coſin, afterwards Biſhop of Durham, to Mr Cordel, who ſcrupled to communicate with the French Proteſtants upon ſome of the modern pretences. Lond. 1712. 8vo. The ſecond part of the Judgment of the Church of England in the caſe of Lay-Baptiſm, and Diſſenters Baptiſm. Lond. 1712. 8vo.

To what has been ſaid of this treatiſe in the text we ſhall add very little here, and that from the writings of another Prelate, in order to ſhew the conſequences of this extraordinary controverſy. 'A conceit was taken up, ſays Biſhop Burnet (3), of the invalidity of Lay-Baptiſm, on which ſeveral books have been writ; nor was the diſpute a trifling one, ſince by this notion the teachers among the Diſſenters paſſing for Laymen, this went to the rebaptizing them and their congregations. Dodwell gave the riſe to this conceit, he was a very learned man, and led a ſtrict life, he ſeemed to hunt after paradoxes in all his writings, and broached not a few; he thought none could be ſaved but thoſe who by the ſacraments had a federal right to it, and that theſe were the ſeals of the covenant: ſo that he left all who died without the ſacraments, to the uncovenanted mercies of God; and to this he added, that none had a right to give the ſacraments, but thoſe who were commiſſioned to it, and theſe were the Apoſtles, and after them Biſhops and Prieſts ordained by them: it followed upon this, that ſacraments adminiſtred by others were of no value. He purſued theſe notions ſo far, that he aſſerted that the ſouls of men were naturally mortal, but that the immortalizing virtue was conveyed by Baptiſm given by perſons epiſcopally ordained.——This ſtrange and precarious ſyſtem was in great credit amongſt us, and the neceſſity of the ſacrament, and the invalidity of eccleſiaſtical functions, when performed by perſons who were not epiſcopally ordained, were entertained by many with great applauſe: this made the Diſſenters paſs for no Chriſtians, and put all thoughts of reconciling them to us far out of view: and ſeveral little books were ſpread about the nation to prove the neceſſity of rebaptizing them, and that they were in a ſtate of damnation till that was done, but few were by theſe arguments prevailed upon to be baptized: this ſtruck even at the Baptiſm by midwives in the Church of Rome, which was practiſed and connived at here in England, 'till it was objected in the conference held at Hampton-Court, ſoon after King James the Firſt's acceſſion to the Crown, and Baptiſm, was not till then limited to perſons in Orders. Nothing of this kind was ſo much as mentioned in the year 1660, when a great part of the nation had been baptized by Diſſenters, but it was now promoted with much heat. The Biſhops thought it neceſſary to put a ſtop to this new and extravagant doctrine; ſo a declaration was agreed to, firſt againſt the irregularity of all Baptiſm by perſons who were not in Holy Orders, but that yet according to the practice of the Primitive Church, and the conſtant uſage of the Church of England, no Baptiſm in or with water, (In the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt) ought to be reiterated. The Archbiſhop of York at firſt agreed to this, ſo it was reſolved to publiſh it in the name of all the Biſhops of England; but he was prevailed on to change his mind and refuſed to ſign it, pretending that this would encourage irregular Baptiſm: ſo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with moſt of the Biſhops of his Province reſolved to offer it to the Convocation. It was agreed to in the Upper-Houſe, the Biſhop of Rocheſter only diſſenting: but when it was ſent to the Lower-Houſe, they would not ſo much as take it into conſideration but laid it aſide, thinking that it would encourage thoſe who ſtruck at the dignity of the Prieſthood. This was all that paſſed in Convocation.'

It muſt be allowed, that the whole of his Lordſhip's Preface bore very hard upon thoſe that were then intruſted with the conduct of publick affairs. It is by much too long for us to tranſcribe, but the paragraph that was thought to have drawn the cenſure of the Houſe of Commons, concludes that piece and runs thus. 'Never did ſeven ſuch years together paſs over the head of any Engliſh Monarch, nor cover it with ſo much honour: the Crown and Sceptre ſeemed to be the Queen's leaſt ornaments. Thoſe other Princes wore in common with her, and her great perſonal virtues were the ſame before and ſince. But ſuch was the ſame of her adminiſtration of affairs at home, ſuch was the reputation of her wiſdom and felicity in chooſing Miniſters, and ſuch was then eſteemed their faithfulneſs and zeal, their diligence and great abilities in executing her commands: to ſuch a height of military glory, did her great General and her Armies carry the Britiſh name abroad: ſuch was the harmony and concord betwixt her and her allies: and ſuch was the bleſſing of God upon all her counſels and undertakings, that I am as ſure, as hiſtory can make me, no Prince of ours, was ever yet ſo proſperous and ſucceſsful, ſo loved, eſteemed, and honoured by their ſubjects and their friends, nor near ſo formidable to their enemies. We were, as all the world imagined then, juſt entring on the ways that promiſed to lead to ſuch a peace, as would have anſwered all the prayers of our religious Queen, the care and vigilance of a moſt able miniſtry, the payments of a willing and obedient people, as well as all the glorious toils and hazards of the ſoldiery, when

It was far from affecting the Biſhop, who knew very well that this was the pure effects of party rage, and that it would be diſapproved even by the wiſer and better part of thoſe who differed from him in ſentiments. He could not therefore be at all troubled about a thing that diſcredited his adverſaries as much as they meant to diſcredit him. On the contrary, he looked upon it as a complement made him by miſtake, for whatever faction has power may burn what they pleaſe, or rather what diſpleaſes them, and thoſe writings will ever diſpleaſe a faction moſt, that they are leaſt able to diſprove. The fire is a concluſive but not a convincing argument, it will certainly deſtroy any book but it refutes none. How far theſe were his Lordſhip's ſentiments, and how little he felt from the uſage which his preface had met with, the reader will learn from a letter of his to the Biſhop of Saliſbury (t), which is inſerted in the notes [Q]. As times of publick diſturbance, or thoſe of animoſity and confuſion which generally precede them, afford the emiſſaries of the Church of Rome the faireſt opportunity of practiſing upon weak and unwary minds, our Prelate could not help ſeeing, with much regret, that theſe practices were carried on very openly and ſucceſsfully in his dioceſe, where the pious gratitude due to Almighty God for the cures wrought by a mineral water, was diverted, by the boldneſs with which a certain Legend (u) was propagated; he thought it highly worthy of his notice, and for that reaſon compoſed and publiſhed a treatiſe, in which he examined this matter to the bottom, demonſtrating fully how very uſeful the knowledge of Hiſtory and Antiquities may be to a Proteſtant Divine; and in doing this he acted with ſo much candour, as left even thoſe whom he oppoſed no room to object [R]. He gave, not long

My Lord,

' I Received the favour of your Lordſhip's letter, and
' took it, as I know it was intended, very kindly.
' The manner of my receiving the indignity put upon ' my Preface, was neither like a Chriſtian nor Philo-' ſopher, but like a very worldly man. I knew the ' whole proceſs, and knew it to be a piece of revenge
' taken by a wicked party, that found themſelves
' ſorely ſtung, and it affected me accordingly, i. e.
' very little. I am not one that love to be the talk ' of the town, and in this part I confeſs I was uneaſy,
' although I think the talk was very much in my fa' vour. The complaint was made by Hungerford,
' and ſeconded by Manley, people that ſhould indeed
' have been ordered to have burnt it, and thirded by
' what we call the Court, and carried by numbers
' without a wiſe word ſaid againſt it; Sir Peter King,
' Sir Joſeph Jekyll, Mr Lechmere, and others of the ' Robe, were very ſtrenuous advocates in its behalf;
' and ſo were other gentlemen, but to no purpoſe, for
' the Court divided one hundred and nineteen, and ' my friends but fifty four. If their deſign was to in' timidate me, they have loſt it utterly; or if to ſup' preſs the book, it happens much otherwiſe; for every ' body's curioſity is awakened by this uſage, and the ' Bookſeller finds his account in it above any one elſe.
' The Spectator has conveyed above fourteen thouſand
' of them into other people's hands, that would other' wiſe have never ſeen or heard of it. In a word, my ' Lord, when I conſider that theſe gentlemen have
' uſed me no worſe, than I think they have uſed their ' own country, the Emperor, the States, the Houſe
' of Hanover, and all our allies abroad, as well as all
' the braveſt, wiſeſt, and honeſteſt men we have at ' home, I am more inclined to become vain, than any ' ways depreſſed at what has befallen me; and intend
' to ſet up for a man of merit upon this very ſtock.
' But pleaſantry apart my heart is wounded within me,
' when I conſider ſeriouſly whereabouts we are, and
' whither we are tending. The Court party do now ' own publickly, that except the allies accept of the ' conditions that are offered them, King Philip is not ' to make any renunciation, and certainly the allies
' cannot accept of thoſe conditions, unleſs they are ' diſtreſſed to the laſt degree; we muſt and ſhall have
' a ſeparate peace in ſpite of all that can be ſaid, and ' that muſt be without a renunciation on the part of ' France, and without a guaranty from the allies, and ' what a peace is that like to be? It is now ſaid, that ' England is to conſtrain the King of France, to con' tent the States with a Barrier to their liking, and ' that the reſt will come in or ſtand out without any ' danger; but I am afraid England has loſt all her
' conſtraining power, and that France thinks ſhe has
' us in her hands, and may uſe us as ſhe pleaſes, which ' I dare ſay will be as ſcurvily as we deſerve. What ' a change has two years made? Your Lordſhip may ' now imagine you are growing young again, for we ' are fallen methinks into the very dregs of Charles
' the Second's politicks, ſaving that then they were
' more reaſonable, becauſe our enemy was then in ſo
' full power and luſtre, as might both terrify and ' dazzle a poor luxurious Prince that would not be ' diſturbed, nor ſeem to care much what became of ' England after he was gone. The preſent times may ' put you in mind of thoſe with this bad difference
' ſtill, that now the ruinous effects of thoſe advices
' ſeem to be taking place, after an interval of five or
' ſix and twenty years, and after ſuch an interruption
' as one would have thought, ſhould have quite baffled
' and deſtroyed them. I find, my Lord, upon reading
' my letter, that I have entered upon deep matters,
' which, conſidering the times and the Spaw waters I ' have taken, I ought not to have done. You will I ' hope excuſe me, for methought I was talking with ' you who I believe favour me. I have, I thank God,
' an entire truſt in his goodneſs, and know he has
' hitherto preſerved us beyond all reaſonable hopes,
' without and againſt all our deſervings; but will he
' ſtill go on to ſave us againſt our will, and in the ' midſt of our endeavours to deſtroy ourſelves? I hope
' he will, for elſe I think we are a loſt people. I ' pray God to preſerve your Lordſhip and all your ' family.'

I am,

[R] No room to object.] The title of this work of our author's runs thus.

long after, a very ſingular ſpecimen of pious benevolence in a new and very extraordinary way, which was by ſending abroad, though without his name, a ſermon on the execution of a Gentleman for the murder of another Gentleman, with whoſe wife he had lived in a criminal converſation; which affair, though it made then a great noiſe, our Prelate apprehended might not make that impreſſion which the laws of God and man required, and for which publick executions are chiefly calculated. This ſermon had a very great ſale, and it may be preſumed from thence had a very good effect [S]. Upon the demiſe of the Queen, and the Hanover ſucceſſion taking place, our Prelate had as much reaſon to expect that his zeal and ſervices ſhould be conſidered as any of his rank or function; but he was very far from making any diſplay of his merit, or uſing even the lawful means of making it known to the King or his Miniſters. But as his ſervices were not of a nature to be concealed, ſo it was not long before they were rewarded. Upon the death of Dr John Moore Biſhop of Ely, July 31, 1714 (w), Dr Tenniſon, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſtrenuouſly recommended the choice of Biſhop Fleetwood for the vacant See, and he was accordingly, without the leaſt application directly or indirectly, nominated thereto, and actually tranſlated December the 18th in the ſame year (x). His new preferment had no other effect, than to quicken his diligence in the diſcharge of his duty in all it's branches, and in this way he continued to diſtinguiſh himſelf as far, and as long, as his ſtrength would permit, with indefatigable induſtry (y), of which the publick is in poſſeſſion of inconteſtible evidence, ariſing from a variety of excellent writings upon different ſubjects, of which ſome notice will be taken at the bottom of the page [T]. XXX. The Life and Miracles of St Wenefrede together with her Litanies, with ſome hiſtorical obſervations made thereon. London printed for Sam. Buckley, at the Dolphin in Little Britain, 1713. 8vo.

Our Prelate ſhews us in his Preface what the motives were, which induced him to beſtow ſo much pains upon the life of St Wenefrede, that the concourſe of people to the well which carries her name was very great; that the Papiſts made uſe of this to influence weak minds, that they had lately reprinted a large life of this Saint in Engliſh; that theſe conſiderations might juſtly affect any Proteſtant Divine; and that for certain reaſons, which he did not think fit to explain, they affected him in particular. He farther obſerves, that Bollandus the Jeſuit, and other Popiſh writers, had taken the freedom of obſerving, that the inhabitants of England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and Bretagne in France, were remarkable for ſwallowing any kind of legend, and that ſuch as were laught at and deſpiſed elſewhere, met with very ready credit in any of theſe countries, which he thought a little provoking. In reference to the ſtory of St Wenefrede, he compares it with the rules laid down by the great criticks of that communion, for determining the credit and authenticity of all ſuch relations, and he ſhews that if thoſe laws have any foundation it deſerves no credit at all. He farther maintains, that concerning this St Wenefrede there was nothing at all written within upwards of five hundred years, after the time in which ſhe is ſaid to have flouriſhed, that within this period there flouriſhed many celebrated writers, who compoſed works upon ſuch ſubjects, as muſt have induced them to have taken notice of Wenefrede, if her ſtory had been at all known; and that it is impoſſible the legend now inſiſted upon ſhould contain facts worthy of belief, ſince if thoſe facts had ever happened they could never be liable to theſe objections.

But let us hear what he himſelf ſays to the Popiſh votaries. 'In the caſe of pilgrimage, the buſineſs is 'to thank God for his gifts and graces beſtowed upon 'the Saint, or to pray to that Saint for ſomething 'that we want, or to pray to God to hear us for that 'Saint's ſake, or to that Saint to intercede with God 'for us. In all which caſes a Pilgrim ought to have 'the fulleſt aſſurance, and the greateſt certainty that 'is poſſible to be had. Firſt, That Wenefrede did 'once live as ſurely as he himſelf now lives. Secondly, 'That ſhe was a Saint upon earth as ſurely as he is a 'ſinner. Thirdly, That ſhe had her head ſtruck off 'at Holy-well, and miraculouſly ſet on again, as ſurely 'as he is now at Holy-well himſelf, and has his head 'upon his ſhoulders. Fourthly, That ſhe is now glo'rified in Heaven, as ſurely as he is now praying on 'Earth. I would deſire the Pilgrims to this Holy 'Spring to conſider with themſelves, whether they 'can or ought to want any of theſe points of certainty, 'of the life and death, and ſanctity, and glorifica'tion of St Wenefrede, in caſe they are required to 'thank God for her, or to pray to her, and then to 'give me the patience of reading the following ob'ſervations, in which I have endeavoured to ſhew 'that they neither have, nor can have, that certainty 'and aſſurance of her life, and death, and ſanctity, 'which ought to be the bottom of praiſe to God for 'her.' The text of this life is the Engliſh Popiſh life of St Wenefrede, publiſhed by I. F. for we know nothing of him more then thoſe initials of his name, or of the name which he aſſumed; upon which, and upon the Preface, our Biſhop wrote his obſervations; he likewiſe added the Litanies, Prayers, and ſome other Legends relative to the ſame ſtory, which hitherto had lain hid in Libraries, and which might probably have periſhed there if they had not been ſought for upon this occaſion.

[S] Had a very good effect.] This Sermon of our excellent Biſhop was publiſhed under the following title

XXXI. A Funeral Sermon on the Death of Mr Noble; who was executed at Kingſton, for the Murder of a Gentleman, with whoſe wife he had criminal converſation.

The name of the gentleman who was murdered was Mr Sayer, whoſe wife, after running him in debt, had ſeparated from him, and lived in a diſſolute manner. He had obtained a ſearch-warrant, and upon information given him, that Mrs Sayer, her mother, and Mr Noble, who was an Attorney, were at an houſe in Lambeth, Mr Sayer went thither with a peace officer in order to apprehend them, and in a fray which enſued, Mr Sayer was killed by Mr Noble, who was tried for this fact together with the two women, when they were acquitted and he was found guilty. He was a young man of good parts and had much buſineſs, there was, as is uſual in ſuch caſes, a prodigious outcry againſt him till he was found guilty, and then he was in a manner univerſally pitied. Great applications were made to the crown for mercy, but without the leaſt ſucceſs, it was a caſe of ſo ſingular, as well as ſo foul, a nature, that for a long time it was the common topic of diſcourſe; and our charitable Prelate endeavoured to turn this kind of uſeleſs attention to better purpoſe, by repreſenting, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt pathetic terms, the danger of entering into thoſe courſes which lead to ſuch unhappy acts; the wiſdom of embracing ſuch warnings, by recurring to an immediate and ſincere repentance; and finally, the uſefulneſs of ſuch dreadful examples, in order to give a check to the lawleſs vices of men, to protect the innocent from the rage of the guilty, and to execute by the ſword of civil juſtice the ſentence pronounced by the Law of God.

[T] At the bottom of the page.] We are in this note to render the reader a ſhort account of ſuch other treatiſes upon different ſubjects as fell from this learned Prelate's pen, and they were theſe.

XXXII. The Counſellor's Plea for the Divorce of Sir G. D. and Mrs F.

The caſe upon which this plea was formed was as follows. 'I. G. D. without the knowledge and conſent of his father, then alive, but accounted not of ſound judgment, was, at the age of fifteen, by the procurement and perſwaſion of thoſe in whoſe keeping he was, married according to the Church form to M. F. of the age of fifteen. II. This young couple was put to bed in the day time, according to cuſtom, and continued there a little while, but in the preſence of the company, who all teſtify they touched not one the other, and after that they came together no more, the young gentleman going immediately abroad, the young woman continuing with her parents. III. G. D. after three or four years travel returned home to England, and being ſollicited to live with his lawful wife, refuſed it, and frequently and publickly declared he never would compleat the marriage. IV. Fourteen years have paſſed ſince this marriage ceremony was performed, and each party having, as is natural to think, contracted an incurable averſion to each the other, is very deſirous to be ſet at liberty; and accordingly application is made to the legiſlative power to diſſolve this marriage, and to give each party leave, if they think fit, to marry elſewhere.' The reaſons urged againſt ſuch diſſolution were firſt, that each party was conſenting to the marriage, and was old enough to give ſuch conſent, according to the known laws of the kingdom; the male being fifteen years old, the female thirteen; whereas the years of conſent are by law fourteen and twelve. Secondly, they were actually married according to the form preſcribed by the Church of England, the Miniſter pronouncing thoſe ſolemn words uſed by our Saviour. Thoſe whom God has joined, let no man put aſunder. They are therefore man and wife, both by the laws of God, and of the land; and ſince nothing but adultery can diſſolve a marriage, and no adultery is here pretended, the marriage continues indiſſoluble. Our author propoſes a variety of arguments in favour of the divorce, and obſerves, that what makes the marriage contract valid and obliging, is, that a male and female ſhould be at age to conſent, and at liberty to conſent, and ſhould actually conſent to give to each other the uſe and dominion of each other's body, excluſively to all the world beſides, as long as they both ſhall live. This is properly the marriage contract, and common to all nations and religions, and all beyond this is matter of ceremony, decency, and prudence, and ordered by the legiſlative powers of different countries as they ſee convenient. He afterwards ſhews that this was not a compleat marriage, becauſe it never was conſummated. But notwithſtanding all the learned arguments contained in this plea, which were offered at the bar or inſiſted upon in the debate of the Houſe of Lords, the bill was loſt, which was an irreparable misfortune to the parties.

XXXIII. A Thankſgiving Sermon preached at Elyhouſe Chapel, June the 7th, 1716.

XXXIV. A Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Dioceſe of Ely at Cambridge, Auguſt the 7th, 1716. Lond. 1716. 4to.

In this charge our learned Biſhop takes notice of the Dignity of the Prieſthood, and the envy which has ever attended it, which having traced to its ſource, and proved to be altogether incapable of prejudicing religion, or the miniſters of religion, unleſs they concur with their own acts to depreciate themſelves. His Lordſhip then proceeds to the talents and abilities which are requiſite to qualify a man for the due execution of the holy function. 'In order to this, ſays 'he, if we conſult the writings of ſome very famous 'Chriſtian Biſhops and others of old, and be obliged 'to believe them without departing from them in the 'leaſt, we ſhould find them ſo great, ſo many, and 'ſo hard to be obtained, that as I am ſure for my 'own part, ſo I may reaſonably fear that many of 'this aſſembly, deſpairing of ſuch attainments, muſt 'have betaken ourſelves to other callings, who, yet I 'hope ſhall give a good account to God each of our 'Stewardſhip.....According to the flights and exaggerations of thoſe devout and overfervid ſpirits, a very few people were they ſerious would ever go into holy Orders, which ſhould it ever happen would be very prejudicial to religion, tho' overſtocking the Church is alſo not without its miſchief. There was ſomething like this happened in the matter of the bleſſed Sacrament, which may partly account for it. For the two or three firſt Centuries the generality of Chriſtians did frequently, even every Lord's Day, partake of the Lord's Supper; but this their frequency did naturally abate much of their devotion in the performance of that holy ſervice, which godly zealous men perceiving, ſet themſelves to write and preach upon that ſubject, and to raiſe the people's devout affections, and revive their antient fervours, ſaid ſo many fine exalted things, uſed ſo many ſtrong and bold alluſions, and lively figurative repreſentations, both of the Prieſt and Sacrifice, and Preſence, that they quickly made the duty of preparation ſo difficult, and the danger of coming to that table ſo great and dreadful, that even good people were afraid to venture, and rather choſe to ſtay away, altho' invited to that ſupper, than come without what was then made to be the wedding-garment. Thus good well meaning men do often cure one miſchief by another, and till they have tried they know not which is greater. The Biſhop remarks, that it is very well for us, that theſe great men's examples relieve us againſt the rigour of their rules and inſtructions; for after all they have ſaid, they were themſelves Biſhops and Preſbyters, and tho' very learned, and very good, yet not ſo ſuperlatively ſo, but that others might and did equal them.——In the Poſtſcript to this charge dated at Ely, Auguſt the 30th, 1716. he obſerves, that before theſe ſheets were quite finiſhed at the preſs, he received a letter from the Deputies of the Epiſcopal Reformed Churches in Great Poland, and Poliſh Pruſſia, and of the Epiſcopal Bethlenian College in Tranſylvania, wherein they earneſtly entreated him, after the example of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of London, to recommend the moſt deplorable eſtate thoſe Churches and that College were then in, to the charitable conſideration of the Clergy of his Dioceſe. The requeſt ſays he was ſo reaſonable, and the examples ſo good, that I complied with it and followed it immediately.....The Brief will come amongſt you about a month hence, but I hope and deſire you will in ſome of the interim, uſe your endeavours to diſpoſe your people to a more than ordinary liberality, in contributing to the neceſſities of theſe our Chriſtian Brethren of the ſame houſhold of faith with us.' This charge of the Biſhop's was attacked in a bold aſſuming and inſolent Pamphlet, entitled, A letter to the Biſhop of Ely, upon the occaſion of his ſuppoſed late Charge ſaid to be delivered at Cambridge, Auguſt the 7th, 1716. as far as relates to what is therein urged againſt frequent Communion, and for the pretended Epiſcopal Reformed Churches of Tranſylvania, Great Poland and Pruſſia. By Philalethes. Lond. 1717. 8vo. This letter is ſaid to have been written by Mr Matthias Earberry, a Nonjuring Clergyman.

mities brought upon him by his indefatigable labours (z), till at length he found his ſtrength ſo much declined, that he had reaſon to expect a ſpeedy remove from this life to a better, which happened at Tottenham in Middleſex, whither he had retired for the benefit of the air, Auguſt 4, 1723, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age (a), and was interred in the cathedral church of Ely, where a monument is erected to his memory by his Lady, who did not long ſurvive him, with an inſcription, which, having often been publiſhed, it is not neceſſary that we ſhould inſert (b). As to his character, it has been drawn by a very able pen, and one who had the honour and happineſs of being intimately acquainted with him (c), to the following effect: 'He lived an uſeful, ſtudious, and exemplary 'life; ſo conſtantly employed in the good way of his profeſſion, that no man had fewer 'idle hours to anſwer for. He had a juſt ſenſe of the duty of his office, and lived up to the 'dignity of it. He was conſtant in preaching, which duty he diſcharged for many years 'three times a week: it may be truly ſaid, he was the moſt celebrated preacher of his 'time: I need not ſay how uſefully he employed his talent, or with how much elo-'quence; his ſermons fully ſpeak it, which he ſet off with ſuch a ſweetneſs of voice, and 'ſuch a graceful delivery, that he charmed his hearers into the warmeſt attention, and 'left a laſting impreſſion on their minds; and that which made his ſermons more uſeful, 'was the fine vein of caſuiſtry that ran through moſt of them, wherein he diſplayed a 'peculiar talent, in making things plain and eaſy which ſeemed to many difficult, and 'gave diſturbance to weak and honeſt minds: he informed the judgment, and then ſet 'the mind at reſt. To which may be added, what many of his auditors have often ſaid, 'that they ſeldom heard him preach but they learnt ſomething from him, that they had 'never obſerved or heard before. He was a diligent viſiter of the ſick, and a ſkillful 'healer of the wounds of conſcience, for the cure of which ſad malady he was often ap-'plied to by many who were not properly under his care, to whom he was a willing and 'a wiſe inſtructor. And theſe good offices he diſcharged in ſo affectionate and tender a 'manner, that beſides the inward ſatisfaction he had of doing much good, many of thoſe 'who had applied to him expreſſed the grateful ſenſe they had of this his labour of love, 'which he beſtowed upon them, by kind legacies bequeathed to him, ſome of which 'came to his hands after he was a Biſhop. In this ſtation he did not ceaſe to be a 'preacher; he was a conſtant one at St Aſaph, where the choir was well ſuited to his 'voice; not ſo at Ely, where the church was much too large for it; but in his own cha-'pel at Ely-houſe, ſo frequent in the diſcharge of that good part of his office, though in 'the cold ſeaſon of the year, that he has ſometimes preached four and twenty ſermons in the 'ſpace of ſix months. He was a great lover of Antiquities, eſpecially of thoſe of his own 'country; but that did not caſt a ruſt upon his parts, or ſpoil his ſtile, an effect it often 'has upon thoſe whoſe genius leads them early into that kind of ſtudy. He was a uſeful 'Antiquarian, and at the ſame time a fine Preacher. The filling of the churches in the 'dioceſe of St Aſaph, where he was almoſt the general patron, with virtuous and worthy 'men, was what lay near his heart: he often expreſſed the great ſatisfaction he had in 'beſtowing preferments on worthy Clergymen, and was extreamly pleaſed when, upon 'experience and obſervation, he found that the care of their people was matter of con-'ſcience to them. So may it always be, he uſed to ſay, and with increaſe, for without that 'there was no living, but he was ſure no dying, with comfort. He paid little or no regard 'to the importunate ſollicitations of the great men of that dioceſe, if the perſon recom-'mended was not found, upon due enquiry, to be of an unblemiſhed life; and though 'he could not have the ſatisfaction he wiſhed, of filling his churches with men he tho-'roughly approved in other reſpects, yet he took much pains to fill them with men of 'virtue; and if ever he was moved beyond his uſual temper, it was when he found he 'had been deceived by teſtimonials that had little or no truth in them. He had a gene-'rous heart; his hands were always open to thoſe in want, eſpecially to the poorer clergy, 'to whom he often gave money or books, beſides the remiſſion of their fees. He was a 'liberal encourager of every charitable deſign that came in his way, never ſhewing any 'deſire to be rich, except in good works; and he was much pleaſed when he heard that 'any rich man had left ſomething to good uſes, ſaying ſometimes upon that occaſion, 'It were almoſt reaſonable there ſhould be a moderate Purgatory, for ſuch as live and die ſo 'wealthy without doing any good to any body but their children, when there was ſo much want 'and miſery in the world. He was much concerned to ſee ſo much paſſion and uncharita-'bleneſs raiſed by difference in opinion in matters of religion, and thought that mere mi-'ſtakes, and ſuch differences as did not influence practice, were to be borne with. He 'was modeſt and humble almoſt to a fault, qualities rarely to be found in a breaſt ſo re-'plete with knowledge as his was; and as he fled from his juſt praiſes, and was always 'uneaſy under them, ſo he was backward to cenſure others His temper was ſweet 'and even calm and meek, ſo that hardly any thing could diſcompoſe him, no paſſion, 'no reſentment, no partial mixtures, could find a place in his breaſt. To this happy 'temper of mind was joined a good degree of cool and ſedate courage, which he did not 'fail to ſhew whenever a proper occaſion called for it. And, to crown all his other good 'qualities, ſo much innocence of life, integrity of heart, and ſanctity of manners, hardly 'ever met in any one man in a fuller meaſure than they did in him. In a word, this good

'Biſhop excelled in every virtue that conſtitutes a wiſe man, and in every grace that di-'ſtinguiſhes a Chriſtian.' To ſo ample, as well as ſo eloquent a character as this, it would be altogether improper for us to add any thing; but inaſmuch as in a work of this nature it may be juſtly expected, that the teſtimonies to ſo eminent a Prelate's merits ſhould be collected, the reader will find at the bottom of the page ſome inſtances of this kind, from a variety of writers of very different tempers and ſentiments, which may be regarded as an inconteſtible proof of his virtues and abilities; ſince, though it does not always happen, that great and good men are univerſally eſteemed, yet, when the praiſes of different parties are beſtowed upon an eminent perſon, it cannot but be preſumed that his worth muſt be very conſpicuous, to attract the ſuffrages of men of all opinions, in ſpite of thoſe little prejudices and prepoſſeſſions which are ſo apt to warp even the beſt minds, and to hinder them from publickly teſtifying their reſpect for thoſe, whom, in their hearts perhaps, they may ſecretly admire [U]. He left behind him an only ſon, Dr Charles Fleetwood, who inherited his paternal eſtate in Lancaſhire, and had been preſented a few years before by his father, as Biſhop of Ely, to the rectory of Cottenham in Cambridge, which he did not enjoy long.

Of this family and name there have been ſeveral other remarkable perſons, not in this only, but in other nations alſo, particularly in Sweden, where, as we have before obſerved, there is a Baron of that name, deſcended in a direct line from the Fleetwoods of Lancaſhire; and the perſon who now enjoys that honour, is highly eſteemed for his abilities, both civil and military, which have lately procured him conſiderable preferments. It may not be amiſs to obſerve here, that the Swedes look upon the title of Baron as that alone which confers true Nobility, as having annexed to it all the ranks and privileges derived to Nobility by their conſtitution. The crown does indeed beſtow other titles of honour, ſuch as Counts, but they are not much regarded; and the caſe is the ſame in Poland, where titles are aſſumed rather to procure reſpect when travelling through foreign countries, than to draw regard in their own.

[U] They may ſecretly admire.] We find this ſhort character given of our author and his writings, as well as of another Engliſh Prelate, by one whoſe reputation as a critick, will not fail to juſtify what he has advanced in the opinion of all good judges (4). Biſhop Fleetwood's ſoftneſs, and Biſhop Blackhall's plainneſs, are their characters; excellent writers both! The Reverend Dr Hickes (5) acknowledges him for an encourager of his great work, and indeed no wonder it was, that he ſhould lend his aſſiſtance for promoting endeavours ſo advantageous to that ſort of literature, which as it was his earlieſt, ſo it continued to be his lateſt ſtudy. The indefatigable Mr Hearne (6) confeſſes himſelf much obliged to Biſhop Fleetwood, for many ſingular inſtances of his friendſhip, and particularly mentions the preſent he received from him of an antient almanack, which he eſteemed to be, as indeed it was, a very great curioſity; and this ſhews how ready our Prelate was to entertain a free correſpondence with men of real merit, how different ſoever their political principles might be from his own, as in both theſe caſes it is well enough known they were. That candid writer, and eminent Antiquary, Brown Willis, Eſq; ſpeaks according to his manner briefly of our Biſhop (7), of whom he ſays, that he was a general ſcholar, well ſkilled in Antiquities, and very communicative in imparting to him ſeveral collections. It has created ſome wonder, that Biſhop Burnet is ſilent as to our author, in his Hiſtory; but whatever his motives might be, other writers within that period of time have purſued a different conduct; one of theſe, after tranſcribing thoſe paragraphs that gave offence to the Houſe of Commons, when his Lordſhip publiſhed his four Sermons, proceeds thus (8). 'Theſe 'words of eternal truth, pronounced in ſo awful and 'moving a manner, did the majority of this Houſe 'of Commons vote to be malicious and factious, and 'condemned his Lordſhip's Preface to be burnt by the 'hands of the common hangman. The good Biſhop, 'imitating the apoſtolical reſignation, as his perſecu-'tors imitated the Pagan barbariſm and inſolence, 'ſaid only when he was told of it, I eſteem myſelf 'happy to ſuffer with the Duke of Marlborough, the 'Earl of Godolphin, and ſo many other illuſtrious 'Patriots, whoſe reputation their enemies endeavour 'to blaſt; on the other hand, ſays our hiſtorian, this 'treatment of a Prelate of ſuch ſignal merit, ſo un-'blameable a life, and ſo univerſally eſteemed, parti-'cularly by the Queen herſelf, who before was uſed 'to call him her Biſhop, was highly reſented by many 'true ſons of the Church.' The Reverend Mr William Whiſton, a man of great probity and a free ſpeaker, admired our Prelate as a preacher when he was a young man at the Univerſity, and admired him too as a Biſhop, which appears from the following ſtory that he tells us (9); after having mentioned ſeveral inſtances of the danger that the beſt men run of being corrupted in courts, he proceeds thus. It puts me in mind of what that excellent preacher and liver Biſhop Fleetwood, as I have been informed, ſaid upon the like occaſion. 'This good Biſhop once came to the Houſe of Lords 'a little too early, and overheard certain perſons de-'bating this queſtion, Whether a Courtier could be a 'Chriſtian or not? And when at length the company 'perceived he was there, they would needs have his 'opinion. He replied he was no Courtier, nor would 'determine that queſtion: but he acknowledged that 'he had learned ſo much by their diſcourſe, that it 'was not very fit for a good Chriſtian to go to Court.' In the additions that have been made to an eminent Prelate's hiſtory of Engliſh Biſhops, we are told with regard to this worthy perſon, that his works being in all hands and his character univerſally eſteemed made it unneceſſary to be inſiſted upon there. FLEMMING or FLEMMYNGE (RICHARD) Biſhop of Lincoln in the XVth century, and founder of Lincoln-college in Oxford, was deſcended from a good and ancient family (a), and born at Croſton in the county of York (b). After having been educated in grammar learning in his native county, he was ſent to University-college in Oxford; where he ſo improved himſelf in Logic and Philoſophy, that he met with no difficulty in obtaining his degrees; an honour which was then conferred only upon a few (c) [A]. On the 22d of Auguſt 1406, he was preſented, or collated, to the prebend bend of South-Newbald in the church of York, vacant by the resignation of Tho. Langley Bishop of Durham (d); and, the next year had the honour of being one of the Proctors of the university of Oxford (e) [B]: but never was Chancellor of the same, as the famous Mr Leland hath asserted (f). Soon after taking his Master of Arts degree, he warmly espoused J. Wiclef's cause; and so strenuously asserted his opinions, that great numbers (and of those some of the first quality) drawn in by his example, or convinced by his arguments, loudly declaimed against the corruptions of the Church of Rome. But, persons whose interest it was to maintain those corruptions, found means either to awe, or to bribe, him into silence. And, which is not much to his credit, he became as violent an opposer of Wiclef's doctrines, as he had heretofore been a patron of them [C]. So that the college he founded at Oxford (of which we shall presently give an account) was designed as a seminary for writers and disputers against that learned man's opinions (g). In the year 1415, he exchanged his prebend of South Newbald for that of Langford, in the cathedral church of York (h): and, some time before, was also made Rector of Boston in Lincolnshire (i). His learning, and perhaps withal his zeal against Wiclef, having recommended him to the esteem of King Henry V, he was promoted by him to the bishopric of Lincoln (k), having been first appointed by the Pope (l). He was then Professor, or Doctor, in Divinity (m). The temporalities of his See were restored to him May 23, 1420 (n). In the year 1424, he was sent to the Council of Constance, or Sienna; where, in the presence of Pope Martin V, he made a very elegant speech in vindication of his country against the calumnies and aspersions of the Spanish, French, and Scottish Deputies [D]; which procured him great applause (o). And then, I suppose it was, he was made Chamberlain to Pope Martin aforesaid (p). Upon his return from the Council, he caused Wiclef's bones to be taken up and burnt, as had been decreed in that assembly (q). The See of York being then vacant by the death of Dr Henry Bowett, the Pope by his own absolute authority translated Dr Flemming to that Archbishoprick; and he had restitution of the temporalities Decemb. 1, 1424 (r) [E]. But King Henry V, who by his late conquest of France was grown so powerful as to have no cause to dread the Pope's indignation or censures, so vehemently opposed this translation, jointly with the Chapter [F], that the Bishop was content to go back to Lincoln again (s). But though he met with this great disappointment, he pursued his design, of founding a college in Oxford, to be a seminary for Divines, to write, preach, and dispute against Wiclef's opinions. For that purpose, he obtained a licence from King Henry VI, dated Octob. 12, 1427, wherein he was impowered to found a college [G], which of the sixteenth century. For Thomas Arundell, who was Archbishop of Canterbury from the year 1396 to the year 1413, had no other degree but that of Bachelor of Arts (2); tho' he was a very considerable and eminent person in his time. [C] He became as violent an opposer of Wiclef's doctrines, as he had heretofore been a patron of them.] As an instance of which, he suffered himself to be nominated one of the committee, that was chosen by the University of Oxford, for examining heretical books, and particularly Wiclef's, in the year 1411 (4). Mr Wood questions, whether our R. Flemmyng was one of that committee. His reasons are, that, after the nomination of it, he finds, our author had maintained opinions in the schools, which in those times were accounted downright heresy: That they were condemned by those commissioners, and opposed with so much sharpness by Nicolas Ponce of Merton-college, that Flemmyng appealed to a general congregation. But the Archbishop of Canterbury ordered, his appeal not to be admitted; and injoined, that Flemmyng, and his adherents, whom he called beardless boys, and not fit to appear in the schools, should be punished according to their deserts. Mr Flemmyng thinking himself ill used, carried his complaints to the King, who having examined the whole affair, writ to the University in his favour. But the University making unnecessary delays in taking off the censures they had passed on him, the King sent other pressing letters: which, it is probable, were duly obeyed. ——— On these accounts, A. Wood is inclined to believe, either that there were two Richard Flemmyngs then in the University; or that this our Richard was not one of those commissioners; unless perhaps some time after (5). But, since he was one of the Proctors of the University in the year 1407; into which office he would undoubtedly never have been chosen, if he had continued publicly to maintain Wiclef's opinions: And, since J. Bale assures us (6), that his disputes with Ponce were before he was chosen one of the committee; we may therefore conclude, that he had renounced those opinions before the year 1411, or even perhaps before the year 1407.

[F] So vehemently opposed this translation, jointly with the Chapter.] Bishop Godwin gives us this account of it. 'The Pope of his own absolute authority, 'placed then in Yorke Richard Fleming Bishop of 'Lincolne. Many statutes and lawes had beene made 'to represse this tyrannicall dealing of the Pope. But 'his excommunications were such terrible bugs, as 'men durst rather offend the lawes of their country, 'then come within the compasse of his censures. Yet 'the Deane and Chapter of Yorke taking stomacke 'unto them, used such advantage as the Law would 'affoorde them, and by force kept out the new Archbishop from entring his Church. Much ado there 'was between them. The event was, that the Pope 'unable to make good his gift, was faine to returne 'Fleming to Lincolne again. ——— (*)

[G] Wherein he was impowered to found a college.] He was impowered to found this college in the Church of All-Saints in Oxford, of which he was patron; and to unite and annex it to the same, together with the Churches of St Mildred and St Michael near Northgate, which were also in the patronage of his See. And the said Churches so united, annexed, and incorporated, to name the Church of All-Saints; and to erect which ſhould conſiſt of one Warden, or Rector, and ſeven Scholars; and bear the name of The College of St Mary and All-Saints of Lincoln in the Univerſity of Oxford. Having thus obtained the royal licence, he ſet about his foundation; but before he had made any conſiderable progreſs in it, death ſnatched him away. However, he left money and effects in the hands of ſome perſons, which he appointed Overſeers of his new foundation; and they carried it on, and ſettled it, with all imaginable care and expedition (t). He died at his palace at Sleford, January 25, 1430-31; and was buried in Lincoln cathedral, under a raiſed tomb, with a long rhyming Epitaph [H], faſhionable in the times of ignorance he lived in (u). Bale, and Pits, mention two pieces written by him; and the latter ſays, his Works were long preſerved in the library of Lincoln-college: but they ſeem to have been no more than the ſpeeches he made at the Council of Sienna (w). After his deceaſe, his college met with ſeveral benefactors, but none ſo conſiderable as Thomas Rotherham, alias Scot, then Biſhop of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbiſhop of York [I], who deſerves the name of a ſecond founder. Its revenues have been alſo conſiderably augmented, by the munificence of ſeveral other generous and charitable perſons [K].

erect and convert it into a collegiate church, or a college; and to annex to the ſame a chantry in the Church aforeſaid, of which the Mayor of Oxford for the time being was patron. Ordaining, that there ſhould be in this new foundation two Chaplains, to be placed or removed at the Rector's pleaſure: that the Rector and Scholars ſhould be perpetual patrons of this Church; and capable of purchaſing lands, rents, and tenements, not exceeding the yearly value of ten pounds.—— This point obtained, the Founder employed ſome perſons to buy tenements, on the ſite whereof he intended to erect his new college. Accordingly they bought Deep-hall, belonging to St John Baptiſt's Hoſpital without Eaſt-gate, and a few other buildings. The Biſhop's death ſtop'd their further proceedings, when the firſt ſtone was hardly laid. However, certain truſtees appointed by him on his death-bed, placed a Rector, ſeven Scholars, and two Chaplains in his new foundation; which were to be maintained out of the revenues of the Churches abovementioned. And in the room of Deep-hall; and of two others, call'd Brend-hall, and Wyncheſter-hall, purchaſed about the year 1438; and of St Mildred's Church, taken down in the year 1436, was the college built, partly in the manner in which it now ſtands.

There is nothing remarkable in this long Epitaph; except, that Pope Martin conſecrated him Biſhop of Lincoln with his own hands. The reſt is a doleful deſcant upon the frailty of human nature; which might have been compriſed in much fewer words. ——His arms on his tomb are, barry of ſix argent and azure; in chief three fuſills; in baſe a mullet, gules.

[I] After his deceaſe, his college met with ſeveral benefactors, but none ſo conſiderable as Thomas Rotherham, alias Scot, then Biſhop of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbiſhop of York] This great man was born at Rotherham in Yorkſhire, and ſucceſſively became Fellow of King's College Cambridge, Maſter of Penbroke-Hall, Chancellor of that Univerſity, Prebendary of Sarum, Chaplain to King Edward IV. Provoſt of Beverley, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, Secretary to four Kings, Biſhop of Rocheſter, then of Lincoln, and at length Archbiſhop of York, and Lord Chancellor from the year 1475, to 1483, tho' with ſome interruption (10). What induced him to this munificent benefaction, is thus related In the year 1474, coming to Oxford, on his epiſcopal viſitation, John Triſtroppe Rector of this college preached before him, out of Pſalm lxxx. 14, and 15. ver; and from thence took occaſion, ſo pathetically to invite him to commiſerate their tender vine, their poor half-built college, that the Biſhop immediately promiſed he would do what the Rector had ſo earneſtly pleaded for. Accordingly, the year following, he compleated the edifice; increaſed the number of Fellows from ſeven to twelve, appropriating for their maintenance the Churches of Twyford in Buckinghamſhire, and Combe longa in Oxfordſhire; and gave the Society a Body of Statutes (they having none before) ſubſcribed with his own hand, Feb. 11, 1479. wherein he ordained, among other things, that the Fellows ſhould be choſen out of the Dioceſes of Lincoln, York, particularly Rotherham if any fit, and Bath and Wells (11).

Our author's nephew, or kinſman, ROBERT FLEMMING, deſerves alſo to be mentioned here, on account of his learning, and particularly of his ſkill in poetry and polite literature. He was educated at Oxford (x), and probably in Lincoln-college, then newly founded by his uncle, or kinſman. On the 21ſt of January 1451, he was admitted Dean of Lincoln (y), being famous for his knowledge and ingenuity. But, for his further improvement, he went to Italy, and viſited the Learned, and the univerſities; particularly, he attended the lectures of the celebrated Orator and Poet Baptiſta Guarini, who was Profeſſor of the Greek and Latin languages at Ferrara: And who had the honour of having for his hearers, ſeveral Engliſh gentlemen [L], eminent for their birth, and other diſtinguiſhing qualifications (z). From Ferrara our author went to Rome, where he ſtayed a year or two (a); and contracted an acquaintance with ſeveral learned men, eſpecially with Bartholomew [M] Platina, Librarian of the Vatican (b). He became alſo known to Pope Sixtus IV, in whoſe praiſe, during a ſummer's receſs at Tibur or Tivoli, he compoſed a poem in two books [N], inſcribed to his Holineſs: who was ſo pleaſed with it, that he made the author his Protonotary (c). At his return from Italy, he brought over with him ſeveral books curiouſly illuminated, and ſome of them of his own compoſition [O], which he bequeathed to Lincoln-college-library (d). On the 27th of September 1467, he was inſtalled into the prebend of Leighton-Manor, in the cathedral church of Lincoln (e); which he exchanged, December 3, 1478, for that of Leighton-Boſard (f). He founded in the cathedral abovementioned, namely in Trinity-chapel, a chantry for two Chaplains, which was valued at 14*l.* 6*s.* 9*d* (g). And dying Auguſt 12, 1483 (h), was buried near Biſhop Fleming his relation (i). His name is mentioned with honour by ſome of his contemporaries [P].

FLETCHER (RICHARD) Biſhop of Briſtol, and afterwards tranſlated to Worceſter, and London, in the XVIth century, was born in Kent (a). He received his univerſity-education in Bennet, or Corpus-Chriſti, college, in Cambridge, of which he was Fellow (b). It doth not appear from the Regiſter-books of that univerſity, when he took his degrees: but, in 1572, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, being four years ſtanding in that degree at Cambridge (c); and if ſo, muſt have been admitted about the year 1561. On the 30th of September 1572, he was inſtituted to the prebend of Iſlington in St Paul's cathedral, London, which he reſigned in October 1589 (d). The 15th of November 1583 he was made Dean of Peterborough (e), but never Biſhop of that See, as Dr Fuller hath aſſerted (f). He was inſtalled into the prebend of Sutton longa in the church of Lincoln, January 23, 1585, and reſigned it in 1592 (g). He was alſo Rector of Alderkirke in Lincolnſhire (b). On the 8th of February 1586, he attended Mary Queen of Scots at Fotheringhay, at the time of her execution; and exhorted her, among other things, 'to apply Chriſt's meritorious obedience to her ſoul 'with the hand of true Faith,————and to make Chriſt her only ſacrifice for her ſins, 'and a ranſom for her redemption.' But ſhe deſired him, three or four times, not to trouble himſelf, nor her. For ſhe was ſettled in the ancient Catholick Romiſh Religion; and in defence thereof reſolved to ſpend her blood (i) [A]. In the year 1589 he was promoted

[A] And in defence thereof reſolved to ſpend her blood.] Then Dean Fletcher ſaid to her, 'Madam, 'change your opinion, and repent of your former 'ſins and wickedneſs, and ſettle yourſelf upon this 'ground, that only in Chriſt Jeſu you hope to be 'ſaved.' Then ſhe anſwered again and again with great earneſtneſs, 'Good Maſter Dean, trouble no 'more yourſelf about this matter. For I was born

moted to the biſhopric of Briſtol; being elected November 13, confirmed Decemb. 12, conſecrated Decemb. 14, and enthronized January the 3d following (k). We are told, that he took this See on condition to leaſe out the revenues to Courtiers [B], which he did in ſo extravagant a manner, that he left little to his ſucceſſors; inſomuch, that after his removal from thence, it lay vacant ten years (l). He was about the end of the year 1592 tranſlated to Worceſter; elected January 24, 1592-3, and confirmed February 10, following (m): having, ſome years before, been made Biſhop Almoner (n). Upon the death of Dr Aylmer Biſhop of London, in the beginning of June 1594, he made intereſt with the Lord Treaſurer Burghley to be tranſlated to that See: alledging, that he liked London better than any other town in the realm, as being the place of his education, and of his moſt common reſidence; where he had many agreeable friends, and a conſiderable ſhare in the love and eſteem of the citizens, who deſired that he might be their Biſhop; and amongſt whom his influence might be of great ſervice to the Court. But his requeſt ſeems not to have met with immediate ſucceſs. For, not till above ſix months after, namely December 30, 1594, was he elected Biſhop of London: he was confirmed the 10th of January following (o). A few days after, he being a widower, took to his ſecond wife a very handſome woman, the Lady Baker of Kent (p), ſiſter to Sir George Gifford, one of the Gentlemen Penſioners (q). And, perhaps, one of the ſecret reaſons of the Biſhop's earneſt endeavours for being tranſlated to London, was to gratify that Lady's deſire to live near the Court. Queen Elizabeth, who had an extreme averſion and antipathy to the Clergy's marrying, was highly offended at the Biſhop. She thought this marriage ſo very undecent in an elderly Clergyman, and a Biſhop, who alſo had been married before; that ſhe either reprimanded him with her own mouth, or ſent him a meſſage, not to appear in her preſence any more, nor to come to Court. The Biſhop finding himſelf in this bad condition, applied by letter to the Lord Treaſurer, to repreſent his caſe to the Queen, and to do him good offices. Upon the receipt of his letter, the Lord Treaſurer uſed ſome kind and honourable words concerning him. But,

' in this Religion; I have lived in this Religion; and ' I am reſolved to die in this Religion.' Then ſaid the Earls [of Kent, and Shrewſbury,] who were commiſſioned to attend at her execution, when they ſaw how ſhe diſliked the Dean's exhortation, ' Madam, ' we will pray for your Grace with Maſter Dean, if ' it ſtands with God's good will, you may have your ' heart lightned with the true knowledge of God's ' good will, and his word; and ſo die therein.' Then anſwered the Queen, ' If you will pray for me, I will ' even from my heart thank you, and think myſelf ' greatly favoured by you. But to join in prayer with ' you, my Lords, after your manner, who are not of ' one and the ſelf ſame religion with me, it were a ' ſin: I will not. (1)' It ſeems to have been a very odd undertaking, (and to all appearance unſucceſsful,) to endeavour to perſuade one ſo bigotted to Popery as Mary Queen of Scots was, to renounce, in her laſt moments, that religion whence ſhe expected ſalvation. However, ſo the Queen underſtood it, and ſuch was the drift of the Dean's long and intricate ſpeech, as far as can be collected from the paſſage cited from it above in the text, and alſo from theſe other words out of the ſame..... ' Repent you truly of your former ' ſins and wickedneſs. Juſtify the juſtice now to be ' executed, and juſtify her Majeſty's faithfulneſs to- ' wards you at all times. Have a lively Faith in Chriſt ' our Saviour and Lord: and ſo ſhall you be rightly ' prepared unto death..... The ſpecial means to at- ' tain to forgiveneſs of ſin, is neither in man, nor by ' man, but by Faith only in Jeſus Chriſt crucified..... ' O, Madam, truſt not the devices which God's word ' doth not warrant, which is the true touchſtone, and ' the clear lanthorn to guide our feet into the way of ' peace, Jeſus Chriſt yeſterday, and to day, and the ' ſame for ever.——On him all the Saints call in ' the day of trouble; and have been heard and deli- ' vered, in him have they all truſted, and were never ' confounded. All other ciſterns are broken; and can- ' not hold the water of everlaſting life.—— ' Therefore, Madam, that you may ſo glorify the ' Lord in your laſt paſſage, that you may be glorified ' of him for ever, I moſt humbly beſeech your Grace ' in the tender mercy of God, to join with us preſent, ' in prayer to the throne of Grace; that we may re- ' joice, and you be converted; and God may turn his ' loving countenance toward you, and grant you his ' peace.'——This ſpeech, which is preſerved by the induſtrious Mr Strype (2), doth not give a high idea of the author's capacity. And he hath been ſeverely cenſured for it by the admirers of the Queen of Scots; particularly by A. Wood, who obſerves, that he ' being the perſon appointed to pray with, and for, ' her, did perſuade her to renounce her religion, con- ' trary to all Chriſtianity and Humanity (as it was by ' many then preſent ſo taken) to her great diſtur- ' bance (3).' Mr Camden calls it, Verboſam orationem (4), a long-winded ſpeech.

[B] We are told, that he took this See on condition to leaſe out the revenues to Courtiers.] This we learn from Sir John Harrington, whoſe account be pleaſed to take in his own words (5). ' I fortuned to be one ' day at the Savoy with Mr Secretary Walſingham, ' where Mr Fletcher was then upon his diſpatch for ' Briſtoll. A familiar friend of his meeting him there, ' bad God give him joy, my Lord elect of Briſtoll: ' which he taking kindly and courtly upon him, an- ' ſwered, " that it had pleaſed indeed the higher " powers ſo to diſpoſe of him. But, ſaid his friend " in his eare, do you not leaſe out tot & tot (6) to " ſuch and ſuch." He, clapping his hand on his ' heart, in a good gracefull faſhion, replied with the ' words of Naman the Syrian, Herein the Lord be mer- ' ciful to me; but there was not an Elizeus to bid him ' go in peace.' What ſhall I ſay for him? Non erat hoc hominis vitium ſed temporis. [This was not the fault of the man, but of the time.] I cannot ſay ſo, for I have written otherwiſe in a book of mine, Libro 3. nº. 80.

' Alaſs a fault confeſt were half amended,
' But ſin is doubled, that is thus defended,
' I know a right wiſe man ſayes and believes
' Where no receivers are, would be no theeves.

' Wherefore at the moſt I can but ſay, Dividatur, ' [let it be divided] He was a well ſpoken man, and ' one that the Queen gave good countenance to, and ' diſcovered her favour to him even in her reprehen- ' ſions, as Horace ſaith of Mecænas.

——Rerum tutela mearum
Cum ſis, & prave ſectum ſtomacheris ob unguem;

' for ſhe found fault with him once for cutting his ' beard too ſhort; whereas good lady (if ſhe had ' known that) ſhe would have found fault with him ' for cutting his Biſhoprick ſo ſhort.'

[C]

But, notwithſtanding, the Queen ſoon diſpatched an order to Archbiſhop Whitgift, to ſuſpend the Biſhop from the exerciſe of his epiſcopal function: which was accordingly executed, on the 23d of February, by the Archbiſhop himſelf in perſon. The ſeverity of this ſentence filled Biſhop Fletcher with the utmoſt grief and uneaſineſs, as appears by the copy of a letter of his inſerted in the note [C]. He lay ſome months under the weight of this ignominious cenſure, before he was reſtored. For it was not till July 1595 that the Lord Treaſurer ſignified to him, the Queen was in a good meaſure reconciled to him, and would give inſtructions and order to the Archbiſhop, to take off his ſuſpenſion: for which he was extremely thankful [D]. But tho' he was reſtored to the diſcharge of his function, yet, notwithſtanding all the entreaties of his friends, and thoſe ſome of the higheſt quality, the Queen would not permit him to come into her preſence for a twelvemonth; tho' for twenty years before he had waited in his place upon her perſon. This long abſence from Court the Biſhop laid much to heart; which induced him, in January following, to ſollicit the Lord Treaſurer, his former friend and mediator, to prevail upon the Queen that he might be admitted into her preſence. Whether the Biſhop ever recovered the place he once had in her Majeſty's favour, we cannot certainly learn (r); tho' we are told, that ſhe promiſed and gave him a viſit at Chelſea (s) [E]. However, his diſgrace ſat ſo heavy upon his mind, that it is thought to have haſtened his end. He died ſuddenly in his chair, at his houſe in London; being to all appearance well, ſick, and dead, in one quarter of an hour, June 15, 1596 (t). Mr Camden ſays, that he died by immoderate taking of tobacco (u) [F]. And others, that he died of diſcontent, thro' the Queen's diſpleaſure at him for his marriage; having had little enjoyment ſince he was made Biſhop of London (xx). It is certain that he died ſuddenly, whilſt taking tobacco, which was not uſually taken in thoſe days, unleſs phyſically, or as a melancholy companion (x). He was buried in St Paul's cathedral, without any monument (y) [G]. As to his perſon, and character: He was courtly, and well ſpoken (z); of a comely perſon, and goodly preſence (a) [H]. He loved to ride the great horſe, and had much ſkill in managing thereof: he was condemned for very proud (ſuch his natural ſtately garb) by ſuch as knew him not, and commended for humility by thoſe that were acquainted with him (b). We do not find that he ever publiſhed any thing. One of his ſons, John Fletcher, of whom you have an account above, was a very ingenious Poet.

Profeſſing '[to the Lord Treaſurer, to whom his letter was 'written] that he could have wiſhed, when he heard 'it, he had alſo heard (if juſtice would ſo have permitted) to have been ſequeſtered from his life itſelf. 'He added, that he knew how much his Lordſhip's 'approbation and grave mediation might in ſuch caſes 'avail with her Majeſty. Which if it might pleaſe 'him to vouchſafe him, he ſhould, he was perſwaded, 'with the whole Eccleſiaſtical State, be honoured for 'it; and give to himſelf matter of bond to his Lord'ſhip in all chriſtian devotion and dutifull obſervance.' This letter was dated from Chelſea, Feb. 24 (7).

[D] For which he was extremely thankful.] He expreſſed his great acknowledgment for it in this other letter to the Lord Treaſurer Burghley,——— 'That 'to hear of the leaſt her Highneſs gracious inclination 'towards him, in her princely clemency, he could 'not ſufficiently expreſs to his good Lordſhip, how 'greatly it had recomforted him, having theſe ſix 'months thought himſelf (as the Prophet ſpake) free 'among the dead, and like unto him that is in the 'grave; made unprofitable unto God's and her Ma'jeſty's ſervice. That to hear of it alſo, as drawn on 'and wrought by his Lordſhip's honourable intereceſſion, and ſo kind mediation, it had greatly added to 'his joy and alacrity. I do therefore, (as he pro'ceeded) give your Lordſhip my intireſt thanks, be'ſeeching your Lordſhip to be perſuaded, that among 'ſo many to whom your Lordſhip hath been Magnus 'Euergetes [a great benefactor] there ſhall be none 'found, whoſe duty and devotion ſhall henceforth 'exceed his, who with his hand and heart giveth your 'Lordſhip this teſtimony of love and obſervance (8).'

So that many writers, and, amongſt the reſt, that Royal Pedant King James I (11), drew their pens againſt it. However, tho' ſome are confident that it is of the poiſonous ſort (12), common experience now ſhows, that it may be conſtantly uſed without danger, or even any viſible inconvenience. FLETCHER (GILES) author of the Ruſſe Common Wealth, and brother to Richard Fletcher Biſhop of London, of whom you have an account in the laſt article, was alſo born in Kent. He received his education in Eaton ſchool (a); and, in the year 1565, was elected Scholar of King's-college in Cambridge (b), where he took the degrees, of Bachelor of Arts in 1569; of Maſter of Arts in 1573; and of Doctor of Laws in 1581 (c): and became an excellent Poet (d). His abilities recommending him to that great judge of merit, Queen Elizabeth, he was employed by her as Commiſſioner into Scotland, Germany, and the Low-Countries (e). In the year 1588, he was ſent Embaſſador to Muſcovy; not only to conclude a league with Theodore Juanowich Emperor of that country, but alſo to re-eſtabliſh and put into good order the decayed trade of our Ruſſia Company. He met at firſt with a cold reception, and even with rough uſage. For the Dutch, it ſeems, envying the excluſive privilege which the Company juſt now mentioned enjoyed of trading thither, had done them ill offices at that barbarous and arbitrary Court. And a falſe rumour then ſpread, of our fleet's being totally deſtroyed by the Spaniſh Armada, had created in the Czar a contempt and diſlike for the Engliſh nation, thinking he might ſafely injure thoſe who were not in a capacity of being revenged. But the Embaſſador ſoon effaced thoſe ill impreſſions, and having obtained good and advantagious conditions [A], returned to England with ſafety and honour (f) [B]. Shortly after his return, he was made Secretary to the city of London, and one of the Maſters of the Court of Requeſts (g). Alſo, on the 20th of June 1597, he was conſtituted Treaſurer of St Paul's London (h). From the obſervations he had made during his embaſſy he drew up a curious account 'of the Ruſſe Commonwealth: or Manner of Government by the Ruſſe Emperor (commonly called the Emperor of Moſkovia) with the Manners and Faſhions of the People of that Countrey [C].' Printed at London in 1591, 8*vo*. But it was quickly ſuppreſſed, [A] And having obtained good and advantagious conditions.] They were to this effect. 1. A continuation of league and amity between the Queen and the Emperor Theodore Juanowich, in like manner as was with his father Juan Baſilowich. 2. A confirmation and re-eſtabliſhment of the former privileges of the company of our Engliſh merchants, which were infringed and annulled in the principal points, with divers neceſſary additions, for the better ordering of their trade in thoſe countreys hereafter; viz. that the ſtate of the privilege granted before in the names of ſome private and particular men, be altered in that point, and the ſame granted by the name and ſtile of their incorporation, viz. to the fellowſhip of Engliſh merchants for the diſcovery of new trades. 3. That upon every ſurmiſe and light quarrel, the ſaid privilege be not revoked and annulled, as before time it hath been. 4. That juſtice ſhall be adminiſtred to the ſaid company and their agent without delay, upon ſuch as ſhall offer them any deſpite or injury, or ſhall exact or impoſe upon them any payment, taxation, or impoſition whatſoever, contrary to the freedom of the ſaid grant. 5. That the goods and commodities of the ſaid company be not forcibly taken as before time they have been by the Emperor's officers or people of authority, either for the uſe of the ſaid Emperor or of his officers. But in caſe they have need of the ſaid commodities, the ſame to be taken at reaſonable prices, and for ready money. 6. That the ſaid company be not charged hereafter with the anſwering of ſuch debts as are made by any Engliſhman not being of the ſociety. 7. That the Emperor's authorized people ſhall not hereafter repute any Engliſhman reſident in that countrey, to be factor, ſervant, or dealer in the ſaid company's affairs, but ſuch as the agent ſhall regiſter by name, within the offices where cuſtom is entered in all ſuch places of the land where the ſaid company have reſidencies to traffick. 8. That the names of ſuch as ſhall be ſo regiſtered be no longer continued in record, nor themſelves reputed as factors or dealers for the ſaid company, than the agent ſhall think good. But in caſe the ſaid agent ſhall think meet to ſtrike out of the regiſter any name of ſuch as have been employed in the company's ſervice, the ſaid perſon to be held as private, and whoſe act in bargaining or otherwiſe, ſhall not charge the ſaid company. 9. That if any Engliſhman within the countrey of Ruſſia be ſuſpected for any notorious crime, as felony, treaſon, &c. the ſame be not ſtraightways ſet upon the Pudkey (*), nor otherwiſe tormented, till ſuch time as he ſhall be convicted by plain and evident proofs: which being done, the whole proceeding to be ſent over to the Queen of England. 10. That the ſaid privilege with the additions, ſhall be publiſhed in all towns and parts of the Emperor's dominions, where the ſaid company have traffick. 11. That the ſaid company ſhall be permitted to uſe a ſole trade through the Emperor's countries, by the river Wolga into Media, Perſia, Bulgaria, and the other eaſt countries. 12. Whereas there was claimed of the ſaid company the ſum of 23,553 marks of debt, made by certain of the factors of the ſaid company, for payment whereof their whole ſtock was in danger of arreſt by publick authority; and alſo 2140 rubles for cuſtoms and houſerent, he obtained an abatement of eighteen thouſand one hundred and fifty three marks of the ſaid debt (1). ——The Ruſſia company to which theſe privileges were granted, was firſt incorporated by Charter, in the 1ſt and 2d of Philip and Mary; afterwards confirmed by Act of Parliament in the 8th of Queen Elizabeth (2).

The private behaviour, and manners of the Ruſſe people.——There are ſeveral particulars in this book, no leſs wonderful than true. As, for inſtance, what he ſays of the intenſe cold of that climate (6).—— 'The rivers and other waters 'are all frozen up a yard or more thick, how ſwift or 'broad ſoever they be. And this continueth com- 'monly five months, viz. from the beginning of No- 'vember till towards the end of March, what time 'the ſnow beginneth to melt. So that it would breed 'a froſt in a man to look abroad at that time, and ſee 'the winter face of that country. The ſharpneſs of 'the air you may judge of by this: for that water 'dropped down or caſt up into the air, congealeth 'into ice before it come to the ground. In the ex- 'tremity of winter, if you hold a pewter-diſh or pot 'in your hand, or any other metal, (except in ſome 'chamber where their warm ſtoves be) your fingers 'will freeze faſt unto it, and draw off the ſkins at the 'parting. When you paſs out of a warm room into 'a cold, you ſhall ſenſibly feel your breath to wax 'ſtark, and even ſtifling with the cold, as you draw 'it in and out. Divers not only that travel abroad, 'but in the very markets and ſtreets of their towns, 'are mortally pinched, and killed withall: ſo that 'you ſhall ſee many drop down dead in the ſtreets, 'many travellers brought into the towns ſitting dead 'and ſtiff in their ſledds. Divers loſe their noſes, the 'tips of their ears, and the balls of their cheeks, their 'toes, feet, &c.——And yet in the ſummer time 'you ſhall ſee ſuch a new hue and face of a country; 'the woods (for the moſt part which are all of fir and 'birch) ſo freſh and ſo ſweet, the paſtures and mea- 'dows ſo green and well-grown (and that upon the 'ſudden) ſuch variety of flowers, ſuch noiſe of birds '(ſpecially of Nightingales, that ſeem to be more 'loud and of a more variable note than in other coun- 'tries) that a man ſhall not lightly travel in a more 'pleaſant country.——As the winter exceedeth 'in cold, ſo the ſummer inclineth to over-much heat; 'ſpecially in the months of June, July, and Auguſt, 'being much warmer than the ſummer air in England. '—— (7). In winter-time, when all is covered 'with ſnow, and the ground ſo hard frozen, as that 'no ſpade, nor pickax can enter, their manner is not 'to bury their dead, but to keep the bodies (ſo many 'as die all the winter-time) in an houſe, in the ſu- 'burbs, or out parts of the town, which they call 'Bohſedom, that is God's houſe: where the dead 'bodies are piled up together, like billets on a wood- 'ſtack, as hard with the froſt as a very ſtone, till the 'ſpring tide come, and reſolveth the froſt: what time 'every man taketh his dead friend, and committeth 'him to the ground.'——The account he gives of the arbitrarineſs of the government there, is ſurprizing, but well known (8). 'To ſhew his ſovereignty over 'the lives of his ſubjects, the late Emperor Juan Va- 'ſilowich in his walks or progreſſes, if he had miſ- 'liked the face or perſon of any man whom he met 'by the way, or that looked upon him, would com- 'mand his head to be ſtruck off. Which was pre- 'ſently done, and the head caſt before him.'—— He enlarges more fully upon that point, in the dedication of his book to Queen Elizabeth.—— 'My 'meaning, ſays he, was to note things for mine own 'experience, of more importaunce than delight, and 'rather true than ſtrange. In their manner of go- 'vernment, your Highneſs may ſee both: a true and 'ſtrange face of a tyrannical State, (moſt unlike to 'your own) without true knowledge of God, without 'written law, without common juſtice: ſave that 'which proceedeth from their ſpeaking law, to wit, 'the Magiſtrate who hath moſt need of a law, to re- 'ſtrain his own injuſtice (*). The practiſe hercof as it is 'heavy, and grievous to the poor oppreſſed people 'that live within thoſe countries: ſo it may give juſt 'cauſe to myſelf, and other your Majeſty's faithful 'ſubjects, to acknowledge our happineſs on this be- 'half, and to give God thanks for your Majeſty's 'moſt Prince-like, and gracious Government: as alſo 'to your Highneſs more joy and contentment in your 'Royal Eſtate, in that you are a Prince of ſubjects, 'not of ſlaves, that are kept within duty by love, not 'by fear.'——It was, undoubtedly, for theſe paſſages that the book was ſuppreſſed, as is ſaid above: but it was reprinted at London in 1643. 12mo. and is inſerted in R. Hakluyt's Navigations, Voyages, &c. Vol. 1. p. 474, &c. only a little contracted. FORTESCUE, FORTESKEWE, or FOSKEWE (Sir JOHN), an able Stateſman, an excellent Lawyer, a general Scholar, Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, and, as is commonly admitted, Lord High Chancellor of England, in the reign of King Henry the Sixth (a). A perſon ſo remarkable every way for abilities, dignities, and misfortunes, that it is, in reality, not a little ſtrange we ſhould not hitherto have had a better account of him; more eſpecially ſince ſeveral attempts have been already made to this purpoſe, and that too by perſons equally capable, and one would have thought willing, to have given the world all the light poſſible into the perſonal hiſtory of ſo worthy, ſo learned, and ſo great a man [A]. He was indiſputably deſcended from the antient family of Forteſcue,

(a) Bale de Script. major. Brytan. cent. viii. 36. p. 613.

[A] So worthy, ſo learned, and ſo great a man] It ſeems a little ſtrange, that Leland, in his hiſtory of Engliſh authors, has not ſo much as mentioned Sir John Forteſcue, and tho' this defect might ſeem to be in ſome meaſure ſupplied by the accounts given of him, by Bale and Pits, yet what they ſay of him is rather by way of character, and even in that they are not much to be depended upon, ſince Bale tells us, that, ſtep by ſtep, he roſe to the office of High Chancellor of England, which great office in the ſtate he executed teſcue, in the county of Devon; but ſome diverſity there is as to his immediate parentage. The Reverend Mr Prince, who had the inſpection, as he informs us, of pedigrees extracted from the Herald's-Office by Sir William Pole, is very poſitive that he was the ſecond ſon of Sir John Forteſcue of Norreis (b) [B]. But notwithſtanding this, the late Lord Forteſcue, one executed long with much authority and dignity, and more to the ſame purpoſe (1), tho' it is very certain, that he never executed that office in this kingdom at all. He farther informs us, that he was a long time in exile, but upon what account he confeſſes himſelf ignorant, which is a pretty clear proof, that he was very far from being well acquainted with his perſonal hiſtory. As for Pits, in this, as in moſt other articles, he copies Bale, and whenever he ventures to depart from him is very ſeldom in the right. He is ſo cautious as to ſay, that it was reported Sir John Forteſcue paſſed part of his life in baniſhment, which, conſidering the confuſion of the times in which he lived, he thinks might probably be true enough; and then he proceeds to give us a catalogue of his works, of which, according to his manner, he gives us the title of four pieces, and adds, that he wrote ſeveral more, but, without doubt, he was a very indifferent judge of them, ſince the firſt and the laſt that he mentions, is the very ſame book (2) under different titles, an error which he very faithfully copied from Bale, except that in his performance the titles follow each other. They both profeſs to tranſcribe Robert Record, an author who deſerved a better fate than he met with, for he died a priſoner in the King's Bench in the laſt year of Queen Mary's reign (3), but they neither of them mention from what work of his they copied what they wrote, and perhaps, without breach of charity, we may ſuſpect that Pits never ſaw any of our author's books, or perhaps Record's account of him. We cannot doubt that the famous Mr Selden was much better acquainted with the hiſtory of Sir John Forteſcue, than can be collected either from his preface, or the notes he has written upon his book; and it was certainly a little unkind, not to give the world ſome farther lights as to ſo eminent a perſon, when they lay ſo much within his power. Doctor Fuller mentions him in ſeveral of his works (4), and that I think is the moſt that can be ſaid, for he has preſerved nothing worth reading about him in any of them. We might naturally have expected in the very copious preface, addreſſed to Sir John Holland, by the late Lord Forteſcue (5), a larger or at leaſt a more exact account of this reverend Judge; but it falls out quite otherwiſe, for he is very ſhort, tells us nothing which we did not know before, except, that he was poſſeſſed of a manuſcript which he believes Mr Selden never ſaw, and which, ſometime or other, perhaps, might ſee the light, tho' it never did, nor is he ſo kind as to tell us ſo much as its title. One thing he aſſerts which might have been as well omitted, that the remains of this great man are interred in Campden Church, in which there is a handſome monument to his memory, which induced Biſhop Tanner (6) to doubt whether it might not be ſo, whereas the fact is certain, that he was buried at Ebrighton (7) Ebburton, or Ebberton.

[B]. That he was the ſecond ſon of Sir John Forteſcue of Norreis.] The Reverend Mr Prince begins his account of the learned perſon, who is the ſubject of this article in theſe words (8). 'Sir John Forteſcue, 'Knight, Lord Chief Juſtice, and Lord High Chancellor of England, was born moſt likely at Norreis, 'in the Pariſh of North Huiſh, near South Brent in 'this county, he was ſecond ſon of Sir John Forteſcue, 'Knight, Captain of Meaux in France, by his wife '.... daughter and heir of Norreis, of Norreis, who 'was ſecond ſon of William Forteſcue of Wimſton, 'antiently Wimondeſton, in the Pariſh of Modbiry, 'the moſt antient ſeat of this honourable name and 'family in this county or the kingdom, in whoſe poſſeſſion it remained from the days of John King of 'England, to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, about 'four hundred years, ſo runs the antient deed, Rex 'Johannes, per Literas ſuas Patentes, Datas anno 10. 'Regni ſui, conceſſit Johanni Forteſcue, Wymondeſton 'in Com. Devon.' Yet in the ſpace of a few lines, he gives us ſuch an account of this matter as is not very conſiſtent herewith, his words are theſe. 'Here, 'ere I proceed farther in regard of the great variety 'of the families of this name which flouriſh in this 'county, and ſeveral other parts of England in high 'degree, it may not prove unacceptable to the curious herein, to lay down a brief account of the pedigree thereof as an induſtrious Antiquary of our own hath collected it from the Heralds Office. William 'Forteſcue of Wimpſton, ſeventh in deſcent from the 'firſt poſſeſſor, by Elizabeth, ſiſter and coheir of 'Thomas Beauchamp of Ryme, had iſſue, William, 'and Sir John Forteſcue, Captain of Meaux, William 'by Mabilia, daughter and heir of John Falwel, had 'iſſue, John, who by Joan, daughter and heir of 'John Pruteſton de Pruteſton, in the pariſh of Newton Ferrers, had three ſons, John of Wimpſton, 'William of Pruteſton, now Preſton, and John of 'Spridleſton, commonly Spurleſton. Sir John Forteſcue, ſecond ſon of William, Captain of Meaux, 'by the daughter and heir of Norreis as aforeſaid, 'had iſſue three ſons; Henry, who by his firſt wife 'had iſſue, Forteſcue of Wood, whoſe iſſue male failing, his daughter and heir was married unto Forteſcue of Preſton, by his ſecond wife, only daughter and heir of Fallapit, of Fallapit, in Eaſt Allwington had iſſue, Richard Forteſcue of Fallapit, 'whoſe heir male failing in the third deſcent, his 'daughter Elizabeth was married unto Lewis, third 'ſon of Forteſcue of Spridelſton, who hath continued 'the name there unto this day. The ſecond ſon of 'Sir John Forteſcue of Norreis, was Sir John Forteſcue our preſent ſubject, his third ſon was Richard, 'from whom iſſued the ſeveral families of this name 'in the eaſt parts of England, as at Poleſborn in Hartfordſhire, Fulborn in Eſſex, Souldon in Bucks, &c. 'all which ſprang originally from Wimpſton aforeſaid.' It is needleſs to trouble the reader here with the corrections of this genealogy, ſince it will be ſet in a proper light in the next note; it is ſufficient to obſerve that it cannot be right, becauſe that in more inſtances than one it is inconſiſtent with itſelf, which in all probability aroſe from want of duly conſidering the collections made by Sir William Pole, which are on all hands allowed to have been very authentick. We have a very different account of this matter from Mr Waterhouſe (9), who aſſures us, that he had it from Sir John Forteſcue of Salden in Buckinghamſhire, which is conceived in theſe words. 'He was, ſays he, 'third ſon to Henry Forteſcue, ſon of Sir John Forteſcue, Knight, Captain of Meaux, and Governor 'of Bry in France under Henry the Fifth, which Sir 'John was ſecond ſon of William Forteſcue of Wimeſton, in the county of Devon, Eſq; ſo that our 'Chancellor being immediate heir in the eighth deſcent of Sir Richard Forteſcue, Knight, who came 'out of Normandy in the Conqueror's time, was generouſly deſcended by his father, and no leſs by his 'mother, who was a daughter and heir of Beauchamp, his eldeſt brother was Lord Chief Juſtice 'of Ireland, and died iſſueleſs.' The laſt part of this paragraph is directly contradicted by Prince, and indeed by all the accounts of the family of Forteſcue that can be relied upon. It is very true, that the male line in the eldeſt branch failed, but not as is here repreſented. There is yet another account which occurs in the labours of ſo careful and ſo judicious a writer, that it deſerves to be particularly examined, it runs thus (10). 'A gentleman of good ſenſe, who is 'very converſant in the affairs of the family, informs 'me, that Sir John Forteſcue, Lord Chief Juſtice, 'and afterwards Lord Chancellor of England, was the 'third ſon of John Forteſcue, Knight, Captain of 'Meaux, &c. and not of Henry Forteſcue, Chief 'Juſtice of Ireland, who, according to a pedigree of 'the family in his cuſtody, was the Chancellor's eldeſt 'brother. He thinks it pretty plain, for that, the 'fourteenth of Henry the Sixth, Henry Forteſcue, by 'deed indented, did grant and confirm unto John 'Forteſcue his brother, and Iſabella, who was wife 'of the ſaid John, all the meſſuages, lands, and tenements, of John Forteſcue, father of the ſaid Henry, 'in one of the Juſtices of his Majeſty's Court of King's-Bench, and afterwards of the Common-Pleas, is very clear that he was the third ſon of Sir Henry Forteſcue, Lord Chief Juſtice of Ireland (c); and when the matter comes to be fairly examined, it will be found that he is certainly in the right [C]. We have no account where this learned perſon was born (tho' it is very highly probable it was in the Weſt of England), or in what year; we are likewiſe in the dark as to the Univerſity (d) in which he ſtudied, or indeed whether he ſtudied in either; but moſt probable it is that he did, and that he applied himſelf particularly to the Civil Law, in which, we have not only teſtimony to prove, but his writings likewiſe ſhew, that he was very learned (e). It is true that the Reverend Mr Prince (f) thought it probable that he ſtudied at Oxford; and a very learned Prelate (g) ſays, that he was educated in Exeter College, in that Univerſity; but as he cites no authority for this, in reſpect to which no man was more accurate, it is reaſonable to believe that he ſpeaks from conjecture alſo, though certainly, in a point of this nature, any conjecture of his ought to have great weight. When he turned his thoughts to the municipal laws of England, and reſolved, according to the example of his father, to betake himſelf to that profeſſion, he ſettled in Lincoln's-Inn, where he quickly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very extraordinary manner (h), and where it is aſſerted that his lectures were crowded, on account of the high reputation he had acquired in the Civil as well as the Common Law; which is ſo much the more probable, as we have his own authority to prove that the Inns of Court were never in a more flouriſhing condition, or the profeſſion of the Law in greater reverence and eſteem, than at this time (i) [D]. The firſt date that occurs with reſpect to his preferments,

'in Overcomb, Efford, and Alſton, in the parith of 'Holboughton, Devon.' Againſt this account there ſeem to lie two objections, the firſt is, that there was a long deſcent of Forteſcues, the male line of which ended in Sir Francis Forteſcue, who died at the Bath, November the eleventh, 1729. all claiming a deſcent from Sir Henry Forteſcue, Chief Juſtice of Ireland, which does not at all agree with this account, the other objection is, that this Henry Forteſcue mentioned in the deed, might poſſibly be Henry Forteſcue of Wood, eldeſt ſon to Sir Henry Forteſcue, Lord Chief Juſtice, which will agree very well with the deſcent mentioned in the next note.

[C] That he is certainly in the right.] There is no doubt, that the houſe of Forteſcue was ſettled in the county of Devon in the reign of King John, if not before, and that their antient manſion was Winſton in Armington hundred, long ſince paſſed into other hands. It appears from Sir William Pole's manuſcript of Charters, the great Antiquary of that county, that in the thirtieth year of the reign of King Edward the Firſt, Adam Forteſcue, ſtiled ſon and heir of Adam Forteſcue, granted to Henry Lopperigges (11), an annual rent of ſeven ſhillings, which Richard the ſon of Philip uſed to pay him for his tenement in Wimonſton, to which his ſeal is affixed, being an oval ſhield charged with a ſtar, circumſcribed Ade Forteſcue. After him was William Forteſcue of the ſame place, a witneſs to the charter of John and William Ferrers, in the thirty fifth of Edward the Third, as the aforeſaid manuſcript ſhews. And in the ſecond of Richard the Second, being wrote William Forteſcue, Senior, he had a grant with Sir Philip and Sir Peter Courtney, Knights, from Richard Mauldif, called Somaiſter, of lands in Smytheſton, Crencomb, Wympell, and Thurverton. This William married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of John Beauchamp of Kyme, in the county of Lincoln, and had iſſue two ſons, William Forteſcue of Winſton, which branch ended in an only daughter and heir of Thomas Forteſcue, named Jane, married to Edmund Babington of Wyke, in the county of Worceſter, Eſquire. John, the ſecond ſon of the firſt William Forteſcue, was one of thoſe brave Engliſhmen, who ſignalized themſelves under the ſtandard of that victorious Monarch, Henry the Fifth. Which John Forteſcue had the honour of Knighthood conferred on him for his valour in thoſe French wars, and was made Governor of Meaux in Berry. He took to wife * * * * * * * * daughter and heir of William Norris, by whom he had iſſue, Sir Henry Forteſcue, Lord Chief Juſtice of Ireland (12), who had three ſons, firſt Henry Forteſcue of Wood, in the county of Devon, Sir Richard Forteſcue, from whom deſcended the Forteſcues of Punſborn, and the third ſon, was Sir John Forteſcue, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and by his appointment Chancellor. This account is clear, conſiſtent, and well ſupported, ſo that there ſeems to be no reaſon why it ſhould not be willingly received, inſtead of thoſe vague, contradictory, unatteſted ſtories, that are to be met with in ſome books.

(12) Selden, in his Preface to Forteſcue, de laudibus legum, &c.

[D] Than at this time.] The moſt learned Antiquaries in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, whoſe ſentiments we have upon the ſubject of the Inns of Court and Chancery, agree fully in this, that they never were in ſo flouriſhing condition, as in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and that this is a point wholly known from the account given of them by our author, who deſcribes thoſe eſtabliſhments as they ſtood about three hundred years ago, or more, referring that deſcription, not to the time when he wrote his book, but when he ſtudied in them. That very curious relation which cannot but be very acceptable to the intelligent reader, runs thus (13). 'To the intent, moſt excellent Prince, you may conceive the form and 'image of this ſtudy, as I am able I will deſcribe it 'unto you. For there are for theſe ſtudies ten leſſer 'houſes or Inns, and ſometimes more, which are called 'Inns of Chancery, and to every one of them be-'longeth an hundred ſtudents at leaſt, and to ſome of 'them a much greater number, tho' at one time they 'be not ever all together in the ſame. Thoſe ſtu-'dents for the moſt part are young men, ſtudying the 'originals and the elements of the Law, who profiting 'therein as they grow to ripeneſs, ſo are they admitted 'into the greater Inns, called the Inns of Court, of 'which greater Inns there are four in number. And 'to the leaſt of them belongeth in form abovemen-'tioned, two hundred ſtudents or thereabouts, for in 'theſe greater Inns, no ſtudent can be maintained for 'leſs expences by the year, than twenty marks. And 'if he have a ſervant to wait upon him, as moſt of 'them have, then ſo much the greater will his charges 'be. Now by reaſon of this, the children only of 'Noblemen ſtudy the Laws in thoſe Inns, for the 'poorer and common ſort of people, are not able 'to bear ſo great charges for the exhibition of their 'children. And Merchants can ſeldom find in their 'hearts, to burthen their trade with ſo great yearly 'expences. And thus it falleth out, that there is 'hardly any man found within the realm ſkilful in 'the Laws, except he be a gentleman born, and one 'deſcended of a noble ſtock. Wherefore, they more 'than any other kind of men have a ſpecial regard to 'their nobility, and to the preſervation of their ho-'nour and fame; and to ſpeak with the ſtrict regard 'to truth, there is in theſe greater Inns, and even in 'the leſſer too, beſide the ſtudy of the Laws, as it 'were an univerſity or ſchool for the acquiſition of 'all commendable qualities requiſite for Noblemen. 'There they learn to ſing, and to exerciſe themſelves 'in all kind of harmony. There alſo they practiſe 'dancing and other genteel accompliſhments, as they 'are accuſtomed to do, which are brought up in the 'King's houſe. On working days moſt of them ap-'ply themſelves to the ſtudy of the Law, and on holy 'days preferments, is the fourth year of the reign of Henry the Sixth, when, as Sir William Dugdale informs us, he was made one of the Governors of Lincoln's-Inn, and was honoured again with the ſame employment three years after (k). In Michaelmas term 1430, he was promoted to the degree of a Serjeant at Law, and kept his feaſt upon that occaſion, as he himſelf informs us, with very great ſplendour (l) [E]. In 1441, he was in Eaſter term made one of the King's Serjeants at Law (m); and on the twenty-fifth of January 1442, he was conſtituted Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench at Weſtminſter (n). He is highly commended, by ſome of our moſt eminent writers, for that wiſdom, gravity, and uprightneſs, with which he preſided in that Court for ſo many years (o); but certainly they are ſomewhat miſtaken, or have not conſidered the hiſtory of the times in which he lived, who ſuggeſt that he was one of the King's principal Counſellors, and that the Court was in a great meaſure governed by his advice, the direct contrary of which is moſt likely to be true. For we cannot conceive, that ſo mild and good a man, as Sir John Forteſcue was, could act otherwiſe than miniſterially in the trial of many of the friends and ſervants of Humphry Duke of Glouceſter, called by the people the good Duke of Glouceſter, for high-treaſon, who were convicted upon ſlender evidence, and afterwards treated in a manner of which we find no other inſtance in our own, or in foreign records [F]. It is thought that he oppoſed the ‘ days to ſtudy Holy Scripture, and out of the time ‘ of divine ſervice to the reading of Chronicles. For ‘ there indeed are virtues ſtudied, and from them are ‘ vices exiled. So that for the acquiſition of virtue, ‘ and eradicating of vice, Knights and Barons, with ‘ other States, and Noblemen of the realm, place their ‘ children in thoſe Inns, even, tho' they deſire not ‘ to have them learned in the Laws, nor to live by the ‘ practice thereof, but only upon their fathers allowance. Seldom, if at any time, is there heard amongſt ‘ them any ſedition or grudging; and yet the offenders are no otherwiſe puniſhed, than only by being removed from the company of their fellowſhip, which ‘ puniſhment they more fear than other offenders, impriſonment and irons: for he that is once expelled ‘ is never received to be a fellow in any of the other ‘ fellowſhips, and by this means there is continual ‘ peace, and their demeanour is like the behaviour of ‘ ſuch as dwell together in perfect amity.——— ‘ But there is one thing more which I would have you ‘ know, that neither at Orleans, where both the Canon and the Civil Laws are taught, and to which, ‘ for that reaſon, ſcholars reſort from all the adjacent ‘ countries; nor at Anjou, nor at Caen, or any Univerſity in France, Paris only excepted, are there ſo ‘ many youths grown up, employed in ſtudy, as in ‘ theſe Inns of Court and Chancery, tho' there are ‘ none that ſtudy there but what are Engliſh born.' This reflects great honour on that age, tho' poſſibly ſomewhat at the expence of this.

[E] With very great ſplendour.] It is in the ſame book, and in proſecution of the ſame diſcourſe, that our very learned author gives Prince Edward an account of the ſtate and degree of a Serjeant at Law (14), wherein, perhaps, the reader may at firſt imagine there was ſomewhat of vanity, or at leaſt, of an inclination natural enough to old men, that of ſpeaking of himſelf. But whoever conſiders attentively the ſcheme of that book, will ſee quite the contrary. The deſign of its wiſe and worthy author, was to convince the young Prince, his pupil, that England was the country in the world, in which Laws were in the higheſt eſtimation, where they were equally the rule of the King's government, and the meaſure of the ſubjects obedience, and where conſequently neither could deſpiſe them without becoming a tyrant or a rebel. It was natural from hence for him to obſerve, that a Serjeant is a rank or dignity in the Law, unknown in any nation but this, and conſequently the ſtrongeſt mark of the high and univerſal reſpect paid to the profeſſion; to prove this the more fully, he mentions the expence with which the taking this ſtate or dignity was attended, and in doing this he is very brief, he obſerves, that according to the cuſtom then in uſe, they gave a great dinner like the feaſt at a King's Coronation, and continued their entertainments for ſeven days, which when there were eight Serjeants made at a time, amounted to three thouſand two hundred marks, or four hundred marks a piece; he is very particular in marking the number and price of the gold rings, of which, he ſays, not ſo much as a clerk in the Common Pleas, but received one, and that when himſelf was called, thoſe rings coſt him fifty pounds. He takes notice likewiſe, that none could be raiſed to the office of a Judge, either in the King's-Bench, or Common-Pleas, but muſt be of the degree of a Serjeant, to which degree men could not be then raiſed till they had been at leaſt ſixteen years at the bar, which I the rather mention, becauſe it will enable us to form ſome notion of his own age, ſince, if we conſider, that he was called to the degree of Serjeant in 1430 (15), we may very well conclude, that he was born in or about the year 1395, which remark, tho' in itſelf a matter of no great conſequence, will have its uſe hereafter, when we come to mention his tranſactions in the laſt part of his life, where we have great need of conjecture and reflection to conduct us.

[F] In our own or in foreign records.] If this was a convenient place, and the nature of the work would allow us room, what is advanced in the text might be proved beyond all contradiction; that is to ſay, it might be ſhewn that ſuch things were done by the Court, or, to ſpeak ſtrictly, by the Queen and her favourites, as no good man could behold but with great concern. The ſingle inſtance hinted at in the text will be more than ſufficient, conſidering the narrow bounds within which we are circumſcribed, to juſtify what has been ſaid. We take this inſtance however a little higher, for the ſake of connection and perſpicuity, than the fact pointed at in the text abſolutely required (16). ‘ Humphry, the renowned Duke ‘ of Glouceſter, Lord Protector, felt the firſt ſtroke of ‘ the evil angel, which was ſent to puniſh England ‘ and to root out her nobles. This Duke was much ‘ hated by the Queen, and her faction, as the only ‘ man who by his prudence, as alſo by the honour ‘ and authority of his birth and place, ſeemed to impeach that ſovereign command, which they pretended to ſettle in the King's own perſon, but meant ‘ indeed, as the manner is under ſoft Princes, to reign ‘ themſelves in another's name. Many great Lords ‘ were drawn on at the time of a Parliament then in ‘ February 1477, holden at Saint Edmund's Bury, to ‘ concur for his ruin, not perceiving that thereby they ‘ pluckt up the floodgate at which the Duke of York ‘ entered, overwhelming all of them in a deluge of ‘ blood. Whether they had any true or juſt fear of ‘ Glouceſter himſelf, leaſt, perhaps, he ſhould take ‘ revenge upon ſome particular perſons among them, ‘ is doubtful, tho' it be probable enough that they ‘ had. Here are ſome things that forewent this Parliament.' About five or ſix years before the Ducheſs ‘ of Glouceſter, Eleanor, was convented for witchcraft and ſorcery, and afterward indicted of treaſon ‘ in the Guild-hall, in London, before the Earls of ‘ Huntington, Stafford, Suffolk, and Northumberland, ‘ and certain Lords, as Stanhope and Hungerford, ‘ with others, and Judges of both Benches, of which ‘ crimes ſhe was appealed by one Bolingbrook an Aſtronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Canon, which ‘ Southwell was charged to have ſaid Maſſes over certain inſtruments, by which the Aſtronomer ſhould ‘ practiſe Necromancy againſt the life of the King. ‘ Theſe being taken, accuſed her as acceſſary, ſhe having deſired the help of their art to know what would ‘ befall her. the Duke of Suffolk (p), who, tho' a man of ſingular abilities, but very ambitious, became at laſt ſole Miniſter, and directed all things at his pleaſure. Yet, notwithſtanding the credit that nobleman had with the Queen, Sir John Forteſcue remained in great favour with the King, of which, in the twentieth year of his reign, he received a ſignal proof, by an unuſual augmentation of his ſalary (*), concerning which there ſeems to be ſomething obſcure, or miſtaken, in the writings of a celebrated author [G]. He held his high office throughout the whole reign of his gracious maſter King Henry the Sixth, to whom he ſteadily adhered, and ſerved him faithfully in all his troubles; and for this, in the firſt Parliament under King Edward the Fourth, which began at Weſtminſter on the fourth of November 1461, he was attainted of high treaſon (q), by the ſame Act of Parliament in which King Henry the Sixth, Queen Margaret, Edward their ſon, Henry Duke of Exeter, Henry Duke of Somerſet, Thomas Earl of Devonſhire, Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, and, in the whole, one hundred and fifty-three perſons of diſtinction were likewiſe attainted (r). On the thirteenth of May following, Sir John Markham was made Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench (s). After this misfortune, King Henry the Sixth flying into Scotland, it is generally believed that he conſtituted Sir John Forteſcue Chancellor of England (t), George Nevile then Biſhop of Exeter, to whom the Great-Seal had been delivered July the twenty-ſixth 1460, remaining in the Service of King Edward the Fourth; and this is the reaſon that the name of our great Lawyer does not occur in the records as Chancellor of England

' which ſhe was put to publick and ſolemn penance ' in London, upon three ſeveral days with wonderful ' ſhame to her perſon; and after ſhe was committed ' to perpetual priſon under the ward of Sir Thomas ' Stanley in the caſtle of Cheſter, but from thence ' removed to Kenelworth. Her pride, avarice, and ' lechery, were cauſes of her confuſion, ſaith Stowe, ' who hath ſet forth that buſineſs very diligently, tho' ' not ſeeming to attribute much credit to that accuſation of treaſon. The Duke of Glouceſter, her ' unhappy Lord and Huſband, whom ſhe by love cups ' and enchantments, was ſaid to have inveigled, uſing ' therein one Margaret Gurdmain, a witch of Eye in ' Suffolk, who was burnt in Smithfield, ſtung with ' this reproach, might reaſonably be thought not unwilling to do ſomewhat. Howſoever that was, his ' deſtruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in ' this Parliament at Bury, was arreſted of High-Treaſon, by John Lord Beaumont, High-Conſtable of ' England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerſet, ' with others. Certain of the King's Houſhold were ' appointed to guard him. Not long after he was ' found dead. His body was ſhewed to the Lords and ' Commons, as if he had died of a palſy, or an apoſteme. Of thirty and two of his ſervants which ' were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlain, Knight, ' Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Turſey, Eſquires, and Richard Needham, Gentleman, ' were condemned of High-Treaſon, and had this unexampled puniſhment: they were drawn from the ' Tower to Tyburn, hanged, let down quick, ſtript ' naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and ' then a charter of pardon ſhewed for their lives, by ' the Marqueſs of Suffolk. But the Yeoman of the ' Crown had their livelihood, the Executioner their ' cloaths. Their pardons were thus obtained, by the ' earneſt diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a ' famous preacher, Parſon of St Andrew's in Holborn. ' Thomas Wilde, Eſq; the Duke's ſervant, alſo being ' condemned, and pardoned among others, had for a ' preamble in his letters patents words importing, that ' he had been one among many other traitors againſt ' the King, with Humphry, Duke of Glouceſter; ' who went about and practiſed to deliver Eleanor, ' late wife to the Duke, from out of priſon; for ' which purpoſe he had gathered a great power and ' number of men to come to the Parliament at Bury, ' there to have contrived the King's deſtruction.' This which is drawn wholly from Speed, who had the beſt helps, and wrote under the wiſeſt directions of any of our old Hiſtorians, muſt be diſtinguiſhed and explained to prevent miſtakes. Eleanor Cobham was proceeded againſt in 1440, but her enemies being able to make nothing of the charge of treaſon, brought her before Eccleſiaſtical Judges, who put her to that ſevere and extraordinary penance (17). But upon mature deliberation, this was conſidered as ſo dangerous a precedent, that it produced an Act of Parliament, for allowing women of quality, a trial by their Peers (18). As for her confederates, they were tried before Commiſſioners in the Guild-hall, London, and convicted of High-Treaſon, tho' none but Bolingbrook ſuffered; and there was in this, ſo much of hardſhip, and the publick clamour purſued the Lord Chief Juſtice Hody, who condemned them, ſo ſtrongly, that he broke his heart (19). It was in his room, that Sir John Forteſcue ſucceeded. In 1444, King Henry married Margaret, the Daughter of the titular King of Naples, Sicily, and Jeruſalem, at the monaſtery of Tichfield in Hampſhire (20); and on May the thirtieth, 1445, ſhe was crowned at Weſtminſter (21); within two years after which, followed the Tragedy of Humphry, Duke of Glouceſter and his followers, whoſe ſentences were afterwards reverſed by that Duke's being declared to die the King's good ſubject, by Act of Parliament (22). When the reader duly conſiders theſe facts, he will certainly eſteem it no compliment to be repreſented, as having a large ſhare in ſuch an adminiſtration.

[G] In the writings of a celebrated author.] We are told by the late Judge Forteſcue, in reference to this venerable perſon, that he had extraordinary favours ſhewn him from his Prince; for beſides the uſual ſalary of a Chief Juſtice, he had granted him an augmentation of it two ſeveral times, by two ſeveral annuities (23). ' The laſt of which, was an annuity of ' one hundred eighty marks out of the Hanaper, a ' great ſum in thoſe days, that he might Statum ſuum ' decentius manutenere, as the record ſays; and with ' that, was granted the ſum of one hundred ſixteen ' ſhillings, eleven pence half penny, percipiendum ſingulis annis, ad feſtum natalis Domini, pro una Roba ' & Furrara pro eadem, erga idem Feſtum, and ſixty ' ſix ſhillings and ſix pence, ſingulis annis, ad Feſtum ' Pentecoſtes, pro una Roba, & Linura pro eadem erga ' idem Feſtum; the like favour, as Mr Selden obſerves, ' having never been granted to any Judge before.' We are not told by this learned perſon, where Mr Selden ſays, that this was a favour, the like of which was never granted to any Judge before; but certain it is, that where he mentions this Grant from the King, and gives us the date of it, there is no ſuch thing ſaid. Sir John Hody, his predeceſſor, had a grant of the very ſame nature, of a hundred and ſorty marks (24) &c. and whereas it is aſſerted, that Sir John Forteſcue had his ſalary twice augmented, and that this large augmentation, was the laſt; there is great reaſon to believe otherwiſe, and that it was in reality the firſt; after which, he had a grant for a hogſhead of wine annually during his life, to be received from the head Butler in the Port of Briſtol; and after that, another grant of the like kind, which laſt veſſel of wine was to be received from the ſame Port on the feaſt of St Michael the Archangel (25); the ſecond augmentation of his ſalary, was by Letters Patents, dated May the twenty eighth, 1447. by which forty pounds per annum were granted to him over and above what had been given him before, and this was in the twenty fifth year of that reign (26); neither were favours of this kind at all uncommon, tho' not altogether in ſuch high proportions to other Judges, which, however, land [H]. In the month of April 1463, he embarked with Queen Margaret, Prince Edward, the Duke of Exeter, Dr John Morton, Dr Robert Mackerell, and other perſons of diſtinction, who followed the fortunes of the Houſe of Lancaſter, to the number in the whole of two hundred, at Bamburg, and landed ſafely at Sluys in Flanders, from whence they were conducted to Bruges, and thence to Liſle, where the Queen had an audience of the Duke of Burgundy, to whom, with tears, ſhe related the long ſeries of her misfortunes, and the extreme miſery to which ſhe was reduced; with which the Duke being exceedingly moved, comforted her in the beſt manner that he could, made her a preſent of a conſiderable ſum of money, and ſent her, with moſt of the Engliſh attending her Majeſty, into Lorrain, where her father then was, who gave them a caſtle to reſide in, till he ſhould be able to make further proviſion for them (u). In this exile he remained for many years, retiring from place to place as the neceſſities of the Royal Family required; for though, during that ſpace, the Queen and Prince were often in motion, and great efforts were made to reſtore King Henry, yet, conſidering the age of the Chancellor Sir John Forteſcue, it is by no means probable that he was ſuffered to expoſe himſelf to ſuch hazards, more eſpecially as he might be capable of rendering great ſervices, by ſolliciting their intereſt at different Courts; and could not at that time of life, being near fourſcore, be in any condition to ſuſtain the fatigues of war (w). It does not indeed appear, from any of the hiſtories that are extant, that our Chancellor had any hand in that negotiation, by which Queen Margaret, and the potent Earl of Warwick, were reconciled; but it is, notwithſtanding, extremely probable that he had. We know very well, that the Queen was a high ſpirited woman, and that ſhe was not, without reaſon, highly provoked againſt that ambitious nobleman; and therefore we may well preſume, that it muſt have been ſome perſon of diſtinguiſhed character, and who ſtood very high in her favour, who could ſo far pacify her reſentment, as to engage her in a treaty firſt, and prevail upon her afterwards, to think of marrying the Prince of Wales, her only child, to the Lady Anne Nevile, younger daughter to the Earl of Warwick; the elder, Iſabel, being before married to George Duke of Clarence, brother to Edward the Fourth, whom the Queen conſidered as the uſurper of her huſband's throne (x). We may the more eaſily yield credit to this, when we are told that our Chancellor, in a certain book of his, ſtill preſerved though not publiſhed, repreſents himſelf as a Chief Counſellor of State at that time (y); which, if he was, he muſt undoubtedly have had a large ſhare in a tranſaction which was by far the moſt important of any that happened after the Queen and Prince retired out of England, which gave ſo great a turn to their affairs, and which was very near retrieving their deſperate game, and reſtoring the Line of Lancaſter, at that time, to the poſſeſſion of the imperial diadem of England. But whatever weight there may be in theſe conjectures, moſt certain it is, that the Chancellor obſerving the quick parts, and excellent underſtanding of his young maſter, who applied himſelf wholly to military exerciſes, and ſeemed to think of nothing beſide qualifying does not at all leſſen the argument which is drawn from thence of Sir John Forteſcue's ſtanding highly in the King's favour, but on the contrary, ſtrengthens and confirms it.

[H] In the records as Chancellor of England.] We have in an old Chronicle, the following account of ſome tranſactions at this time, which may poſſibly ſhew the reaſon, why Sir John Forteſcue was attainted by King Edward, and alſo point out with more certainty than has been hitherto done, the time after which he muſt have been made Lord Chancellor (27): 'Edwarde Erle of March, by cauſe King Henry had 'broken covenantes, was made King at Weſtminſter, 'Anno Domini, 1459. and ſtrayte King Edward rode 'northward, and at Towton not far from York on 'Palmes Sunday, advengid his fathers death and wan 'the field, where were ſlain XXM people on both 'parties. The Erle of Northumberland, the Lord 'Clifford, Sir John Nevil, the Erle of Weſtmorlandes brother, and Andrew Trollop, were killed at 'this time, King Henry, the Prince, the Queen, the 'Duke of Somerſet, Henry Duke of Exceſtre, the 'Lord Roos, Syr John Forteſcue, Chief Juge of England, and Tailboys Erle of Kyme, beyng at York, 'and hering of this fled firſt to Newcaſtle, and then 'to Berwick, delivering it to the Scots.' This plainly ſhews, that he was only Chief Juſtice when he attended his maſter, King Henry, into Scotland; and as from the time he left him there he never ſaw him any more, there ſeems to be no room to doubt, that he received the Great-Seal from that King there, as ſoon as it was known that George Biſhop of Exeter, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, continued to bear the title, and execute the Office of Lord Chancellor, by the authority of King Edward. It is true, that ſome have doubted whether he was ever Chancellor at all; as for inſtance, Mr Thynne, a very learned Antiquary in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who expreſſes himſelf thus (28). 'Sir John Forteſcue was only Chief Juſtice of the 'Bench, and not Chancellor of England, as he is un-'truly called by Molcaſter, in tranſlating his book 'of the Laws of England, ſince he was only Chan-'cellor to the youngeſt Prince Edward, and his mo-'ther, after he fled with them into France.' This, however is falſe, for Sir John Forteſcue, in the preface to his own book, does poſitively ſtile himſelf the King of England's Chancellor. So, as Mr Selden proves, he did in another work of his (29). Mr Whitlocke, who was perfectly well read in the Laws and Hiſtory of this nation, made no ſcruple of differing in this reſpect from Mr Thynne, his words are theſe (30): 'Forteſcue, that lived in Henry Sixth, and Edward 'the Fourth's time, and was Chancellor of England, 'and being of the faction of Lancaſter, lived an exile 'in France, when that family was depreſſed writ a 'ſmall pamphlet of the Law of England, in that his 'baniſhment, wherein he reporteth, &c.' It was probably upon theſe motives, that Sir Henry Spelman, who was ſo perfectly verſed in every thing relating to our Hiſtory and Antiquities, has added the name of Sir John Forteſcue to the Chancellors in the reign of King Henry the Sixth (31), upon a ſuppoſition that he muſt have been ſo appointed by that Monarch while in Scotland, which, as he truly ſays, is a ſufficient reaſon why nothing of this kind appears in our records at all; indeed it is impoſſible it ſhould, ſince from the time he was Chancellor, King Henry was never acknowledged, or at leaſt, not for above ſix months, during which ſpace thoſe who ſet him at liberty, and reſtored him to the title of King, obliged him to acknowledge the Archbiſhop of York for his Chancellor, that prelate being brother to the potent Earl of Warwick, who valued himſelf on making and unmaking Monarchs at his pleaſure.

qualifying himſelf for an expert commander (z); he thought it high time to give him ſome other impreſſions, and to infuſe into his mind juſt notions of the conſtitution of his country, as well as due reſpect to it's laws, that, if Providence ſhould favour his deſigns, he might govern as a king, and not as a tyrant or a conqueror (a). That theſe impreſſions might not eaſily wear out of his mind, but that by frequently reviewing what had paſſed in theſe converſations, he might the better fix them in his memory, and ſtrengthen them by his own meditations, the Chancellor digeſted them into a little treatiſe, written in the Latin tongue (b); which, how ſhort ſoever it fell of it's primary intention, that hopeful Prince being not long after cruelly murdered, yet will remain an everlaſting monument of this great and good man's reſpect for his country, and affection to his countrymen, which could not be better teſtified than it was by this ſhort treatiſe [I]. There may poſſibly ſome doubts ariſe about the preciſe time in which this valuable work was compoſed, and indeed ſomething of this kind has been already intimated, by writers of great authority (c). However, ſuch as will look carefully into the work itſelf, and compare it with the hiſtory of theſe times, will very plainly ſee that it was written within a year or two of Prince Edward's death; for the eſtabliſhing of which opinion, the proofs requiſite will be found at the bottom of the page [K]. [I] Than it was by this ſhort treatiſe.] This diſcourſe of Sir John Forteſcue's, has, in the moſt eminent degree, thoſe two great properties, from which works of learning are juſtly ſtiled excellent, ſolidity in point of matter, and elegance in reference to its form. It is written in the way of dialogue, in which the characters are ſuſtained with great dignity and ſpirit; he ſhews the Prince, that it is abſolutely neceſſary for one of his condition to have a good underſtanding in the Laws, and a juſt regard for them too, in order to make himſelf eaſy, and to keep up the reverence due to them amongſt the people; he demonſtrates the advantage of a conſtitution governed by ſtated Laws, in making of which the ſubject has an intereſt; beyond that of a government, depending on the abſolute pleaſure of a Prince. He puts proper objections into the mouth of his pupil, and propoſes them with a great air of freedom, and then he reſolves them briefly, decently, and with much perſpicuity; he obſerves, that what was requiſite for a Prince to know in theſe matters lay within a narrow compaſs, and that there is no reaſon he ſhould apprehend any thing, either tedious or difficult in acquiring ſuch knowledge. Our author then proceeds to prove, that the Common Law is the moſt rational, as well as the moſt antient, in Europe. That the conviction of criminals by juries, and without racking, is more juſt and humane than the methods of neighbouring nations, our challenging of panels, writs of attaint upon corrupt verdicts, and the uſual wealth of our juries, ſuch ſecurities to the lives and property of the ſubject, as other countries are incapable of affording; that our Kings are greater and more potent in the liberties and properties of their people, than arbitrary tyrants in the vaſſalage of their ſlaves; that the Civil Law is more unreaſonable than ours in the legitimation of children born before marriage, as alſo in its axiom partus ſequitur ventrem, tuition of orphans, &c. that our Inns of Court are more convenient for the ſtudy of the Engliſh Law than their Univerſities, and that the degree of Serjeant at Law is as honourable, as that of Doctor in the Univerſities: and, in the laſt place, that the proceedings in our Courts of Juſtice are leſs dilatory than in thoſe of other nations. Theſe important and ſome of them too perplexed points, are handled with ſuch clearneſs and ſtrength of reaſon as may be truly ſaid to carry with them conviction; with great reaſon therefore, did a wiſe and worthy author, upon nearly the ſame ſubject, deliver his opinion of this work in theſe terms (32). 'If the Noblemen of this realm would ſee their 'children brought up in ſuch manner, that they ſhould 'have learning and knowledge more than they com- 'monly have, eſpecially of the grounds and princi- 'ples of the Law of the Realm, tho' they had not 'the cunning of the whole body of the Law, but af- 'ter ſuch manner as Mr Forteſcue, in his book De 'Laudibus Legum Angliæ, advertiſeth the Prince to 'have, I ſuppoſe it would be a great help hereafter 'to the miniſtration of juſtice, and a right great glad- 'neſs to all people.' Sir Edward Coke, who often mentions our author, and this work of his, mentions him always with applauſe; in one place he tells us, that beſides his profound knowledge in the Law, he was alſo an excellent Antiquary (33); and in another, he points out ſome particular chapters in this work, which he aſſures us are ſo excellent (34), that they deſerve to be written in letters of gold.

(33) In the Preface to the ſixth part of his Reports, fol. 1. a.

[K] At the bottom of the page.] In the courſe of the converſation the Prince propoſes it as an objection, that notwithſtanding the excellency of the Engliſh Laws, yet ſome of the Kings, his predeceſſors, had been deſirous of introducing the Civil Laws, of which therefore he deſires to know the reaſon. The Chancellor tells his Highneſs that he need not be at a loſs, for that ſince Princes might be eaſily conceived willing enough to change the Laws of England, becauſe of their binding alike upon them and their ſubjects, for the Civil Law built upon a principle directly oppoſite, quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem, that the will of the Prince ſhall have the force of a Law. Upon this it has been demanded, what authority the Prince had to affirm, that any Monarch of England ſhould form a deſign of changing the Common for the Civil Laws? The very learned Mr Selden diſcourſes thereupon thus (35). 'I 'confeſs, I here underſtand him not. What Kings of 'England ever deſired the Civil Laws of Rome? I 'have read of a proteſtation againſt them in Parlia- 'ment, by the King and Lords, which you may ſee 'in Rot. proceſſ. & jud. of the appeal of Thomas 'Duke of Gloceſter, and others, againſt Alexander 'Archbiſhop of York, Robert de Veer Duke of 'Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, and 'Robert Treſilian, Chief Juſtice, in Rich. 2. Parla- 'mento Weſtm. 3 Febr. Anno 11. where upon de- 'fault of the appellees, the appellants deſire that the 'Court would proceed to judgment. I remember 'alſo King Stephen, his publick edict againſt the Laws 'of Italy, but remember not any ſtory or authority 'teaching that any of our Kings would have had 'them here uſed. That of Stephen is related by that 'noble and moſt learned Friar, Roger Bacon, in his 'Compendium Theologiæ, or his Opus minus (both thoſe 'names are of one Ms book) where he is ſpeaking of 'the Civil Laws of Italy, and that they are abuſed and 'too much affected by Clergymen, leaving their pro- 'feſſion to ſtudy thoſe Laws.' What he quotes from Bacon is to this effect, he ſays, that the ſeveral countries of Europe, ſuch as England, France, Spain, Germany, were governed by Laws and conſtitutions of their own reſpectively, and ſo were the people of Italy, therefore no reaſon that the Engliſh Clergy ſhould endeavour to bring in the Italian Laws, but rather that they ſhould live as their anceſtors had done under the Laws of their own country. King Stephen, ſays he, by a publick edict prohibited ſo much as the keeping the Italian Laws in a man's cuſtody, and if a Lay King took ſuch a method to prevent Laymen from being ſubjected to them, much more ought the Clergy to diſdain theſe Laws that were made by and belonged to Laymen. Mr Selden afterwards obſerves, that tho' Bacon is ſo clear about the Civil Law, yet another author, of full as great authority in things of this nature, ſuggeſts, that it was a book of the Canon Law, which Archbiſhop Theobald brought with him from Rome. All this, however, is very little to the purpoſe, and if it proves any thing, proves directly the contrary of what our author has put into the mouth of Prince Edward. Let us hear now, what another great

great oracle of the Law takes to be the meaning of this paſſage (36). ‘ H. 6. had William de la Pole, ‘ Duke of Suffolk, &c. who endeavoured to have ‘ brought in the Civil Laws, which was the occaſion ‘ that the Chief Juſtice Forteſcue wrote in the com- ‘ mendation of the Laws of England, preferring them ‘ for the government of this Land before the Civil ‘ Laws. This Duke, with others, plotted the death ‘ and deſtruction of Humfry the good Duke of Gloce- ‘ ſter who ever ſtood in his way.’ It is highly probable, that Sir John Forteſcue might differ with the Duke of Suffolk, and it is not at all impoſſible, that the Duke of Suffolk might have a high opinion of the Civil Law, tho' it would be no eaſy matter to produce any proof of either. But what then? The Duke of Suffolk had been dead many years, and the whole ſcope of this treatiſe plainly proves, that it was writ upon a ſudden occaſion, and all at a time. The laſt commentator, whoſe name I am ſorry it is not in my power to mention, gives quite another and a better turn to this (37). ‘ King Henry the Sixth's Queen ‘ was neice to the Queen of France, and came out of ‘ a country where an arbitrary Government prevails: ‘ in order to raiſe her own power, ſhe inſiſted and ‘ infuſed into her favourites, that the Duke of Glouce- ‘ ſter's adminiſtration according to the ſtrictneſs of the ‘ national Laws was mean, and below the dignity of ‘ that ſovereign power and dominion which the Civil ‘ Law conferr'd on the King's perſon, and therefore ‘ ſhe countenanced ſuch proceedings as looked impe- ‘ rious and abſolved from all reſtriction. Why may ‘ not our author have reſpect to this particular cha- ‘ racter and caſe?’ This is very ſenſible and very clear, and, to ſay the truth, the Chancellor's whole book is very plainly built upon his apprehenſions, that a foreign education, and living ſo long in the earlier part of his life in a foreign country, might have bad effects upon the young Prince's mind, and bring him to have a diſlike, or at leaſt an indifference for the Laws and conſtitution of his native country. Sir John Forteſcue was a man of probity, a man of loyalty, and a man of letters, which his whole book and his whole conduct ſhows, for they are indeed reciprocal comments upon each other. His probity appears in his making the conſtitution of England his firſt and greateſt temporal concern; his loyalty was without reproach, he adhered to King Henry and Prince Edward ſo long as they lived; if he afterwards embraced the part of King Edward, it was when Providence and the Laws of the land had declared in his favour; his knowledge and learning are placed beyond diſpute, by this and by his other treatiſe, both which are ſhort, plain, and convincing. It remains, that in this note, according to the promiſe made in the text, we eſtabliſh the juncture at which his treatiſe De Laudibus Legum Angliæ was written, and if this cannot be done in few words yet no more ſhall be uſed than are neceſſary. The paſſage that I rely upon to fix within a year or ſo at the fartheſt, is that which follows, and I inſiſt upon it the rather, becauſe there is not a word ſaid of it by any of the learned commentators, upon this excellent work; it is in theſe words (38). ‘ Now what man is ‘ there ſo ſtout or reſolute, who has once gone through ‘ this horrid trial by torture, be he never ſo innocent, ‘ who will not rather confeſs himſelf guilty of all ‘ kinds of wickedneſs, than undergo the like tortures ‘ a ſecond time, who would not rather die once, ſince ‘ death would put an end to all his fears, than to be ‘ killed ſo many times, and ſuffer ſo many helliſh tor- ‘ tures, more terrible than death itſelf? Don't you re- ‘ member, my Prince, a criminal, who when upon the ‘ rack impeached of treaſon a certain noble Knight, ‘ a man of worth and loyalty, and declared that they ‘ were both concerned together in the ſame conſpi- ‘ racy: and being taken down from the rack he ſtill ‘ perſiſted in the accuſation, leaſt he ſhould again be ‘ put to the queſtion. Nevertheleſs, being ſo much ‘ hurt and reduced by the ſeverity of the puniſhment, ‘ that he was brought almoſt to the point of death, ‘ after he had the Viaticum and Sacraments admini- ‘ ſtred to him, he then confeſſed and took a very ſo- ‘ lemn oath upon it, by the Body of Chriſt, and as ‘ he was now as he imagined juſt going to expire; ‘ he affirmed that the ſaid worthy Knight was inno- ‘ cent, and clear of every thing he had laid to his ‘ charge; he added, that the tortures he was put to ‘ were ſo intolerable, that rather than ſuffer over ‘ again, he would accuſe the ſame perſon of the ſame ‘ crimes, nay, his own father, tho' when he ſaid this, ‘ he was in the bitterneſs of death, when all hopes of ‘ recovery were over. Neither did he at laſt eſcape ‘ that ignominious death, for he was hanged, and at ‘ the time and place of his execution, he acquitted ‘ the ſaid Knight of the crimes wherewith he had not ‘ long before charged him. Such confeſſions as theſe, ‘ alas! a great many others of thoſe poor wretches ‘ make, not led by a regard to truth, but compelled ‘ to it by the exquiſiteneſs of their torments.’ It is very evident, that this ſtory was at that time of ſo great notoriety, as not to lay the Chancellor under any neceſſity of mentioning the perſon's name; in the next place, it is very apparent, that it was a very recent thing with which the Prince was well acquainted, and therefore likely to move him the more. Laſtly, the circumſtances mentioned in the ſtory are ſuch as diſtinguiſhed it ſufficiently. The informer was a mean man, the perſon accuſed a Knight, and otherways of diſtinguiſhed reputation; this accuſation brought him into great trouble and danger, out of which, however, he was at length extricated, and as for the informer, his infidelity turned upon himſelf, and he was executed upon his own evidence. Let us hear then what a certain Hiſtorian ſays, who lived in theſe times, and was himſelf Sheriff of London, conſequently well acquainted with what he relates, and whoſe authority therefore ought not to be doubted. The ſtory he tells us, is in the year 1468, and, in his own words, runs thus (39). ‘ Sir Thomas Cooke late Mayor of London, was by ‘ one, named Hawkins, appeached of treaſon, for the ‘ which he was ſent to the Tower, and his place ‘ within London ſeized by the Lord Rivers, and his ‘ wife and ſervants clearly put out thereof. The cauſe ‘ was this. The forenamed Hawkins came upon a ‘ ſeaſon unto the ſaid Sir Thomas, requeſting him to ‘ lend a thouſand marks upon good ſurety, whereunto ‘ he anſwered, that firſt he would know for whom it ‘ ſhould be, and for what intent. At length under- ‘ ſtanding it ſhould be for the uſe of Queen Margaret, ‘ he anſwered he had no current wares, whereof any ‘ ſhifts might be made without too much loſs, and ‘ therefore required Hawkins to move him no further ‘ in that matter, for he intended not to deal withal, ‘ yet the ſaid Hawkins exhorted him to remember ‘ what benefits he had received by her, when ſhe was ‘ in proſperity, as by making him her wardrober and ‘ cuſtomer of Hampton, &c. But by no means the ‘ ſaid Cooke would grant goods nor money, altho' at ‘ laſt the ſaid Hawkins required but an hundred pounds, ‘ he was fain to depart without the value of a penny, ‘ and never came again to move him, which ſo reſted ‘ two or three years after, till the ſaid Hawkins was ‘ caſt into the Tower, and at length brought to the ‘ brake called the Duke of Exceſter's daughter, by ‘ means of which pain he ſhewed many things, amongſt ‘ the which, the motion was one that he had made ‘ to Sir Thomas Cooke, and accuſed himſelf ſo far ‘ that he was put to death. By means of which con- ‘ feſſion, the ſaid Sir Thomas was troubled, as before ‘ is ſhewed, when the ſaid Sir Thomas had lain in the ‘ Tower from Whitſuntide till about Michaelmas, in ‘ the which ſeaſon many enquiries were made to find ‘ him guilty, and ever quit, till one jury, by means of ‘ Sir John Fog, indicted him of treaſon, after which ‘ an Oyer and Terminer was kept at the Guild-hall, ‘ in which ſat with the Mayor the Duke of Clarence, ‘ the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Rivers, Sir John ‘ Fog, with other of the King's Council. To the ‘ which place the ſaid Thomas was brought, and there ‘ arraigned upon life and death, where he was ac- ‘ quitted of the ſaid indictment, and had to the Coun- ‘ ter in Bread-Street, and from thence to the King's- ‘ Bench. After a certain time that he was thus ac- ‘ quitted, his wife got again the poſſeſſion of her ‘ houſe, the which ſhe found in an evil plight, for ſuch ‘ ſervants of the Lord Rivers, and Sir John Fog, as ‘ were aſſigned to keep it, made havock of what they ‘ liſted.

it's being communicated to the learned men of the profeſſion (d), then flouriſhing in this kingdom; and yet, notwithſtanding the reputation both of the piece and it's author, it continued long as a kind of jewel in private libraries; and, when it was at laſt publiſhed, came abroad in a manner little ſuitable either to the value of the performance, or the reſpect due to the memory of this reverend Sage in the law (e); but, by degrees, all theſe inconveniencies have been removed, and, in conſequence of ſeveral new editions, we have it now in that ſtate in which ſo uſeful a book, and ſo honourable for our conſtitution, deſerved juſtly to appear [L]. But to return to our famous Chancellor. He had, without doubt, a very good opinion of the ſtate of King Henry's affairs, when he had intelligence that the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick, had releaſed him out of the Tower, placed him again upon the throne, and forced his competitor King Edward to leave England. Theſe ſucceſſes determined him not only to conſent to the propoſition made for Queen Margaret's going over with her only ſon Prince Edward, but made him alſo reſolve to accompany her himſelf (f). Great preparations were made for this expedition, in which they were favoured by the French King (g); but before they were in a condition to put to ſea, there happened a new change of affairs in England. For King Edward landing in the North, advanced with a very ſmall body of forces to York, where, upon his ſolemn declaration that he did not aim at the crown, but ſought only reſtitution to his duchy of York, and the eſtates belonging to his family (b), he quickly gained a ſuperior force, with which, paſſing by Marquis Montacute, he entered London, and made King Henry the Sixth once more a priſoner (i). Then marching to Barnet, with his brother the Duke of Clarence, now reconciled to him, he fought the Earl of Warwick, who ſtiled himſelf King Henry's Lieutenant, upon Gladmore-Heath, on Eaſter-Sunday, April the fourteenth 1471, and there gained a compleat victory (k). This, without doubt, was very unwelcome news to Queen Margaret,

We are farther told by Stowe, that Sir John Markham, Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, having directed the Jury that Sir Thomas Cooke's offence was but miſpriſion of treaſon, the Lord Rivers, and the Ducheſs of Bedford, his wife, informed the King thereof, and prevailed upon him afterwards to diſmiſs him from his office (40). If therefore this be the ſtory to which our learned author alludes, as methinks there is no great reaſon to doubt that it muſt be; then, it follows plainly the diſcourſe could not be written before the year 1469, and indeed there are ſome other circumſtances in that treatiſe, which might be urged to the ſame purpoſe, but this being remarkably clear, and ſo well atteſted by our antient Hiſtorians, there does not ſeem to be any neceſſity of alledging farther evidence, when nothing can poſſibly be oppoſed to it, but bare conjectures without proof, or even probability to ſupport them.

[L] Deſerved juſtly to appear] The hiſtory of the ſeveral editions of this celebrated work, is not a bare matter of curioſity, but alſo of uſe, becauſe (except very briefly, by Biſhop Tanner) (41) we have not hitherto had ſo diſtinct a catalogue of them, as might be wiſhed. It firſt appeared in Latin only, under the following title, which ſeems to have been that of the manuſcript from whence it was printed.

(41) Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernia, p. 493.

Prænobilis militis cognomento Forteſcue, De politica adminiſtratione & legibus civilibus Florentiſſimi regni Angliæ Commentarius. Lond. per Ed. Whitchurch, temp. Henr. VIII. 12*mo.*

It was again printed in Latin and Engliſh, by the care of Robert Mulcaſter, Lond. 1567, 12*mo.* it was alſo publiſhed in Engliſh alone, under the following title,

A learned Commentary of the Politic Laws of England: Wherein, by moſt pithy reaſons and demonſtrations, they are plainly proved to excel, as well the Civil Laws of the Empire, as alſo all other Laws of the World; with a large diſcourſe of the difference between the two Governments of Kingdoms, whereof the one is only regal; and the other conſiſteth of regal and politic adminiſtration conjoined. Lond. 1599 8vo.

It was again publiſhed both in Latin and Engliſh, with the following title.

De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, written by Sir John Forteſcue, Lord Chief Juſtice, and after Lord Chancellor to King Henry the Sixth. Hereto are added the two ſums of Sir Ralph de Hengham, Lord Chief Juſtice to King Edward the Firſt, commonly called Hengham Magna, & Hengham Parva, with notes, both on Forteſcue and Hengham. By that famous and learned Antiquary, John Selden, Eſq; Lond. 1616, 1640. 8vo. 1672. 12mo.

Some of theſe, and more eſpecially the laſt edition, were very faulty; the Stationers, as a certain author juſtly obſerves, regarding no body's profit but their own. In the mean time it came out again, ſoon after the Reſtoration, in a very flouriſhing dreſs; and tho' I cannot ſay with, yet involved in the following pompous title.

Fortescutus Illustratus; or a Commentary on that nervous treatiſe, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ; written by Sir John Forteſcue, Knight, firſt Lord Chief Juſtice, after Lord Chancellor to King Henry the Sixth, which treatiſe dedicated to Prince Edward, that King's ſon and heir whom he attended in his retirement into France, and to whom he loyally and affectionately imparted himſelf in the virtue and variety of his excellent diſcourſe, he purpoſely wrote to conſolidate his princely mind in the love and approbation of the good Laws of England, and of the laudable cuſtoms of this his native country. The heroick deſign of whoſe excellent judgment and loyal addiction to his Prince, is humbly endeavoured to be revived, admired, and advanced by Edward Waterhouſe, Eſquire. Lond. 1663. folio.

The very language of this title is a ſufficient ſample of the book, where the reader will find a profuſion of learning, and yet meet with very little ſatisfaction. A ſhort chapter, a line, nay, a word, furniſhes occaſion, I cannot prevail upon myſelf to ſay, matter, for a folio page, diverſified with variety of languages, and embroidered with numerous quotations from Schoolmen and Divines, as well as Lawyers. This Commentary however was licenſed by the Judges, and dedicated to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, and perhaps with a view to this dedication, the book was in ſome meaſure written, as the reader may perceive, from the following parallel, which our commentator has drawn between his author and his patron (42). 'My noble text, Maſter, and your noble ſelf, ſays 'he, to the Earl of Clarendon were ——Both Gen-'tlemen by birth, both Lawyers by breeding, both 'Knights by degree, both wiſe men by experience, 'both loyal attendants on your Sovereigns receſſes 'abroad, and both honoured by your Sovereigns with 'the truſt and ſtate of Chancellors.' The laſt edition we ſhall mention, is that printed at London in folio, in 1732, again in 1741, with a copious preface, and with large, learned, and uſeful annotations, an accurate index, and whatever elſe is neceſſary to ſatisfy a curious and inquiſitive reader.

(42) Forteſcutus illuſtratus, Lond. 1663. fol.

Margaret, who, with Prince Edward, Sir John Forteſcue, ſtiled Lord Chancellor of England, the Prior of St John's, who had the title of Lord High-Treaſurer, Lord Wenlock, and ſeveral others, landed the very ſame day at Weymouth, in Dorſetſhire (l). However, being joined by the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Devonſhire, ſhe reſolved to proſecute her deſign, and to make head againſt the conqueror, relying upon a great reinforcement which was expected from Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, who was raiſing men in Wales for the ſervice of King Henry (m). But this was prevented by the vigilance of King Edward, who, having recruited his army as ſoon as poſſible, marched Weſtward, and reduced his enemies to the neceſſity of fighting near Tewkſbury, in Glouceſterſhire. This battle was fought on Saturday the fourth of May 1471, and was very bloody; but at length ended in the total defeat of the Queen's army, the Queen herſelf, the Prince, and moſt of the great perſons in her army, being either killed or taken priſoners (n). There is ſaid to be a tradition, that, after this deciſive ſtroke, Sir John Forteſcue retired to his ſeat at Ebberton or Ebrighton, three miles from Camden in Glouceſterſhire, where he paſſed the remainder of his days in privacy (o). But Hiſtory ſpeaks another language; for by that we are informed, that Prince Edward, being delivered by the gentleman who took him, upon promiſe of preſerving his life, was, for a haughty anſwer given to King Edward, baſely murdered by the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, the Lord Haſtings, and others (p). The Duke of Somerſet, the Lord St John, Sir Humphry Audley, and Sir Gervaſe Clifton, having retired into a church in Tewkſbury, continued there upon the King's promiſe of pardon, though they might have eſcaped from Saturday to Monday, when they were taken out and beheaded (q); at the ſame time Queen Margaret, the Lady Anne, Widow to Prince Edward, the Counteſs of Devonſhire, the Lady Catherine Vaus, Sir John Forteſcue, Sir John Sainctlowe, Sir Henry Rous, Thomas Ormond, Dr Mackerell, and five others, were ſpared (r). It is very certain, that in a ſhort time King Edward was prevailed upon to pardon and releaſe Sir John Forteſcue (s); nor is it at all impoſſible that he likewiſe reſtored him to this eſtate, which was of the value of four hundred pounds a year. This, I ſay, is not at all improbable, ſince Sir John Burg, to whom the manor of Ebrighton had been given, died the very ſame year (t). There is no manner of doubt that our Chancellor, ſeeing the affairs of the Houſe of Lancaſter entirely overturned, endeavoured to reconcile himſelf to the victorious Edward the Fourth, and that in this he ſucceeded; and it was in order to facilitate this reconciliation, that he wrote a kind of apology for his own conduct, which treatiſe the learned Selden had ſeen (u), and of which ſome manuſcript copies are ſtill preſerved, tho' it has never yet been publiſhed [M]. After all theſe extraordinary changes, as well of his maſters as of his fortunes, Sir John Forteſcue preſerved his old principles, in regard to the conſtitution, as appears from another learned and valuable work of his, written in the Engliſh

(43) MS. Digby in Biblioth. Bodleian. 198.

There is no doubt at all with me, that if we had this treatiſe publiſhed, we ſhould ſee that he made a very grateful return to the King for his mercy, which, more than one writer intimates, he freely obtained; but having formerly written in direct terms againſt the title of the Houſe of York, as well as in defence of that of Lancaſter, he judged it highly expedient for him now to give a fair account of his changing his ſentiments, for this may be well deduced from what Selden ſays in his preface, where ſpeaking of our author's taking the title of Chancellor, he delivers himſelf thus. 'In his Declaration, or rather Retractation, 'of that he had written againſt the title of the Houſe 'of York, himſelf, puts in the mouth of a friend of his 'expoſtulating with him theſe words, conſidering that 'ye were the chief Chancellor to the ſaid late King.' But tho' we mention this, to ſhew the ſenſe he had of the royal mercy extended to him, yet we have in the text refuted from authority, the groundleſs inſinuation of a certain writer a little too apt to advance things at random, contained in theſe words (44). 'I 'ſuppoſe he grew weary of baniſhment, and the inte- 'reſts of the Houſe of Lancaſter, ſome time before the 'unhappy return of the Queen and her ſon, upon the 'Earl of Warwick's revolt, ſince we do not hear of 'him in their retinue.' It is ſhewn in the text, that he was in their retinue, if that expreſſion muſt be uſed towards a man of his rank, and that he ſhared in the diſmal conſequences of the deciſive defeat at Tewkſbury; ſo that to ſay, as the ſame writer does, that he changed his ſide and his principles is extremely harſh, and was certainly the effects of that writer's not knowing the true ſtate of his caſe. But a captious reader may poſſibly have it at his tongue's end to ſay; ſince you acknowledge that you have not ſeen this treatiſe, how, with any certainty, can you know it? To this it is very fit that an anſwer ſhould be given; for to be angry with a man's conjecture, without offering any thing towards the diſproof of it, is not only acting rudely, but ridiculouſly. But mark what is the true ſtate of the queſtion. I very readily acknowledge that he changed his political opinions, but I deny that he either changed his ſide or his principles. Not his ſide, for he adhered to King Henry and Prince Edward as long as they lived, ſo that he did not paſs from ſide to ſide, but very wiſely ſubmitted when he ſaw that reſiſtance was both vain and unjuſt. Not his principles either, for we ſhall ſee that he ſteadily maintained them after he acknowledged the right as well as the power to be in the Houſe of York. Now to prove all this, notwithſtanding that remarkable dialogue of his ſtill ſhut up in a library, let us hear what Sir Edward Coke ſays (45), who had peruſed this treatiſe, and who will not only give us a general view of its contents, but his opinion likewiſe of his predeceſſor's practice, and a better opinion than his in a point of this nature, all things conſidered, cannot be eaſily had; take it then in his own words. 'Forteſcue 'De Laudibus Legum Angliæ: this book was written 'in the reign of King Henry the Sixth, in commen- 'dation of the Laws of England, containing withal 'much excellent matter worthy the reading: he wrote 'alſo a book in defence of the title of King Henry 'the Sixth, his Sovereign Lord and Maſter, to the 'Crown of England, but after, out of truth and con- 'ſcience, retracted the ſame, both which I have: where- 'in he deſerved ſingular commendation, in that he 'was not amongſt the number of thoſe, qui ſuos amaſ- 'ſent errores, but yielded to truth when he found it. 'This Sir John Forteſcue was Lord Chief Juſtice of 'England, and his poſterity remain in great and good 'account to this day.' This certainly is deciſive, and comes up fully to all that I have ſaid.

[N] Which will appear in the notes.] The title of this work, as it stood in it's original edition, runs thus: The Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy, as it more particularly regards the English Constitution; being a Treatise, written by Sir John Fortescue, Knight, Lord Chief Justice, and Lord High-Chancellor of England, under King Henry VI. Faithfully transcribed from the Manuscript Copy in the Bodleian Library, and collated with three other Manuscripts. Published with some Remarks, by John Fortescue Aland, of the Inner-Temple, Esq; F. R. S. Lond. 1714, 8*vo*.

In reference to the genuineness of the peice, and to the certainty of it's being our author's, hear what the right honourable editor thereof, John, Baron Fortescue of Credans, in the County of Waterford, (for so Mr Fortescue Aland was afterwards created) says in his Preface. 'The first copy of this piece, I saw at Oxford some years ago, in the Bodleian Library, among 'the manuscripts of Mr Selden, and being taken with 'the excellency of the subject, I procured a transcript 'of it, which I carefully examined myself in Oxford, 'and collated the same with three other manuscript 'copies, two of which I found in the same library, 'among the manuscripts of Archbishop Laud, and Sir 'Kenelm Digby; and the third, I found in the Cotton Library. But this copy is the fairest, most perfect, and compleat of them all, and was transcribed 'by Sir Adrian Fortescue's own hand, who was a descendant from our author, and lived in the reign of 'King Henry VIII; for I find written upon this 'copy, these words: Iste Liber pertinet Adriano Fortescue, Militi, manu propria scriptus, Anno Domini '1532, & Anno Regis H. VIII. 24 (46). But Archbishop Laud's copy seems to be the most ancient, 'for therein are to be found several Saxon characters 'in several places, and some very old words different 'from those in this copy; but all the various readings 'which are material, for the curious Antiquary, I have 'noted in the margin of this book. As to the language, it is the English of those times, participating 'very much of the nature of the Saxon tongue; for it 'has in it many words, and terminations of words, as 'also many phrases, purely Saxon: And I chose to publish it in it's own native dress, not only as it is a curious piece of antiquity, but that every man may be 'judge for himself of the true sense and meaning of 'our author; and lay no imputation on the publisher 'of altering the sense, in attempting to give it a more 'modern dress.'

(46) See an Account of this Sir Adrian Fortescue in the next Article; from whence will appear he was not the Chancellor's descendant.

It is not easy to apprehend what the cause might be, which hindred the noble editor from speaking clearly of the occasion and design for, or time in, which it was written; but certain it is, that none of these are particularly marked, neither is the least word said, that this treatise was penned in favour of King Edward the Fourth, which, notwithstanding, may be proved from several passages in the book itself, though it cannot be denied, that in the title of the manuscript in the Cotton Library, it is said to be addressed to King Henry the Sixth (47); this treatise is divided into twenty chapters, we will briefly run over the contents of them all. In the first, he shews the difference between an absolute and a limited monarchy, which he very plainly and sensibly places in a King's ruling by laws of his own making, which he calls Dominium Regale; and in a Prince's governing by laws made with the consent of his subjects, which he calls Dominium Politicum & Regale. In the second chapter, he points out the means by which these differences in government grew, and that with equal perspicuity and sagacity. He supposes, that in rougher and more barbarous times, such as had followers, and power, made use of them to settle principalities, and so ruled their people when settled, as they did before, that is, by their mere will and pleasure. But when men were become milder and more civilized, he thinks they chose their own governors, and prescribed the terms upon which they would be governed; hence he takes occasion to observe, that when Brute first settled this island, he brought with him a colony, and consequently must have previously agreed with them how public affairs should be administred. Let no hasty critic, or forward politician, blame our reverend author for giving credit to what others stile a fable; but let them observe the good use he has made of this piece of vulgar history, whether true or false, viz. to shew that there never was such a thing as absolute government established in this island, and before they reject his reasons for it, let them be sure they can assign better. The business of his third chapter, is to shew the fruits of an absolute and of a limited government; he instances, as to the former in France; and shews that the government there became absolute by our invasions, when their Kings, pleading necessity for raising supplies, and the impossibility of calling their Estates, took thence occasion to tax the common people at their pleasure, whence had arisen their poverty and distressed condition, which he largely and pathetically describes; and he deduces the power and strength of the English nation, from their living under the other form of rule, which enabled them not only to defend themselves, but to conquer their neighbours; and thus, says he, we may judge of the nature of governments by our Saviour's rule, by their fruits shall ye know them. These three chapters fall in so exactly with the beginning of his book, de Laudibus Legum Angliæ; that, as the last and best commentator upon that piece observes, it is impossible he should not have referred to it, as he does to another treatise, if that work had not been composed before this. In his fourth chapter, he shews how the French King's revenues come to be double to that of the King of England; because, says he, the French King takes what he pleases, and the King of England what his people will please to give him. In the fifth chapter, he shews the mischiefs that arise from a King's being poor, and more especially from his being in debt; and this he does very fully, though very concisely, arguing, that as he must always pay more in such circumstances, than he would need to pay if in better; so what he pays, coming in the end out of his peoples pockets, the nation must be impoverished that suffers their King to be distressed. In the sixth chapter, he shews the ordinary charges of the realm, in which he observes, that tonnage and poundage ought not to be considered as a part of the King's general revenue, since it is given for a particular use, and should only be applied to the maintaining his dominion of the seas. His seventh chapter, treats of the extraordinary expence of the crown. In the eighth, he shews, that if the King's settled revenue be not sufficient, it is the duty of his subjects to supply him, and in this kingdom more especially, where both the King's ordinary and extraordinary expences, are employ'd for the benefit of his people. He insists in his ninth chapter, on the danger of subjects becoming too potent; and he observes, that in France, the government was never subverted but by such potent subjects; here I must crave the liberty of citing his own words. 'In our days, says he, we have seen 'a subgett of the Frenche Kyng gyvyn battel to the 'same Kyng, and put him to slight, and afterward be-'segid him in Parise, his gretteſt Cyte, and so kepte 'hym ther, unto the time his said Kyng had made 'such end with him, his adherents, and fautours, as 'he desired. We have also seen in our Realme, sum 'of the Kyng's subgetts gevyn hym batell, by occa-'syoun that their lyvelood and offices were the gretteſt 'of the lond, and els they would nor could have done 'so. The Erlys of Lyc-stre, and of Glouceſtre, which 'then war the gretteſt Lords of England, rose ageyn 'theyr Kyng, Herry the thirde, and toke hym and 'his son prisoners in the feld. Whiche maner of de-'meanyng the Kyng of Scotts, that last dyyd, dredyng 'to be practysyd in his lond, put out of the same lond, 'the Erles Dowglas, whose lyvelood and myght was 'nere hand equivalent to his owne, movyd therto by 'non other cause, save only drede of his rebellion.' The reason of citing this passage, is, on account of it's helping us to several dates. The French subject, who defeated more of them than the titles, and the commendations that have been beſtowed upon them by ſuch as have peruſed them, we cannot pretend to ſay when they were written, one only excepted, defeated his Sovereign, and ſhut him up in the city of Paris, till he made a treaty to his ſatisfaction, was Charles Count de Charolois, eldeſt ſon to the Duke of Burgundy, who formed a league of the great French Lords, againſt Lewis XI, which produced the civil war, covered with the ſpecious title of the Publick Good; he gained the battle of Montlehery, on Tueſday, July 16, 1465, and forced the King to grant him and his aſſociates what they pleaſed (48). The King of Scots ſpoken of, as long before deceaſed, was James the Second, who died in 1460 (49). In the tenth chapter, he enquires how the Crown may be beſt endowed; and therein he determines, that, all things conſidered, the beſt method for increaſing the King's Revenue, was to augment his Crown Lands. In the eleventh chapter, he ſhews how this may be done by a reſumption, but with due care, and under proper reſtrictions; and therein he ſeems to exempt the King's brethren, to whom, for their ſervices, as well as their being nigh in blood to his Highneſs, he ſays, the King had given lands, and that it did not become his magnificence to act otherwiſe. This plainly ſhews, that the King he means, was Edward the Fourth; for conſidering the dates formerly fixed, he could mean no other; at the cloſe of the chapter, he propoſes that a large ſubſidy ſhould be given the King by his people, that he may be able to give ample rewards to thoſe from whom the lands which he had inconſiderately beſtowed upon them, ſhould be taken, and this to prevent the King's falling into poverty again. The diſmal conſequences that muſt neceſſarily follow the bringing the Commons of this Realm into poverty, is the ſubject of the twelfth chapter, which, though at firſt ſight it may ſeem, in a great meaſure, antiquated; yet, if ſtrictly and ſoberly conſidered, the grounds of his obſervations will yet be found true; for he ſays, that on one hand, theſe needy Commons will be moſt ready to riſe up againſt the government; and, on the other, ſuch as are not inclined to riſe, will not have wherewithal to help the government; whence he infers, that if a people be rich, the King ought to be rich; but, if the people be not rich, the King muſt be poor: It appears from the particular mention of taxes in this chapter, that this treatiſe muſt have been written after the year 1474. In the thirteenth chapter, he labours to prove, that the only reaſon why the French do not rebel, is their want of courage; and upon this, he advances a very odd fact, that there were more men hanged in a year in England, for robbery and manſlaughter, than in ſeven years in France for the ſame crimes; he ſays, that in Scotland, there was hardly a man hanged for robbery once in ſeven years; but, in England, ſays he, if a man be very poor, and ſee another very rich, whom he may deſpoil by force, he will not fail to do ſo. In France, therefore, ſays he, it is not their poverty, but their want of heart, that keeps men from riſing. In the fourteenth chapter, he propoſes an act of Reſumption, and a large ſubſidy, as the only means by which the grandeur of the Crown could be reſtored; and the Commons freed from the neceſſity of giving continual ſupplies. The title of his fifteenth chapter is, how the King's Council may be beſt choſen and eſtabliſhed; this ſeems to have been a favourite deſign of his, and to have coſt him much more pains than any in his book; and therefore, as well as becauſe it is ſhort, we well give it the reader preciſely in his own words. 'The Kings Counceile 'was wont to be choſyn of grete Princis, and of the 'gretteſt Lords, both Spirituellis and Temporallis, of 'the Realm; and alſo of other men that wer in grete 'auctorite and offices. Which Lords and Officers, had 'nerehand as many matters of their own to be treatid 'in the Counceile, as had the Kyng. Wher thorow 'whan thay came togeders, thay was ſo occupyyd 'with their own maters, and with the maters of their 'kynne, ſervants, and tenaunts, that they intendyd but 'lityll, and other while, nothyng to the Kyng's ma'ters: and alſo, ther war but fewe maters of the 'Kyng's, but if the ſame maters, towchid alſo the 'ſaid Counceylors, their coſyns, their ſervaunts, te'naunts, or ſuch other as thay owy'd favor unto. And 'what lowar man was than ſytting in that Counceile, 'that durſt, ſay, ageyn the opynyoun of any of the grete 'Lords? And might not than men make, by meanys 'of corrupcion, ſum of the ſervaunts and Counceillours, 'of ſome of the Lords, to move the Lords to parcya'lite, and to make them favourable and parcyal, as 'wer the ſame ſervaunts, or the parties that ſo movyd 'them. Than could no mater treatid in the Councile, 'be kepte privy and ſecrete. For the Lords oftyn 'tymes tould to their Counceylours and ſervaunts, that 'had ſewyd to them for the maters, hou thay had 'ſped in them, and who was ageyn them. Hou may 'the Kyng be councelid to reſtrayne gevyng away of 'his lond; of gevyng of offices corodyes, or pencions 'of abbeys, by ſuch gret Lords, to other menys ſer'vants, ſythen they moſt deſyer ſuch gyfts for them'ſelf and their ſervants. Which thyngs conſydery'd, 'and alſo many other, which ſchal be ſchewy'd here'after, hyt is thought good, that the Kyng had a 'Counceile choſyn and eſtabliſchid, in the fourme that 'followith, or in ſome other fourme like thereunto. 'Firſt, that ther were choſyn xii temporal men, and 'xii ſpirituall men, of the wiſeſt and beſt diſpoſyd 'men that can be found in al the parties of the lande; 'and that they be ſworne to counceile the Kyng, after 'a fourme to be devyſyd for their othe. And in eſpe'cyall, that thay ſchal take no fee, nor clothyng, 'nor reward, of any man, excepte only of the Kyng, 'like as the Juſtices of the Kyng's Benche, and of the 'Common Place, be ſworne, whan thay take their 'offices. And that thees xxiv be always Counceilors; 'but, if ther be any defawte fownd in them, or that 'yt lyſt the Kyng, by the advyſe of the more partie 'of them, to chaunge any of them. And that every 'year, be choſyn by the Kyng, iv^er Lords Spiritual, 'and iv^er Lords Temporal, to be for that yere of the 'ſame Counceile, in like fourme as the ſaid xxiv ſchal 'be. And that they al have an heede, or a cheffe 'ruler, one of the ſaid xxiv, and choſyn and appoin'tyd by the Kyng, havyng his office at the Kyng's 'pleaſure, which may then be callid Capitalis Concili'arius. Hyt ſchal not be neceſſarye, that the xij ſpi'ritual men of this Counceile, have ſo grete wages as 'the xij temporal, becauſe they ſchal not nede to kepe 'an houſehold in their countrey, while thay be abſent, 'as the temporal men muſt needs do, for their wives 'and children. By which conſyderation, the Spiritual 'Judges, in the Court of Parlement of Paris, takyn 'but CC franks by the yere; whereas, the Temporal 'Judges thereof, takyn by the year CCC frankes. 'The ſaid viij Lords alſo, which, by reaſon of their 'Baronies and aſtats, ben to the Kyng always, Conſili'arii nati, and therſor oughtyn to counceile him at al 'tymys, whan he woll nedyn not to have grete wags 'for their attendaunce to this Conceile, which ſhall laſt 'but for a yere. For temporal men, which, by rea'ſon of their enheritance and lyvelood, been made 'Scheriffs for a yere, takyn of the Kyng lityl and al'moſt no thyng, for their ſervice of that yere. And 'though that wages of the ſaid xxiv Counceilors, ſeme 'a new and a grete charge to the Kyng, yet, whan it 'is conſidered hou grete wages the grete Lords, and 'other men, which wer of the Kyng's Counceile, in 'tymes paſſed, toke for their attendaunce therunto, 'which maner of Counceile was nothyng ſo behovefull 'to the Kyng, and to his Realme, as this wol be, 'which wags ſchal than forwith ceaſſe; the wages of 'the xxiv Counceillors ſchal appere no grete charge to 'the Kyng. And I can ſuppoſe, that ſumme Kyngs 'before this tyme, have gevyn to ſum one man that 'hath ſervyd him, as mych lyvelood yerely, as the 'ſaid wages woll come unto. And if the ſame wags 'be thought ſo grete charge unto the Kyng, the fore'ſaid Counceillours may be in leſs nombre, as to be 'xvi^en Counceillours of private perſonys, with ij Lords 'Spiritual, and ij Lords Temporal, ſo as than they 'be in all xx^ti Perſons. Thees Counceillours may 'continually, at ſuch houres as ſchall be aſſigned to 'them, comeune and deliber upon the maters of de'ficultie, that fallen to the Kyng; and than upon the 'maters of the polycie of the Realme: as how the 'going out of the money may be reſtraynyd; how bul'lion may be brought into this land; how alſo plate, 'jewels, excepted, to which he refers in a treatise already mentioned; but, however, we have taken all the care possible to represent those titles distinctly, and to give the reader the best lights we can, where they may yet be found and consulted by such as have the curiosity to enquire after the labours of this excellent person, which, from what we have seen of his compositions, cannot but be esteemed every way worthy of perusal [O]. ' jewels, and money, late borne oute, may be getyn ' yn ageyn, of which, right wise men may soon find ' the meanys. And also, hou the pricys of merchaun- ' dises, growyn in this lond, may be holden up and ' encreasyd, and the prycys of merchaundise, brought ' into this lond, abatyd. How our Navye may be ' maynteny'd and augmentyd; and upon such other ' pointz of polycie, to the gretteſt profit and encreaſe ' that ever came to this lond. Hou also the Lawy's ' may be amendyd in such thyngs as thay nede refor- ' mation in, wher thorough the Parlements schall or may ' do more good in a moneth, to the amendment of ' the Lawe, than thay may do in a yere, if the amend- ' ment thereof be not debatid, and by such counceile ' rypynd to their hands. Ther may be of this Coun- ' ceile, when they liſte to come thereunto, or that ' they be desyryd by the said Counceilors, the gretteſt ' officers of the land, as Chauncelor, Treſorar, and ' Pryvye Seale, of which the Chancelor, whan he is ' presen, may be Hye Presiden, and have the su- ' preme rule of al the Counceile. Also, the Juges ' and Barons of th' Escheker, and the Clerk of the ' Rollis, and such Lords as the said forsaid Counceil- ' lors woll desyer to be with them, for matters of ' grete diffyculty may be of this Counceile, whan they ' be desyryd, and els not. All other maters which ' schal conserne this Counceile, as whan a Counceilor ' dyyth, hou a new Counceylor schal be chosyn, how ' many howrs of the day this Counceil schal syt, whan ' they schal have any vacation, how long any of them ' may be absent, hou he schal have his leve and ' lycense, with al other articles necessary for the de- ' meanyng and rule of this counceile may be con- ' ceyvyd by leysure and put in a boke, and that boke ' kept in this counceile as a regiſtre, or an ordynal ' hou thay schal do and be orderyd in every thyng.' The sixteenth chapter shews how the Romans pros- pered while their senate was maintained in its full au- thority, and how it declined when the credit and freedom of that venerable assembly decay'd. In the seventeenth chapter, instructions are given as to the manner in which places ought to be bestowed, and it is therein observed, that the King had above a thou- sand offices in his gift. In the eighteenth are adver- tisements concerning the bestowing of pensions. In the nineteenth, the advantages which might arise from these regulations are fully stated, and in Archbishop Laud's manuscript this chapter ends abruptly, part of it being lost, but in Sir Adrian Fortescue's manuscript this is supplied, and therein is a prayer in direct terms for King Edward the Fourth, for whose use, as from many other circumstances, we have proved this treatise was undoubtedly written. The twentieth, that is the last chapter, demonstrates the expediency of the King's bestowing no gifts but by letters patent under his great seal, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, which, as this able statesman very judiciously observes, would not only prevent improper and excessive gifts, but also save the King the trouble of denying, or, at least, his being exposed to unseemly and importunate sollicitations. Take it altogether, and it will appear to be a work which affords as full evidence of the learning, wisdom, uprightness, publick spirit, and loyal gratitude of its author, as any that is extant, either in ours or in any modern language; and which as it is illu- strated with the learned Judge Fortescue's notes, may certainly be of very great use to all who are inclined to study the original and true foundation of our laws and civil constitutions.

[O] Every way worthy of perusal.] The care with which this great man's works have been so long pre- served, the variety of copies, in different libraries, as well as numerous editions of his little treatise, in praise of the Laws of England, are more than sufficient to refute that ill grounded, as well as ill bred, censure, of one, whose rank and function, should have restrained from such indecent language, more especially of so great a man, and one so long since in his grave (50), he wrote, says he, other two books of the distinc- ' tion, betwixt Dominium Regale & Politicum, and a ' retractation of his errors, about the title of the ' House of York, both which are still pretty common ' in manuscript, but have not yet been thought worthy ' of the press. A third, he compiled likewise, as ' himself tells us, for the use of Prince Edward, which ' treated, de natura legis naturæ; and, in the opi- ' nion of its author, was a notably shrewd piece: but ' whether 'tis now lost, or was destroyed, and recanted ' upon the forementioned change of his side and prin- ' ciples, I cannot tell.' We may believe him, since we shall shew that his intelligence, at least in this point, was of no greater extent than his good man- ners. All the pieces that he ever was acquainted with, have been already mentioned, one only ex- cepted, that, and the rest, are as follows.

Opusculum de Natura legis Naturæ, &c. (51). A pretty fair book for the time when it was written. ' A cu- ' rious MS. on paper, small folio, with large margins, ' especially at the bottom, writ on both sides, with- ' out introduction, dedication, or preface.' Each chapter hath its contents. The whole title is,

Opusculum de Natura legis Naturæ, & de ejus cen- sura in Successione Regnorum Supremorum. i. e. ' A ' short treatise of the Nature of the Law of Nature, ' and its influence in the Succession of independent So- ' vereignties.' It is distinguished as a first part (pars prima). The conclusion of this piece (cap XLVIII) seems to intimate, an argument upon the rules of Suc- cession to Kingdoms in general. It is in the following words; Scriptor progreditur, alium superinde, quod de jure succedendi in regnis, supremis intitulabitur, exor- diens sic libellum. This second part is now lost, or probably destroy'd by its author. Mr Waterhouse, in his commentary on Fortescue, mentions the Opus- culum (52), under the character of an excellent trea- tise; a book of worth and weight, purposely penned to set forth to the Prince the just measure of govern- ment, according to the law of nature and nations. Tho' the language be a little incorrect, the sense, con- sidering the time when the author wrote, is very ex- traordinary; and he must be allowed to have been a person of general and useful learning. This is also in the Worsley Library, under the title of Tractatus de Naturâ legis Naturæ, per D. Joannem Fortescue (53). The book de Vigore legis Naturalis, mentioned by both Bale and Pits, probably is the Opusculum.

But it may be doubted, whether this was written by our author or not. Dugdale ascribes to him an abridg- ment of the book of assizes (64), in which he seems to be mistaken; yet it is very far from being impossible, that there may be other works of our author still pre- served in manuscript, with which the learned world is not yet acquainted, and it may be, that some of his thing of the remaining part of his life, which was very probably ſpent in an honourable retirement in the country, free from the cares, and remote from the dangers, that neceſſarily attend thoſe who paſs their time in Courts. Neither is there any diſtinct account preſerved of his death; we are only told in general, that he was near ninety-years of age (x) when he breathed his laſt, which the circumſtances of his life render very probable. His remains were interred in the Pariſh-Church of Ebburton, where one of his deſcendants, in the year 1677, cauſed a monument to be repaired, upon which was the effigies of this venerable perſon in his robes, and added an inſcription to his memory (y) [P]. It has been very truly reported, that all good men, and lovers of the Engliſh conſtitution, ſpeak of him with honour (z); and that he ſtill lives in the opinion of all true Engliſhmen, in as high eſteem and reputation as any Judge that ever ſat in Weſtminſter-Hall. He was a man acquainted with all ſorts of learning, beſides his knowledge in the Law, in which he was exceeded by none, as will appear by the many learned judgments he gave when on the Bench, in the year-book of Henry the Sixth. His character in Hiſtory, is that of pious, loyal, and learned; and he had the honour to be called the Chief Councellor of the King. He was a great courtier, and yet a great lover of his country. It would carry this article into too great a length, if we ſhould inſert here all that is even neceſſary to be ſaid of his learning and virtues; and therefore ſome points relative to theſe, and ſerving to ſet his character in a true light, are placed at the bottom of the page [Q]. writings are loſt. John Speed (65) quotes him in his hiſtory, in a place where nothing occurs, at leaſt, in his publiſhed works, that has any relation to that paſſage; and yet Speed was too honeſt and too correct a writer, either to miſlead others, or to be miſled himſelf. It would be certainly a great benefit to the learned world, if all his manuſcripts were printed, for he was a man of general knowledge, great obſervation, and one who has given many uſeful notices, in relation to the dark parts of our Hiſtory and Antiquities.

To
The happy and immortal Memory,
Of that moſt famous man,
SIR JOHN FORTESCUE;
An ancient Knight, Chief Juſtice of England,
And in proceſs of time under Henry VI.
And Prince Edward, High Chancellor;
Of the King, the moſt prudent Councellor;
In the Laws of England, profoundly learned;
And of thoſe Laws alſo
A Champion,
Invincible;
Whoſe earthly remains in expectation of a joyful Reſurrection are here depoſited;
This Marble Monument
Is erected,

By the direction, and at the expence of
ROBERT FORTESCUE, Eſq;
The direct heir of this family lately deceaſed.
Of him, who juſtice could the beſt explain,
This little URN doth all that's left contain.
His country's living Law, that Laws great light,
The ſcourge of wrong, and the defence of right.
His birth diſtinguiſhed, merit gave him ſtate,
Learning, applauſe, but virtue made him great.
Through darkneſs now a carbuncle he ſhines,
Nor wiſdom's rays the gloomy grave confines;
To lateſt times ſhall FORTESCUE be known,
And in the LAWS juſt PRAISE be read his own.

[Q] Are placed at the bottom of the page] We are told by Bale (67), upon the credit of Robert Record, a very ſenſible and learned man, and one well acquainted with the perſonal Hiſtory of Engliſh Scholars and Stateſmen, as well as with the civil Hiſtory of the Engliſh Nation; that this reverend perſon, through the whole courſe of his life, was a great lover of polite literature, and that he obtained great reputation for his learned lectures on the Civil-Law (the Common he probably means) while he was yet reſident in the Inns of Court. There is ſomething remarkable in the author's Latin Diction, and therefore I beg leave to cite his own words, Excoluit tum juvenis, tum etiam ſenex, virtutem: literaſque politas, ut qui maximè, ſemper amavit. Inter forenſes Londini clariſſimus juris civilis interpres admittebatur: ac nobiliores in ſchola juvenes, peculiares à regibus conditas leges perdocuit. This commendation of him is very juſt and well founded, ſince his writings plainly ſhew that he was a man of general learning, and of great reading for thoſe times; for we find him quoting Ariſtole, Tully, Quintilian, Boetius, St Aueſpouſed the daughter of Richard Denſell, of Filleigh; and in her right was ſeated at Filleigh in Devonſhire (a), and had iſſue two ſons, John and William; the firſt married Jaquet, eldeſt daughter of Ralph St Leger, and had iſſue a ſon Bartholomew, who dying without iſſue, the eſtate at Filleigh devolved on William Forteſcue, Eſq; his uncle, which William was before ſeated at Buckland Filleigh, and by Maud his wife, daughter and heir of John Atkyns, of Milton, in the county of Devon, had iſſue three ſons, John, Edward, and James; as alſo a daughter Jaquet, married to William Dennis, of Southcomb in Devonſhire, Eſq; (b). William Forteſcue, Eſq; the eldeſt ſon, took to wife Anne, daughter of Sir Roger Gifford, of Brightley in Devonſhire, and had iſſue five ſons and eight daughters (d). Of his ſons, two of the youngeſt of them, Faithful and Nicholas, had the honour of knighthood conferred on them, and were diſtinguiſhed for their eminent abilities [R]. His eldeſt ſon was John

St Auſtin, Aquinas, Ægidius, Romanus, Pariſienſis, and many other good authors; but he was far from drawing all his knowledge from books, he gathered much from his own experience, and was very communicative with reſpect to the fruits of it, of which it may not be amiſs to give here an inſtance or two, as in reality they make a part of his hiſtory, and are beſides, curious in themſelves, and not to be met with any where elſe. In anſwering an objection made by the Prince, that cauſes were often very tedious in England; he obſerves two things, firſt, that this was not an inconvenience to which the Engliſh laws only were liable; and next, that too much haſte, was a greater inconveniency than too little (68). Upon this ſubject, he adds: 'There 'are in France, in the Supreme Court of Parliament, 'ſome cauſes which have been depending upwards of 'thirty years. I myſelf know a caſe of appeal proſe-'cuted in the ſaid court, which has been depending 'now theſe ten years, and it is likely will be ſo for 'ten years more, before it can be decided. While 'lately at Paris, my hoſt ſhewed me his proceſs in 'writing, which had been before the Court of Parlia-'ment for eight years, for four French Sols rent, which 'of our money, makes but eight-pence, and he had 'no proſpect of obtaining judgment in leſs than eight 'years more. I have known other caſes of the ſame 'nature: And for what appears to me, the laws of 'England do not admit of ſo great delays, as the laws 'of France. But it is really neceſſary there ſhould be 'delays in legal proceedings, provided they be not too 'dilatory and tedious. By theſe means the parties, in 'particular the party proſecuted, is better provided 'with his proper defence and advice of counſel, which 'otherwiſe neither of them could be either to proſe-'cute or defend, judgment is never ſo ſafe when the 'proceſs is hurried on. I remember once at an Aſſizes 'and Goal Delivery at Saliſbury, that I ſaw a woman 'indicted for the death of her huſband within the year: 'ſhe was found guilty and burnt for the ſame. In 'this caſe the Judge of Aſſize, after the whole pro-'ceedings before him were over, might have reſpited 'the execution of the woman even after the expira-'tion of the year. At a ſubſequent Aſſizes I ſaw a 'ſervant of the man who was ſo killed, tried and con-'victed before the ſame Judge for the ſame murder, 'who made an ample public confeſſion, that he was 'the only perſon who was guilty of the ſaid fact, and 'that his miſtreſs who had been executed was entirely 'innocent of it: wherefore he was drawn and hanged, 'and at the time and-place of his execution, he la-'mented the caſe of his poor miſtreſs upon account 'of her innocence, and her being in no wiſe privy to 'her huſband's death. The fact being thus, how 'may we ſuppoſe the Judge to be affected with a ſenſe 'of conſcience and remorſe, for being ſo haſty in 'awarding judgment of execution, when it was in his 'power to have ſtay'd for ſome time further proceſs 'againſt her: he often owned to me with concern, 'that he ſhould never be able to ſatisfy it to his con-'ſcience, for ſuch his precipitate behaviour. Deli-'beration often brings judgment to maturity, which 'ſeldom or never happens where the proceedings are 'too much hurried on. Wherefore the Laws of Eng-'land admit Eſſoins, a ſort of practice not known in 'the Laws of other countries.' There is a caſe ſtill more remarkable than this to the ſame purpoſe, in the works of Sir Edward Coke (69), whoſe high opinion of our author we have already mentioned, and with reſpect to this very chapter, he commends it particularly, and adviſes that the rule which Sir John Forteſcue lays down, ſhould be always kept in mind by ſuch as are deſirous of rendering rather true than quick juſtice. That true Patriot, and moſt judicious Hiſtorian, Sir Walter Raleigh, ſpeaking of our reverend author, ſtiles him, that notable bulwark of our Lawes (70). He had reaſon ſo to do, for never any author, either antient or modern, took more pains than he did to ſecure them againſt the ambition of Princes, as well as the paſſions and vices of private men. It is a very ſhrewd inſinuation of his, that how abſolute ſoever ſome conſtitutions might be upon the Continent, yet it was impoſſible an iſland ſhould be planted upon thoſe terms (71). The followers of Brute, ſays he, before they embarked, reſolved to unite themſelves into a ſociety, hence ſprung their policy, and to facilitate the execution of this deſign, they conſented to be governed by a ſingle perſon, hence aroſe our Monarchy. The remark of the late Judge Forteſcue upon this, is extremely ſenſible. 'It may be obſerved here, that 'our author does not affirm the ſtory of Brute to be 'true, but only produces it as an inſtance, which up-'on the ſuppoſition of its truth is very appoſite: tho' 'whether it be really true or no, is not material in 'this place, and is left to every man's own opinion.' We may from hence gather the reaſon why our learned author, and after him Sir Edward Coke, and many others, maintained that the Laws of the Britons were never cancelled, but ſubſiſted always; which, tho' oppoſed by the ingenious Mr Hakewill, and other learned Antiquaries, is a very good poſition; becauſe in matters of great obſcurity, that ſuppoſition ought to be held for truth, whence the beſt conſequences may be drawn, and as there cannot be a better reaſon for our remaining free than that we were always ſo, it is right to ſay, that the Laws of the antient Britons which were certainly favourable to liberty, never were or can be cancelled. Agreeable to this notion it was laid down for Law in the reign of Edward the Fourth, that the Common Law has been from the Creation of the World, for it is common reaſon (72). To conclude, there is hardly any writer of note, who has mentioned this great and good man, but has at the ſame time applauded his notions, and afforded a juſt tribute of praiſe to his great abilities and inflexible virtue. This character indeed may be well given him, for as adverſity could not break, ſo proſperity could not corrupt him, for when King Henry the Sixth, in the thirty fourth year of his reign, made another Sheriff for the county of Lincoln, than the Statute warranted, the two Chief Juſtices, Sir John Forteſcue, and Sir John Priſot, declared publickly for themſelves and their brethren, that the King therein did an error (73), and with this notable and noble inſtance of his integrity let us conclude this note.

It is indeed ſo good an account, that the reader ought to ſee it in his own words, which are theſe (74). 'As the right wing of 'the John Forteſcue, of Filleigh, Eſq; who married Anne, daughter of Walter Porter, of Thetford in the county of Norfolk, Eſq; his eldeſt ſon, I preſume, was Robert Forteſcue, of Filleigh, Eſq; who married Grace, daughter of Sir Bevil Grenville, of Stowe, and ſiſter to John Earl of Bath; by whom having no iſſue male (e), the eſtate deſcended to Hugh Forteſcue, of Filleigh, Eſq; who married Bridget, ſole daughter and heir of Hugh Boſcawen, of Tregothnan, in the county of Cornwall, by Margaret his wife, fifth daughter, and at length co-heir, of Theophilus Earl of Lincoln, and Baron Clinton; whoſe ſiſters having no ſurviving iſſue, the barony of Clinton devolved on Hugh Forteſcue, of Filley, Eſq; ſon and heir of the beforementioned Hugh and Bridget; which Hugh having demanded a writ of ſummons to Parliament, purſuant to his claim, was, on the 16th of March 1721, called up to the Houſe of Peers, and took his ſeat according to the rank of the antient Barons Clinton, who, by ſeveral ſummons, had enjoyed it from the ſixth of February 1298, the twenty-ſixth of Edward the Firſt (f). In 1721, his Lordſhip was conſtituted Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of Devonſhire, and, on the twenty-ſeventh of May 1725, was elected a Knight of the moſt honourable order of the Bath: On his preſent Majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, he was again conſtituted Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of Devonſhire, and one of the Lords of his Majeſty's Bed-Chamber; but in 1733 reſigned his places (g). On a ſucceeding alteration of affairs, his Lordſhip came again into employment; and, as a teſtimony of reſpect paid to his ſervices, he was, by letters patents bearing date July the fifth 1746, created Baron Forteſcue, of Caſtle-Hill in the county of Devon, and Earl Clinton (b). Of this family likewiſe was the late William Forteſcue, Eſq; firſt Attorney-General to the Prince, and afterwards Maſter of the Rolls; and indeed there have been ſo many eminent perſons of this ſirname, and of theſe not a few bearing the ſame chriſtian-name, that it is a thing of very great difficulty to diſtinguiſh and ſtate their deſcents truly, more eſpecially as the heireſſes of the elder branches commonly married ſome gentleman of their own name; ſo that their deſcendants ſeem, from the lands which they inherit in right of their mothers, to be of elder families than they really were, a caſe not at all common in other numerous families.

' the King's horſe advanced to charge the left wing, ' which was the groſs of the enemy's horſe, Sir Faithful Forteſcue, who having his fortune and intereſt in ' Ireland, was come out of that Kingdom to haſten ' ſupplies thither, and had a troop of horſe raiſed for ' him for that ſervice; but as many other of thoſe ' forces were, ſo his troop was likewiſe diſpoſed into ' that army, and he was now Major to Sir William ' Waller; he with his whole troop advanced from the ' groſs of their horſe, and diſcharging all their piſtols ' on the ground within little more than carabine ſhot ' of his own body, preſented himſelf and his troop to ' Prince Rupert, and immediately with his Highneſs ' charged the enemy. Whether this ſudden accident ' as it might very well, and the not knowing how ' many more were of the ſame mind, each man looking upon his companion with the ſame apprehenſions as upon the enemy, or whether the terror of ' Prince Rupert and the King's horſe, or altogether ' with their own evil conſciences wrought upon them, ' I know not, but that whole wing having unſkilfully ' diſcharged their carabines and piſtols into the air, ' wheel'd about, the King's horſe charging in the ' flank and rear, and having thus abſolutely routed ' them, purſued them flying, and had the execution ' of them above two miles.' We may be ſatisfied, that this matter is not repreſented in too ſtrong a light in this relation, ſince it is placed rather in a ſtronger by the Hiſtorian of the Parliament, who aſcribes the great diſorder of their cavalry, which might, and indeed muſt, have been fatal to the Earl of Eſſex and his army, if Prince Rupert had ſhewn as much conduct as courage, to the going over of Sir Faithful Forteſcue with his troop (75). But how advantageous ſoever this might be to his Majeſty's cauſe, it was in ſome meaſure fatal to that corp, for in the confuſion that afterwards happened as they forgot to pull off their orange coloured ſcarfs, ſome of the royaliſts fired upon them, by which ſeventeen or eighteen were killed (76). It may be eaſily conceived, that this gentleman's behaviour drew upon him a very heavy load of reproach from thoſe whom he left. His juſtification however was very ſhort and explicit, his troop was raiſed for the Iriſh ſervice, and therefore when the Parliament obliged him to act againſt the King, it was taking ſuch an advantage of him, as left him no other means of recovering his freedom, and doing what he took to be his duty, than that of quitting their forces the firſt opportunity that offered. Their own proceeding was a leſſon to him, and by whatever arguments they could hope to juſtify their compelling him to take ſervice under the Earl of Eſſex, his leaving that ſervice muſt be likewiſe juſtified (77). His Brother, Sir Nicholas Forteſcue was a Knight of Malta, and was alſo Knighted by King James the Firſt at Whitehall (78), on the ſecond of February 1617. He was, as one characteriſes him, a perſon of ſo dexterous an addreſs, that when he came into notice, he came into favour, when he entered the court he had the chamber, yea, the cloſet of a Prince, open. A gentleman that did much in his perſon, and, as he would ſay, let reputation do the reſt (79). He and Sir Edmund Forteſcue were always obſerved ſo wary as to have all their enemies before them. He loſt his life in the ſervice of King Charles the Firſt in Lancaſhire (80). Of Sir Edmond Forteſcue of Vallowpit, or Fallowpit, before mention'd, and who alſo ſuffered deeply in the ſame cauſe, there are likewiſe ſome few particulars preſerved. After having ſerved Charles the Firſt with great courage and fidelity, as a brave Commander in the wars, and made as honourable articles for the ſurrender of Charles Fort at Salcombe, Devon, whereof he was Governor, as could be demanded. Upon the fall of the King, and his cauſe, he fled beyond ſea, and died in Holland, he was interred at Delft, where is a monument erected to his memory (81). He was forced to compound for his eſtate at ſix hundred and ſixty pounds and upwards in the ſame troubles. There was one John Forteſcue of Cookill in Worceſterſhire, Eſq; who paid two hundred thirty four pounds for his loyalty, and John Forteſcue of Bridleſt, Devon, perhaps, it ſhould be Spridleſtow, who paid two hundred and two pounds (82). In the next article ſome farther account will be given of the eminent perſons of this family, and whoever is deſirous of being ſtill better informed, may find abundant proofs of our not having exhauſted this copious ſubject (83).

FORTESCUE (Sir JOHN), a very learned gentleman, a true patriot, an able ſtateſman, Privy-Councellor, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James the Firſt. He was deſcended in a direct Line from the elder brother, or rather one of the elder brothers, of Chancellor Forteſcue, before-mentioned, who was his father's great uncle (a), as the reader will ſee by the account of his family in the notes [A]. He was but very young at the time the firſt misfortune befel his family, in the perſon of Sir Adrian Forteſcue, Knight of the Bath, his father (b), who having unfortunately entered into a cloſe alliance with a family under the extreme diſpleaſure of King Henry the Eighth, had the ill luck, notwithſtanding he had ſtood for many years very high in that monarch's favour, to be involved in one of thoſe proſecutions which he thought neceſſary for his ſafety (c); and being attainted for high-treaſon, of which we have but a very dark account in our hiſtories, loſt his head (d); but died very much pitied, as being eſteemed a perſon of great learning and wiſdom, as well as a gallant man and a great officer, and one who fell rather to gratify the royal ſuſpicions, than from his being guilty of any formed deſign to the prejudice of the crown (e) [B]. To whom the care of his children devolved, we have not, at this

[A] In the notes.] As there are few families in England ſo numerous, or divided into ſo many branches, ſettled in different parts of the kingdom as this of Forteſcue (1); ſo the confuſion and miſtakes which this has occaſioned, has thrown ſome obſcurity on very material paſſages in our hiſtory, which, as far as we are able, we have, in theſe two articles, endeavoured to rectify and ſet in a true light. It has been ſhewn, that Sir Henry Forteſcue, Chief Juſtice of Ireland, had three ſons, the ſecond of which was Sir Richard Forteſcue (2), who was the father of Sir John Forteſcue of Punſburn, in the county of Hertford (3), who married Alice youngeſt daughter of Sir Jeffery Bullen, Lord Mayor of London, by Anne his wife, daughter, and one of the heirs of Thomas Lord Hoo and Haſtings, Knight of the Garter, and was grandfather to Thomas Bullen, Earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond, the father of Queen Anne Bullen, the mother of Queen Elizabeth (4). From which match proceeded Sir John Forteſcue of Punſburn, porter of the town of Calais (5), who in the third year of King Richard the Third, having ſet at liberty John Vere Earl of Oxford, impriſoned by that King, went with him into France, and came over with Henry, Earl of Richmond, when he attained the Crown of England by his victory at Boſworth field, that Earl, upon his landing at Milford-Haven, knighted this Sir John Forteſcue (6), who in the ſecond of Henry the Seventh, for his valour at the battle of Newark on Trent, when John, Earl of Lincoln, and Lambert Simnel were defeated, was made Knight Banneret (7), and his brother Sir Adrian Forteſcue was made one of the Knights, at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales, on the eighteenth of February, in the nineteenth year of Henry the Seventh (8), during whoſe reign both brothers were in high favour. This Sir Adrian Forteſcue was a valiant ſoldier, and ſerved King Henry the Eighth in his wars (9). In the fifth of Henry the Eighth, he and John Forteſcue, Eſq; had the King's letters of protection (10) going with Sir Charles Herbert, Knight, in that expedition, when Teroven and Tournay were taken, and a memorable battle fought, called, by our Hiſtorians, the battle of Spurs (11); we alſo find this Sir Adrian Forteſcue attended on the Queen at that famous interview, Anno 1520, between King Henry the Eighth, and the French King (12). Alſo in the fifteenth of the ſame King, he was one of the principal commanders of thoſe forces that took Bray and Montdidier, and ravaged thoſe parts of France (13). But notwithſtanding all theſe ſervices he fell into diſgrace, and, as will be ſhewn in the next note, was executed for high-treaſon (14). He married firſt, Anne, daughter of Sir William Stoner, of Stoner in Oxfordſhire, by whom he had iſſue, Margaret, married to Thomas Lord Wentworth, and Frances, to Thomas Lord Fitzgerald, eldeſt ſon to the Earl of Kildare (15). But this Sir Adrian by his ſecond wife, Anne, daughter of Sir William Rede of Rockingham Caſtle in Northamptonſhire, had iſſue three ſons, John, the ſubject of this article, Thomas, and Anthony; as alſo two daughters, Mary, married to William, ſon and heir of John Norris of Fyfield in Berkſhire, and Elizabeth, married to Thomas Bromley of the county of Salop, Eſquire, lineally deſcended from the famous Sir John Bromley, who in the fourth year of the reign of King Henry the Fifth, recovered the Standard of Guyen, in that memorable battle of Corby (16) then gained by the French, for which eminent ſervice, he had not only the dignity of Knighthood conferred on him, but offices of ſpecial power and truſt, with lands of great value in the Duchy of Normandy, as alſo the ſame Standard of Guyen for his creſt. In which reign was alſo Henry Bromley, and Richard Bromley, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves in thoſe wars, the firſt being a principal officer in the town of Caen (17), and in the ſeventh of Henry the Fifth, had in conſideration of his ſervices, a grant of all the lands and tenements, rents and ſervices, of Ralph Ruet: and the other being ſtiled of Harfleur, had a grant of all the lands, &c. of Sir Lionel de Recheburgh, Knight, and Jane his wife. From which Sir John Bromley, deſcended William Bromley, Eſq; Principal Secretary of State in the reign of Queen Anne. It appears from hence, our Stateſman Forteſcue was on all ſides honourably deſcended.

[B] To the prejudice of the Crown.] In order to underſtand this matter perfectly, we muſt take things a little higher. In the year 1536, there was a Rebellion againſt King Henry the Eighth, in Lincolnſhire, and in the northern counties; the former gave the King ſome apprehenſion, and therefore the Duke of Suffolk, who was ſent to ſuppreſs it, had inſtructions and authority to make uſe of fair means as well as foul, and it was by the former that he chiefly prevailed (18). Againſt the northern Rebels the Duke of Norfolk was ſent, who was aſſiſted by the Marquis of Exeter, and Biſhop Burnet ſays, it was owing to the Duke's great prudence, and by his timely applying for and publiſhing a general pardon, that all things were pacified and the King kept upon his throne; one Aſke, who had been at the head of the northern rebels, was invited to Court, kindly received by the King, who it was thought drew out of him ſome informations (19). Upon his return into the country it was ſaid that ſome new meetings were held, upon which the King was releaſed from the promiſes he had made in his pardon, many of the rebels were executed by martial law, many more tried, convicted, and put to death in different parts of the country, and the Lords Darcy and Huſſey being tried by their Peers, the Marquis of Exeter ſitting as High-Steward, found guilty, and beheaded, the former on Tower-hill, and the latter at Lincoln (20). The next year Sir Jeffery Pole gave ſome informations, upon which Henry, Marquis of Exeter, Henry Lord Montacute, elder brother to Cardinal Pole, and Sir Jeffery, and ſeveral other perſons, were apprehended, tried and executed, in the month of January following at Tower-hill and Tyburn (21). Sir Nicholas Carew, Maſter of the Horſe and Knight of the Garter, having preſumed to ſay that theſe proceedings were ſomething harſh, conſidering the Marquis was the King's couſin-german, and the grandſon of Edward the Fourth (22), he was tried, convicted, and executed on the third of March following; and now we come to the caſe of Sir Adrian Forteſcue, in which we ſhall uſe the beſt authorities we can find, and particularly that of a learned prelate, than whom there was no body better verſed in this period of our hiſtory (23). 'After theſe executions 'followed the Parliament in the year 1539, in which 'not only theſe attainders that were already paſſed 'were this distance of time, been able to discover; but most certain it is, that due care was taken of them; so that the eldest, Mr John Forteſcue, became diſtinguiſhed for his extenſive knowledge, for his ſingular ſagacity, and for his perfect acquaintance with the beſt Latin and Greek authors (f). Theſe qualifications, joined perhaps to ſome diſtant affinity in blood, which there was between him and her Majeſty on the mother's ſide (g), brought him very early to the knowledge and eſteem of Queen Elizabeth, who made uſe of his learning in the direction of her ſtudies, to which ſhe was conſtant during her whole life, and rewarded the pains he took, in that reſpect, with the place of Maſter of the Wardrobe (b). We cannot doubt but the Queen had a great eſteem for, and a very high confidence in, him, ſince the ſecond great misfortune in his family, which was the conviction of his brother Sir Anthony Forteſcue, Knt. for high-treaſon (i), did not in the leaſt affect him; but, on the contrary, it may be preſumed his intereſt had a conſiderable ſhare in obtaining, from the clemency of the Queen, the pardon of that offence; which, tho' the criminals endeavoured to extenuate, they never attempted to deny, but were convicted upon their own confeſſions [C]. It does not appear, that, in the courſe of this reign, our

'were confirmed, but new ones of a ſtrange and un'heard-of nature were enacted. It is a blemiſh never 'to be waſhed off, and which cannot be enough con'demned, and was a breach of the moſt ſacred and
'unalterable rules of juſtice which is capable of no
'excuſe, it was the attainting of ſome perſons whom 'they held in cuſtody without bringing them to a 'trial.' Concerning which I ſhall add, what the great Lord Chief Juſtice Coke writes (24). 'Altho' I queſ-
'tion not the power of the Parliament, for without
'queſtion the attainder ſtands of force in Law, yet
'this I ſay of the manner of proceeding, Auferat obli-
'vio ſi poteſt, ſi non utrumque ſilentium tegat. For 'the more high and abſolute the juriſdiction of the 'Court is, the more juſt and honourable it ought to 'be in the proceedings, and to give example of juſ-
'tice to inferior Courts.' "The chief of theſe were the Marchioneſs of Exeter, and the Counteſs of Sarum, the ſpecial matter charged on the former, is her confederating herſelf to Sir Nicholas Carew in his treaſons; to which is added, that ſhe had committed divers other abominable treaſons. The latter is ſaid to have confederated herſelf with her ſon the Cardinal, with other aggravating words. It does not appear by the journal that any witneſſes were examined, only that day that the bills were read the third time in the Houſe of Lords, Cromwell ſhewed them a coat of white ſilk, which the Lord Admiral had found among the Counteſs of Sarum's cloaths, in which the arms of England were wrought on the one ſide, and the ſtandard that was carried before the rebels was on the other ſide. This was brought as an evidence, that ſhe approved of the rebellion. Three Iriſh Prieſts were alſo attainted for carrying letters out of Ireland to the Pope and Cardinal Pole, as alſo Sir Adrian Forteſcue for endeavouring to raiſe Rebellion, Thomas Dingley, a Knight of St John of Jeruſalem, and Robert Granceter, Merchant, for going to ſeveral foreign Princes and perſuading them to make war upon the King, and aſſiſt the Lords Darcy and Huſſie in the Rebellion they had raiſed. Two gentlemen, a Dominican Frier and a Yeoman, were by the ſame Act attainted for ſaying, that that venomous ſerpent the Biſhop of Rome was ſupreme Head of the Church of England. Another gentleman, two Prieſts, and a Yeoman, were attainted for treaſon in general, no particular crime being ſpecified. Thus ſixteen perſons were in this manner attainted, and if there was any examination of witneſſes for convicting them, it was either in the Star-chamber or before the Privy-Council, for there is no mention of any evidence that was brought in the Journals: there was alſo much haſte made in the paſſing this bill, it being brought in the tenth of May, was read that day for the firſt and ſecond time, and the eleventh of May for the third time. The Commons kept it five days before they ſent it back, and added ſome more to thoſe that were in the bill at firſt, but how many were named in the bill originally, and how many were afterwards added cannot be known. Forteſcue and Dingley, ſuffered the tenth of July. As for the Counteſs of Sarum, the Lord Herbert ſaw in a record, that Bulls from the Pope were found in her houſe; that ſhe kept correſpondence with her ſon; and that ſhe forbade her tenants to have the New Teſtament in Engliſh, or any other of the books that had been publiſhed by the King's authority. She was then about ſeventy years of age, but ſhewed by the anſwers ſhe made, that ſhe had a vigorous and maſculine mind. She was kept two years priſoner in the Tower after the Act had paſſed; the King, by that reprieve, deſigning to oblige her ſon to a better behaviour; but upon a freſh provocation by a new rebellion in the north, ſhe was beheaded, and in her the name and line of Plantagenet determined. The Marchioneſs of Exeter died a natural death." Tho' there is a moſt commendable ſpirit of juſtice, and an honeſt zeal for truth in what Biſhop Burnet ſays, yet having this opportunity it may not be amiſs to add ſome other hiſtorical lights in reſpect to theſe dark paſſages, which in the opinion of the beſt judges is the great uſe of works of this nature, in which ſuch points are frequently canvaſſed as are hardly diſcuſſed in any other place. Whoever conſiders the foregoing narration, will perceive, that here was a great number of perſons of high rank, or of much experience, or of great influence, taken out of the world, upon ſtrange ſurmiſes, and very forced conſtructions, even upon the face of the proceedings againſt them, for which no competent reaſon appears; for if the Marquis of Exeter had been truly guilty of raſh expreſſions, he might have pleaded real ſervices which far outwent them; or if he denied the words, his marching againſt the northern rebels, and his ſitting as Lord High-Steward at the trial of the Lords Darcy and Huſſey, were facts very much in his favour. But theſe could be of little uſe, if only a colour was ſought to ſweep off at once the Marquis and the friends of his family. A certain Hiſtorian, who, as we have more than once obſerved, had very extraordinary aſſiſtances, has ſuggeſted one cauſe why the King was ſo deſirous of having the Marquis of Exeter out of his way. They were ſiſters children, and the King in the earlier part of his reign had ſuch an affection for him, as to declare him his ſucceſſor, but now having a ſon of his own, he entertained apprehenſions that were not to be quieted by any milder methods (25). It might be objected to this, that the extraordinary inſtances the Marquis had given of his zeal for the King's perſon and government, might have over balanced theſe ſuſpicions. To this another Hiſtorian ſupplies us with an anſwer, which is, that the King took notice with how much eaſe he raiſed many thouſand men to ſuppreſs the rebellion (26), and the thoughts of his having ſo great an influence, inſtead of diminiſhing, augmented his fears, and added weight to his ſuſpicions. The ſame maxim extended itſelf to all the reſt who were involved partly by their connections with families allied to the Crown, and partly by the knowledge the King had of the courage of ſome, and the abilities of others. The ſame ſpirit is thought to have ruled in ſubſequent councils, for Edward Courtney, the ſon of the Marquis of Exeter, remained a priſoner all the reign of Edward the Sixth, tho' but a child, releaſed indeed by Queen Mary when a man, but ſent to the Tower again upon Wyat's inſurrection, ſet at liberty once more and ſuffered to travel, but at length, as was commonly reported, poiſoned at Padua, either on account of his deſcent from Edward the Fourth, or which, perhaps, was a greater crime, preferring in his affections the Lady Elizabeth to her royal ſiſter (27).

[C] But were convicted upon their own confeſſions.] The death of his father could not divert his youngeſt ſon from his attachment to the family of Pole, of which our ſtateſman ever addicted himſelf to any party (k); he had a good eſtate, a profitable employment, and the Queen's favour, which he kept by doing his duty aſſiduouſly, and never interfering in buſineſs but when he was called to it. In the Parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-ninth of October, in the twenty-eighth year of her reign, he ſat as Burgeſs for the town of Buckingham, with Chriſtopher Edmonds, Eſq; (l). In the ſame year we find him joined with John Wolley, Eſq; of her Majeſty's Privy-Council, in a commiſſion to inſpect the money, jewels, and other valuable things, left by Anne Ducheſs of Somerſet, Widow of the Protector (m). In the Parliament ſummoned to meet on the fourth of February, in the thirty-firſt of the ſame reign, he was elected Knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks, with Thomas Taſburgh, Eſq; (n). In the ſucceeding year, upon the death of Sir Walter Mildmay, he was raiſed to the great office of Chancellor and Under-Treaſurer of the Exchequer, which he enjoyed during the remaining part of that reign (o); in this poſt he was very uſeful to the Lord Chancellor, to whom he was related, and who relied upon him entirely (p). His time was now, in a great meaſure, wholly taken up with the care of the revenue, in which he behaved with much prudence and circumſpection, as well as the higheſt probity (q); ſo that his royal miſtreſs was pleaſed to ſay of him and Secretary Walſingham, 'that they not only came 'up to, but exceeded, her expectations; the former in point of integrity, and the latter 'by his activity in her ſervice (r).' We need not wonder therefore, that, as well in regard to his parts and fidelity, as on account of his office, the Queen thought fit to take him into her moſt honourable Privy-Council (s). In the Parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter November the nineteenth, in the thirty-fifth year of her reign, he was again choſen, with Sir Robert Dormer, Knight for the county of Buckingham (t); in 1592, we find his name in a commiſſion with Henry Lord Hunſdon, Thomas Lord Buckhurſt, Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury, John Wolley, Eſq; and others, for the trial of Sir John Perrot, who, while intruſted with the government of Ireland, had been guilty of ſome indiſcretions, and had particularly indulged himſelf in paſſionate and diſreſpectful expreſſions of her Majeſty; and upon his trial being found guilty, he was nevertheleſs recommended to the Queen, as an object fitter for pity than rigour, which prevented his ſuffering according to his ſentence (u). In ſeveral other weighty affairs, and more eſpecially thoſe reſpecting the revenue, references were continually made to Sir John Forteſcue, for he was now knighted, and it appears that he dealt in them all with equal candour and caution; ſo that while he diſcharged the duties of his place with irreproachable fidelity, he gave general ſatisfaction, by that calmneſs with which he heard whatever was offered on the part of thoſe who had any favours to aſk, or buſineſs to tranſact with him (w). So high he ſtood in the Queen's eſteem, that when, through the ſtruggles amongſt her miniſters, ſhe found it difficult to know where to beſtow the ſeals of the duchy of Lancaſter, ſhe lodged them with him, till at length, upon long conſideration, they were delivered to Sir Robert Cecil (x). In the Parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter October the twenty-fourth, in the thirty-ninth year of that reign, he was, with Francis Goodwin, Eſq; choſen Knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks (y). The ſame year, in conjunction with ſeveral Privy-Counſellors, he was appointed to confer with miniſters ſent from the States-General, in which conference he dealt very roundly with them, and expoſtulated in pretty high terms on the large expences which they endeavoured to throw upon the Queen, by which he brought them to abate in their demands (z). In 1598, he was in another commiſſion for treating with the Dutch Ambaſſadors, and had a great ſhare in concluding a treaty which family he married a lady, who as ſome ſay, was ſiſter, but others with greater probability make her neice, to the Cardinal. In Queen Mary's reign this alliance was of uſe, it procured him the honour of Knighthood, and being ſent to Ireland with the title of Marſhal, from whence he returned and became Comptroller of the Houſhold to that Cardinal when Archbiſhop of Canterbury (28). In a very ſhort time after Queen Elizabeth's acceſſion, he was committed for practiſing with conjurers, to know how long the Queen would live, and for this, and other indiſcretions, orders were given to Dr Bonner, Biſhop of London (for he was not yet deprived) to proſecute Forteſcue, and thoſe concerned with him, in the Eccleſiaſtical Court (29). Yet even this did not prove a ſufficient warning, for by the perſuaſion, or at leaſt with the privity, of the French and Spaniſh Miniſters (30), Sir Anthony Forteſcue embarked in new ſchemes, for which he was again ſent to priſon; of the nature, ground, and iſſue of this plot, Camden gives us the following fair and clear account, viz. that Arthur Pole, and Jeffery Pole his brother, who were grandſons to George Duke of Clarence, with Sir Anthony Forteſcue and ſome others, entered into a deſign of withdrawing themſelves to France, where, by the aſſiſtance of the Houſe of Guiſe, they were in hopes of levying a conſiderable force, which they propoſed to tranſport into Wales, and there to proclaim Mary Queen of Scots, Queen of England, and Arthur Pole, Duke of Clarence. Forteſcue made a very full and clear confeſſion, but pleaded for himſelf and his friends, that they meant not to diſturb Queen Elizabeth's Government, becauſe none of their ſchemes were to take place till after her death, which they were aſſured would happen within the courſe of that year 1562; this, tho' it did not ſave them from condemnation, prevented their execution, her Majeſty being unwilling that ſo much Royal Blood ſhould be ſpilt upon the ſcaffold (31). She carried her compaſſion ſtill farther, and ſpared Preſtal the conjurer, becauſe he acted only an under part in this deſign. Both his misfortune and his eſcape ſhew plainly enough, that ſuperſtition and enthuſiaſm prevailed ſtrongly in thoſe times; for as he fell into this condemnation, by pretending to knowledge that he had not; ſo he obtained his liberty the ſame way, for he made his keeper believe that he was poſſeſſed of the Philoſopher's ſtone, upon which report the Earl of Pembroke begged his diſcharge as a new year's gift, which the Queen granted in 1566 (32). Such was the end of a very dangerous, and at the ſame time very ridiculous buſineſs, which if it had happened but a few years later in that reign, might have a treaty of equal benefit to the Crown and to the States [D]. In the troubles of the Earl of Eſſex, he conducted himſelf with ſuch prudence as to give no offence, either to the Queen or to thoſe who were that unfortunate nobleman's enemies; and was, notwithſtanding, underſtood throughout the whole to be his friend (a). In the proceedings in the Star-Chamber, at the cloſe of Michaelmas-term 1599, when all the great officers of State were called upon in publick, to ſpeak their ſentiments on that nice ſubject, with a view probably of obliging them to take either one part or the other; Sir John Forteſcue had the addreſs to ſpeak to the ſatisfaction of the audience, without falling into any of the heats with which others were tranſported. He firſt gave a clear account of the Queen's care and concern for the reduction of Ireland, and the meaſures purſued for that purpoſe, ſo far as they fell within the cognizance of his own office. He obſerved, that he was not called to Council when theſe matters were firſt in debate; he ſaid, that ſince he came rarely thither, moſt of his time being taken up in the management of the revenue, that, notwithſtanding this, he had a general knowledge of what paſſed in Council, from which general knowledge, however, he could collect nothing more than that notwithſtanding all the Queen's pains and providence, things were then in a worſe ſtate in Ireland than when the army firſt landed. After this, raiſing his voice, he complained, with tears in his eyes, of libels ſcattered abroad, to inflame the minds of the people; of the fatal conſequences of theſe factious intrigues amongſt great men; and cloſed his ſpeech with a pathetic recommendation of affection to the Queen's Majeſty, and a ſincere regard to the peace and welfare of the nation. He was one of the Commiſſioners, March the fifth 1600, preſent at the trial of Sir Chriſtopher Blount, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gelly Merrick, and Henry Cuffe, for high-treaſon; but it does not appear that he took any ſhare therein, except that of being preſent on the Bench (b). At the time of the death of the Queen his miſtreſs, he was poſſeſſed of the offices of Chancellor and Under-Treaſurer of the Exchequer, and Maſter of the Great Wardrobe; and was likewiſe a member of the Privy-Council (c). It is alſo very remarkable, that one of the laſt publick acts of her government, was a commiſſion directed to him, and others of the Privy-Council, for dealing with, and ſeeing baniſhed and tranſported out of her dominions, all ſeminary prieſts and jeſuits, as well thoſe then in priſon as out of priſon, or that at any time after ſhould come into or be found in her dominions; and directing, that a certificate of their proceedings ſhould be tranſmitted, under the hand of the Principal Secretary of State, to the Clerk of the Crown in the King's-Bench, in order to their being enrolled in the Crown-Office. Some writers affirm, that he oppoſed the admiſſion of King James to the vacant throne, but upon certain terms; for which that monarch is ſaid to have borne him ever afterwards a grudge (d). Yet there does not appear to be any evidence of either of theſe facts; but, on the contrary, many circumſtances which ſeem to be incompatible with either. It is not eaſy to conceive, by ſuch as are acquainted with our conſtitution, who could have taken upon them, with any hopes of ſucceſs or ſafety, to frame or preſcribe ſuch articles. An overture of this ſort, looks not very conſiſtent with the cautious and circumſpect conduct of Sir John Forteſcue, in the preceding part of his life. Beſides, upon the demiſe of the Queen, there appeared to be no doubt at all about the ſucceſſion, ſince the Privy-Council directed King James to be proclaimed before noon, at the Croſs in Cheapſide, the very day that the Queen died (e); and the only ſtruggle ſeems to have been, who ſhould aſſume the merit of communicating this acceptable news firſt to the King of Scots (f) [E]. We may add to theſe conjectures have coſt the actors in it very dear. Sir Anthony Forteſcue ſurvived this many years, and by his Lady Catherine Pole, left a ſon John behind him.

[D] Of equal benefit to the Crown and to the States.] In order to this negotiation, the States-General ſent over John Duenvoord, Admiral of Holland; John Oldenbarnevelt, Keeper of the Seals; John Verke, John Hooting, and Andrew Heſſel, and joined in the ſame commiſſion, Sir Nowel Carron, their Agent in England, who being mightily for promoting the war did in the month of Auguſt hold a conference with Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great-Seal, the Earl of Eſſex, the Admiral, George Lord Hunſdon, the Lord Buckhurſt, Sir William Knolles, Sir Robert Cecil, and Sir John Forteſcue, commiſſioners appointed by the Queen (33), and ſubſcribed to the following articles: that the treaty made Anno 1585, ſhould be ratified and confirmed, excepting ſome articles relating to the civil adminiſtration: that the Confederate States ſhould pay to the Queen eight hundred thouſand pounds of Engliſh money, viz. thirty thouſand pounds yearly during the continuance of the war, to be employed againſt the common enemy, until four hundred thouſand pounds were paid: and if a peace were agreed on between the King of Spain and the Queen, there ſhould be paid of the remaining ſum twenty thouſand pounds yearly, till the eight hundred thouſand pounds were fully diſcharged. That eleven hundred and fifty Engliſh ſoldiers, who were in the garriſons of Fluſhing, Briel, and the adjacent ports, ſhould be paid by the States. That they might have the liberty to levy men in England under Engliſh officers, who ſhould ſerve under their pay: that if the Spaniard ſhould make a deſcent on the Iſles of Wight, Guernſey, Jerſey, or Scily, the States ſhould be obliged to aſſiſt the Queen with five thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe: that if it 'twas neceſſary to equip a fleet in England to ſerve againſt Spain, they ſhould provide an equal number of ſhips: that if any Engliſh forces were ſent over into Flanders or Brabant, they ſhould provide and furniſh out the ſame number of men: as for the money due to Pallavicini, the Queen ſhould reimburſe herſelf from Brabant and Flanders, and the reſt of the Provinces which were not within the union (34). By this treaty all the ends of true policy were anſwered, a juſt proviſion made for the continuance of the war againſt Spain, and the Queen's expence reduced one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds a year. In this negotiation, Sir John Forteſcue was underſtood to ſpeak the ſenſe, and to have the ſecret of the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, who at that time laid dangerouſly ill and died very ſoon after.

[E] To the King of Scots.] We have this matter very clearly ſet down in Stowe, where it is aſſerted, that the Lords cauſed King James to be proclaimed at the Palace Gate, by eight of the clock in the morning; by conjectures and probabilities, a matter of fact relating to this gentleman, and his ſenſe of the point in queſtion; for within four days after the death of the Queen, he ſubſcribed, with other perſons of the firſt quality, a letter to the Lord Eure, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners then engaged in a negotiation at Bremen (*), ſignifying that King James was proclaimed with ſuch univerſal acclamation of all perſons, as declared the undoubted aſſurance, in every man's conſcience, of his rightful ſucceſſion; and betokened, as they hoped, the

by eleven, he was likewiſe proclaimed in Cheapſide (35), Mr Secretary Cecil reading the proclamation in perſon, with a loud voice, being attended there, by moſt of the Nobility and the Privy Council. But the moſt diſtinct, perfect, and authentic account that can be had of this matter, and which fully proves the truth of what is aſſerted in the text, is that contained in the relation of Sir Robert Carey, afterwards Earl of Monmouth, who was nearly related to Queen Elizabeth, a great favourite with King James, and who, was the very perſon that carried him the news of her deceaſe (36). We will give it in his own words. 'I went to my 'lodging, and left word with one in the Cofferer's 'Chamber, to call me, if that night (Wedneſday, 'March the twenty-third) it was thought ſhe would 'die, and gave the Porter an angel, to let me in at any 'time when I called. Between one and two of the 'clock on Thurſday morning, he that I left in the Cof-'ferer's chamber, brought me word, the Queen was 'dead. I roſe and made all haſte to the gate to get 'in. There I was anſwered, I could not enter; the 'Lords of the Council having been with him, and 'commanded him, that none ſhould go in and out, 'but by warrant from them. At the very inſtant, one 'of the Council, the Comptroller (37), aſked whether 'I was at the gate? I ſaid yes. He ſaid to me; if I 'pleaſed, he would let me in; I deſired to know how 'the Queen did? He anſwered, pretty well. I bad 'him good night. He replied and ſaid, Sir, if you 'will come in, I will give you my word and credit 'you ſhall go out again at your own pleaſure. Upon his 'word I entered the gate, came up to the Cofferer's 'chamber, where I found all the ladies weeping bit-'terly. He led me from thence into the Privy-Cham-'ber, where all the Council was aſſembled. There I 'was caught hold of, and aſſured I ſhould not go for 'Scotland, till their pleaſure was farther known. I 'told them I came on purpoſe to that end. From 'thence they all went to the Secretary's Chamber; 'and as they went, they gave eſpecial command to 'the porters, that none ſhould go out of the gate, but 'ſuch ſervants as they ſhould ſend to prepare their 'coaches and horſes for London. There was I left in 'the midſt of the court to think my own thoughts, 'till they had done Council. I went to my brother's 'chamber, who was in bed, having been over watched 'many nights before. I got him up with all ſpeed, 'and when the Council's men were going out of the 'gate, my brother thruſt to the gate. The porter 'knowing him to be a great officer, let him out. I 'preſſed after him, and was ſtaid by the porter. My 'brother angrily ſaid to the porter: Let him out, I 'will anſwer for him. Whereupon I was ſuffered to 'paſs, which I was not a little glad of. I got to 'horſe, and rode to the Knight-Marſhal's lodging by 'Charing-Croſs, and there ſtaid till the Lords came 'to Whitehall Garden (38). I ſtaid there till it was 'nine o'clock in the morning; and hearing that all 'the Lords were in the old orchard at Whitehall, I 'ſent the Marſhal to tell them, that I had ſtaid all 'that while to know their pleaſures, and that I would 'attend them, if they would command me any ſer-'vice. They were very glad, when they heard I 'was not gone, and deſired the Marſhal to ſend for 'me, and I ſhould with all ſpeed be diſpatched for 'Scotland. The Marſhal believed them, and ſent Sir 'Arthur Savage for me. I made haſte to them, one 'of the Council, my Lord of Banbury that now is, 'whiſpered the Marſhal in the ear, and told him, if 'I came they would ſtay me, and ſend ſome other in 'my ſtead. The Marſhal got from them, and met 'me coming to them between the two gates. He 'bad me be gone, for he had learned for certain, that 'if I came to them they would betray me. I returned, 'and took horſe between nine and ten a clock, and 'that night I rode to Doncaſter. The Friday night 'I came to my own houſe to Wetherington, and pre-'ſently took order with my deputies to ſee the bor-'ders kept in quiet, which they had much to do, and 'gave order that the next morning the King of Scot-'land ſhould be proclaimed King of England, &c. 'at Morpeth and Alnewick. Very early on Saturday 'I took horſe for Edinburgh, and came to Norham 'about twelve at noon, ſo that I might well have 'been with the King by ſupper time, but I got a great 'fall by the way, and my horſe with one of his heels 'gave me a great blow on the head, that made me 'ſhed much blood. It made me ſo weak that I was 'forced to ride a ſoft pace after, ſo that the King 'was newly gone to bed by that time I knocked at 'the gate. I was quickly let in and carried up to the 'King's chamber. I kneeled by him, and ſaluted 'him by his title of England, Scotland, France, and 'Ireland. He gave me his hand to kiſs, and bade 'me welcome. After he had long diſcourſed of the 'manner of the Queen's ſickneſs, and of her death, 'he aſked what letters I had from the Council, I told 'him, none, and acquainted him, how narrowly I eſcaped 'from them, and yet I had brought him a blue ring 'from a fair lady (39), that I hoped would give him 'aſſurance of the truth that I had reported. He took 'it and looked upon it, and ſaid it is enough, I know 'by this you are a true meſſenger. Then he commit-'ted me to the charge of my Lord Hume, gave ſtrait 'command that I ſhould want nothing. He ſent for 'his Chirurgeons to attend me, and when I kiſſed his 'hand at my departure, he ſaid to me theſe gracious 'words, I know you have loſt a near kinſwoman and 'a loving miſtreſs, but take here my hand I will be 'as good a maſter to you, and will requite this ſervice 'with honour and reward.' The firſt author who ſuggeſted any thing in relation to Sir John Forteſcue was Francis Oſborn, Eſq; and the very title of his treatiſe ſhews, that it is not to be put into the balance with what we are told, by thoſe who were eye and ear witneſſes of what they relate; his account however is worth reading, and runs thus (40). 'The news of 'the Queen's death was brought him firſt, as I have 'heard, by Carey after Lord Lepington, and ſince Earl 'of Monmouth, who not able to ſatisfy ſuch a con-'courſe of doubts and queſtions, as far more reſolute 'natures than his do generally muſter upon leſs occa-'ſions, the King ſtood as in a maze, being more af-'fected thro' the fear of oppoſition, than pleaſed with 'the preſent report, till by a lamer poſt he was adver-'tiſed of his being joyfully proclaimed in London by 'the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and of the unque-'ſtioned reception, his title in all places met with, no 'leſs than that the hopes of ſome, and fears of the 'major part, aſſiſted by the prudent carriage of the 'Treaſurer, and ranting proteſtations of the Earl of 'Northumberland, that in all places vapoured he 'would bring him in by the ſword, had ſtop'd their 'mouths that deſired, in regard of the known feud 'between the nations, he might be obliged to articles: 'and amongſt theſe noble and publick ſpirits, was Sir 'John Forteſcue, Sir Walter Raleigh, the Lord Cob-'ham, &c. all frowned upon after by the King.' In direct contradiction to this Mr Winwood, after Sir Ralph Winwood and Secretary of State, in a private letter written to his intimate friend the Duke de Tremouille, immediately upon the death of the Queen, has theſe words (41). The ſame day the late Queen died, the King of Scots was proclaimed King in the city of London, between the hours of ten and eleven, with inexpreſſible applauſe, as he has been ſince through the whole kingdom, without the leaſt oppoſition being given by any perſon of what quality ſoever either by word or deed. It is not eaſy to ſuppoſe, that Mr Winwood was not as well informed as Mr Oſborn, and it cannot be imagined that he would have written a direct falſehood to a perſon of ſuch quality, when he might have ſo eaſily avoided it by ſaying nothing.

the future happineſs of his reign. Now how much ſoever of ceremony and compliment there might be in this, one cannot well believe that Sir John Forteſcue would have ſet his name to it, if he had ever raiſed any objections againſt King James's coming in except upon terms. On the ſecond of May 1603, when King James came to Brockeſborne in the county of Hertford, the Seat of Sir Henry Cock, Comptroller of the Houſhold to Queen Elizabeth, the members of the Privy-Council were preſented to his Majeſty, and were continued in that high ſtation (g). When his conſort Queen Anne came from Scotland, the King went to meet her, and on the twenty-ſeventh of June dined with her, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth, at the houſe of Sir George Fermor, in Northamptonſhire, from whence he proceeded the ſame night to Sir John Forteſcue's, at Salden in Buckinghamſhire, where they lay (h); and certainly this could not paſs for any inſtance of diſtaſte or reſentment, but rather the contrary. On the twenty-fourth of July following, Sir Francis Forteſcue, ſon to Sir John, was made a Knight of the Bath, previous to the Coronation, which was another mark of royal favour (i). It is indeed true, that, inſtead of Chancellor of the Exchequer, the King made Sir John Forteſcue Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter (k), which is the ſingle matter of fact that has been ever urged to ſhew the probability of his declining in the King's eſteem; and yet it is very poſſible, that this might be done without the leaſt diſreſpect to Sir John, and upon terms with which he might be well ſatisfied. We may the rather eſteem this to have been the caſe from a ſubſequent fact, one of the moſt remarkable in our ſtateſman's life, and none of the leaſt memorable in that Monarch's reign (l). The King having ſummoned the firſt Parliament in his reign, to meet at Weſtminſter March the nineteenth 1603-4, a writ was iſſued to the Sheriff of Buckinghamſhire, Sir Francis Cheyne, to return two Knights for that county (m). The Sheriff accordingly brought on the election January the twenty-fifth, at Brickhill, and not at Ayleſbury, becauſe the plague was there. It was intended, that Sir John Forteſcue, and Sir Francis Goodwin, ſhould be elected; but upon the Sheriff's propoſing them, the freeholders cried out, a Goodwin, a Goodwin, notwithſtanding that the moſt conſiderable gentry, and the Juſtices of Peace, were in the intereſt of Sir John Forteſcue. Upon this, Sir Francis Goodwin himſelf came, and laboured all that was in his power, to induce the freeholders to conſent that Sir John Forteſcue's name ſhould ſtand firſt in the return; but they adhered to their former opinion, and, upon receiving the poll, Sir Francis Goodwin, and Sir William Fleetwood, were returned, by the Sheriff, Knights of the Shire for the county of Bucks (n). This was repreſented to the King, as a great inſult upon Sir John Forteſcue, an old Privy-Counſellor, and, as ſuch, worthy of honour and reſpect. It was diſcovered, that Sir Francis Goodwin was outlawed, which was ſuppoſed to be a ſufficient bar to his ſitting in Parliament; of which the Sheriff being informed, he made ſuch a return to the writ, viz. that Sir Francis Goodwin was choſen, but diſabled by being outlawed; which return was drawn for him by Sir Edward Coke, then the King's Attorney-General (o). The Lord Chancellor Egerton, upon this, iſſued a ſecond writ, which was delivered to the Sheriff by Sir John Forteſcue, and upon this Sir John was returned (p). On Thurſday the twenty-ſecond of March, when the Houſe met, Sir William Fleetwood moved, that Sir Francis Goodwin might take his ſeat as Knight with him for Buckinghamſhire; which the Houſe ordered the next day, and Sir Francis did take his ſeat accordingly (q). This occaſioned a long diſpute between the Houſe and the King, the true point in debate being this, Whether the Houſe was the proper judge of the return, or the Chancellor? For if the latter was not, then the ſecond writ was void in it's own nature; this diſpute laſted to the eleventh of April, when the King propoſed it to the Houſe as an expedient, that both theſe gentlemen ſhould be ſet aſide, and a new writ iſſued for the choice of a member (r). Upon this difference between the King and the Houſe of Commons, ſo many and ſuch ſtrange reports went abroad, that it was judged expedient, by the Lord Cecil, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury, who was then at the head of the adminiſtration, to give the King's Miniſters at foreign Courts an account of it, which he did (s) [F]. Upon mature deliberation

'If you have heard any thing of any queſtion between 'the King and the Lower Houſe of Parliament, you 'may ſatisfy yourſelf whatſoever you may hear, that 'the cauſe was only by lack of underſtanding of what 'was intended by his Majeſty, and not any other 'point of importance. So as if I did not conceive 'that idle diſcourſers are apt to make comments upon 'all things according to the levity of their own brain, 'I ſhould not have touched it at all, for to be ſhort, 'it was no more but this. That Sir Francis Goodwyn having laboured to be Knight of Buckinghamſhire, to the excluſion of an antient Counſellor Sir 'John Forteſcue, it was adviſed by the King's learned 'Counſel and Judges, whether there were not ſome 'means by the Laws to avoid it. Whereupon it being found that he was outlawed, and ſo certified by 'the Sheriff, conſequently a new writ was ſent forth 'by virtue whereof Sir John Forteſcue was choſen. 'Notwithſtanding the Lower Houſe having had notice that he was once choſen, and having found that 'the outlawry was pardoned, in effect, by his Majeſty's 'general pardon upon his Inauguration, altho' in true 'conſtruction of Law, he is not Rectus in Curia, until he hath ſued out his ſcire facias, they ſomewhat 'ſuddenly fearing ſome oppoſition which was never 'intended, allowed of him and rejected the other, 'which form of proceeding appeared harſh to the 'King, rather in form than matter. And therefore 'being then deſirous that the Higher Houſe might 'have ſome conference with the Lower Houſe (which 'we as of ourſelves did intimate unto them) they grew 'jealous of that propoſition as a matter which they 'miſliked to yield to after a judgment, and therefore 'did rather chooſe to ſend to the King, that they 'would deliberation the Houſe of Commons thought fit to accept the propoſition the King had made, provided Sir Francis Goodwin, whom they had admitted to his ſeat, gave his conſent, which he very readily did; upon which a new writ iſſued, and Chriſtopher Pigott, Eſq; was choſen (t). It may be fairly preſumed, tho' the King did not carry his point in this matter, that Sir John Forteſcue thought himſelf much obliged; nor is it in any degree credible, that he would himſelf have meddled in this affair, as indeed he tranſacted many things in it perſonally, if he had been but ſlightly attached to the King, or in his principles an enemy to the Prerogative. We do not meddle with the merits of the caſe, but with the conduct of Sir John Forteſcue, who, being generally reputed a very wiſe man, as well as a man of honour, would have been aſhamed to have changed ſides in a few months, in ſo glaring a manner as to claim the aſſiſtance of that Prince's power which he had publickly adviſed ſhould be curtailed. Some authors have repreſented this as an act of great violence and injuſtice in King James, and that, as ſuch, it gave very high diſtaſte to his firſt Parliament (u). In order to countenance theſe notions, a very imperfect caſe upon this ſubject has been printed (w); but forty years after it happened, the Houſe of Commons ordered all that was entered upon that head in their journals to be printed (x), and from thence it appears in the light in which it is here placed; and to leave the reader without any doubt of this, Sir Francis Goodwin's letter, the Speaker's report of the thanks of the Houſe given to the King, together with his anſwer, and the warrant for the new writ, are inſerted in the notes (y) [G]. A little attention will ſhew, that this indiſputable matter of fact, is very hardly, if at all, reconcileable to what is ſuggeſted of Sir John Forteſcue's oppoſing

'would be glad to ſhew himſelf the reaſons, to whom 'they owed all duty as their Sovereign, rather than 'to any other, taking it ſomewhat derogative from 'their Houſe, to attribute any ſuperiority to the 'Higher Houſe, ſeeing both Houſes make but one 'body, whereof the King is the Head. This being 'done, after two conferences, in the preſence of the 'King, the Council, and Judges, the matter was compounded to all men's likings, wherein that which 'is due is only due to Cæſar, for, but for his wiſdom 'and dexterity, it could not have had any concluſion 'with ſo general an applauſe. This being found by 'debate to be moſt certain, namely, that neither of 'them both were duly returned, and therefore reſolved of all parties, that a new writ ſhould go forth 'by warrant from the Speaker, wherein none of them 'ſhould ſtand to be elected, and ſo much for the truth 'of that cauſe.' This and the following papers might have been conſulted by an author who ſtates this matthus (43). 'He (i. e. the King) let them know in 'the caſe of the conteſted election, between Sir Francis Goodwin, and Sir John Forteſcue to be Knight 'of the Shire, for the county of Bucks, that he would 'have differences determined by his abſolute power; 'and tho' the Commons voted Sir Francis duly elected, 'yet the King commanded them to let the matter be 'heard before the Houſe of Lords, and the Judges: 'but Sir Francis Goodwyn fearing it might cauſe a 'rupture between the King and the Houſe of Commons, petitioned that a new writ might be iſſued to 'elect a Knight for that county in his ſtead.' It appears from the proceedings, that the King deſired the Houſe to confer with the Judges, not as Umpires, but as his Counſellors, that he might receive ſatisfaction (44). It alſo appears from the paper which the Houſe ſent the King, that this was no new diſpute, ſince they alledged that in the twenty third year of the preceding reign a Burgeſs was returned dead, and another choſen, and returned by a new writ, but the party returned dead appearing, the Houſe of Commons admitted him to his ſeat, and notwithſtanding the Sheriff's return rejected the other. The very ſame year a Burgeſs for Hull was returned a lunatick, and a new one choſen upon a ſecond writ. The perſon firſt returned, appeared and claimed his place, the Houſe examined the matter, and found the firſt return to be true, and therefore they refuſed him, which they would not have done if the return had been falſe. In the twenty ninth year of the ſame reign, a writ was awarded into Norfolk for the choice of Knights, and election made and returned, but before the Parliament met, the Chancellor awarded a ſecond writ, and upon that alſo return was made, the Commons being attended with both writs and returns by the clerk of the Crown, examined the cauſe, allowed the firſt, and rejected the ſecond (45). The fault therefore in this caſe, lay in thoſe who adviſed the King to inſiſt ſo much upon this matter. But after all, the final reſolution was not taken upon Sir Francis Goodwin's petition, but upon the King's propoſal and Sir Francis Goodwin acquieſced under that reſolution of the Houſe, as the reader will ſee in the next note.

[G] Are inſerted in the notes.] The reader will doubtleſs obſerve, that the Lord Chancellor Egerton, and Sir Edward Coke then Attorney-General, had at this time a good underſtanding, and through them it is plain this advice with reſpect to the ſecond writ was both given and executed (46). The King therefore had reaſon to tell the Houſe of Commons as he did, that both the gentlemen were his good ſubjects, and that in one ſenſe it was indifferent to him, whether Sir John or Sir Francis was choſen; but in another, he was unwilling that any diſgrace ſhould be thrown upon an old Privy-Counſellor, ſince it was a thing himſelf had carefully avoided, and indeed it appears to have been from the accident of the plague's being at Ayleſbury, which frighted many of the better ſort from attending the county Court that Sir John Forteſcue loſt his election. But it is time to come to the papers, as we find them entered in the Journal Book of the Houſe of Commons (47).

Sir FRANCIS GOODWYN's Letter.

SIR,

'I AM heartily ſorry to have been the leaſt occa-'ſion, either of queſtion between his Majeſty and 'that honourable Houſe, or of interruption to thoſe 'worthy and weighty cauſes, which by this time in 'all likelihood had been in very good furtherance; 'wherefore underſtanding very credibly, that it pleaſed 'his Majeſty when the committees laſt attended him, 'to take courſe with them for a third writ and election 'for the Knightſhip of the county of Buckingham, I 'am ſo far from giving any impediment thereunto, 'that, contrarywiſe, I humbly deſire his Majeſty's 'direction in that behalf to be accompliſhed and performed. So praying you, according to ſuch opportunity as will be miniſtred, to give furtherance thereunto, I take my leave, and reſt

FRA. GOODWIN.

Weſtm. this 11th of April 1604.

Directed to the Right Worſhipful Sir Edward Phelips, Knight, Speaker of the Honourable Court of Parliament.

Die Veneris, viz. 13° die Aprilis 1604.

Mr Speaker returneth to the Houſe, the effect of his meſſage of thanks delivered the laſt day in the name of oppoſing King James, and of the King's reſentment ever after (z). For if this had been a thing generally known, the affront put upon him by his county, would have been a compliment to the King; as, on the other hand, one cannot eaſily conceive how the King could have been prevailed upon to interfere ſo far as he did, if he had not had a very high perſonal eſteem for Sir John Forteſcue. We may add, to ſhew that even this diſappointment did not leſſen this accompliſhed courtier's credit with his maſter, that there was a current report, the very next year, that he would have been created a Baron; the like honour being intended for the Chief Juſtice Sir John Popham, Sir Edward Coke, who was to ſucceed Sir Francis Gawdy as Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and Sir Thomas Knivet, who was very active in detecting of the powder-treaſon (a). But the laſt only had that honour, which it is not at all improbable Sir John Forteſcue, who was a very modeſt and diſintereſted perſon, might decline. He was alſo, which ought to be conſidered as a very remarkable act of confidence, one of thoſe Privy-Counſellors to whom the King, in 1606, executed an indenture (*), ſignifying what lands ſhould be for ever annexed, and what jewels ſhould be held and reputed jewels belonging to the Crown; which, tho' one part of the indenture was under the Great-Seal, was in reality a family tranſaction, till confirmed (as the King intended it ſhould) by Act of Parliament. After this, we are able to meet with no farther particulars worthy of the reader's notice, which will not ſeem ſtrange if we remember that he muſt have been now above fourſcore, ſince he was a man, tho' a very young man, at the time of his father's death; he had, however, the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his ſon, Sir Francis Forteſcue, Sheriff of the county (b), which he had alſo repreſented in the laſt Parliament of Queen Elizabeth (c). He died, as Mr Camden tells us, December the twenty-third 1607 (d), at which time he was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter, Maſter of the Great Wardrobe (e) and a Privy-Counſellor. His parts and learning firſt introduced him at Court, where, from the beginning to the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, he was in conſtant favour, and, in the latter part of it, employed in matters of the higheſt importance; ſo that if we had ſet down every commiſſion in which he is named, and dwelt minutely upon all his ſervices, it would have ſwelled this life to a much larger extent (f), tho' there is not twenty lines to be met with about him in all our Biographers. His laſting love to literature, was rendered evident by his contributions to the library, which, through the care and diligence of Sir Thomas Bodley, was erected at Oxford; and the nature of his ſtudies, agreeable to what Camden reports, is no leſs evident from the titles of ſome of the books beſtowed by him upon that library, amongſt others, by a Sophocles, with manuſcript Scholia in Greek; for which Sir Thomas held himſelf ſo much obliged, that he gave particular directions for Sir John's being received with all imaginable reſpect, when, going occaſionally to Oxford, he went to viſit the library (g). He was a particular friend and patron to the learned Camden, and, as he acknowledges, gave him great aſſiſtance in compiling his Annals of the reign of Queen Elizabeth (h); which paſſage indeed is not in the Engliſh tranſlation, or in moſt of the Latin editions, but occurs in that of Mr Hearne's, printed from the author's own copy, which was in the poſſeſſion of Dr Smith. It might be probably for this reaſon, as well as in virtue of his office as Clarencieux King at Arms, that he aſſiſted at his funeral, which, if the memorandum he left be right, was ſolemnized on the fourth of July enſuing his death, that learned perſon being diſabled, by a fall from his horſe, from making ſuch a journey ſooner (i). His poſterity for ſeveral generations remained poſſeſſed of his eſtate and fine ſeat at Salden, and became extinct in Sir Francis Forteſcue, who died at Bath November the eleventh 1729, without iſſue.

of the Houſe to his Majeſty, as alſo of his Majeſty's anſwer, viz.

'That he related to this Houſe, the humble and 'dutiful acceptation of what his Majeſty had done, 'together with the humble thanks of the Houſe, for 'his zealous and paternal delivery of his grace unto 'us by his own mouth, what wonder they conceived 'in his judgment, what joy in his grace, what com-'fort they had in his juſtice, what approbation they 'made of his prudence, and what obedience they 'yielded to his power and pleaſure. That his direc-'tion gave all men ſatisfaction, that they were deter-'mined to purſue the courſe he had preſcribed. That 'now they were become ſuitors, he would be pleaſed 'to receive a repreſentation of the humble thanks and 'ſervice of the Houſe.

'His Majeſty anſwered that upon this ſecond ac-'ceſs, he was forced to reiterate what he ſaid before. 'That this queſtion was unhappily caſt upon him, for 'he carried as great a reſpect to our privileges as ever 'any Prince did, he was no ground ſearcher, he was 'of the mind that our privileges were his ſtrength, 'that he thought the ground of our proceeding, was 'our not underſtanding that he had intermeddled be-'fore we had decided, that he thought alſo we had 'no wilful purpoſe to derogate any thing from him, 'for our anſwer was a grave, dutiful, and obedient 'anſwer.

The Warrant for a new Election of a Knight for Bucks, read and allowed in this form.

'Whereas the Right Honourable Sir John Forteſ-'cue, Knight, Chancellor of his Majeſty's Duchy of 'Lancaſter, and Sir Francis Goodwyn, Knight, have 'been ſeverally elected and returned Knights of the 'Shire for the county of Bucks, to ſerve in this pre-'ſent Parliament; upon deliberate conſultation, and 'for ſome ſpecial cauſes moving the Commons Houſe 'of Parliament. It is this day ordered and required 'by the ſaid Houſe, that a writ be forthwith awarded 'for a new Election of another Knight for the ſaid 'Shire. And this ſhall be your Warrant.

Directed to my very loving friend Sir George Coppin, Knight, Clerk of the Crown in his Majeſty's High-Court of Chancery.

E

FOSTER (Samuel), an eminent Engliſh Mathematician in the XVIIth century, and Aſtronomy Profeſſor in Greſham College. As to this gentleman's family we are able to ſay nothing; all that is preſerved of him, in that reſpect, being no more than this, that he was a native of Northamptonſhire (a), and, in all probability, his parents were in competent, tho' not in affluenr, circumſtances; ſince himſelf, and his elder brother Walter, were both ſent to Emanuel College in Cambridge (b). Samuel was admitted a Sizer there April the twenty-third 1616, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1619, and that of Maſter in 1623 (c); he applied himſelf early to the ſtudy of the Mathematicks, and attained to a great proficiency in that kind of knowledge, of which he gave the firſt ſpecimen in the year 1624, as the reader will ſee at the bottom of the page [A]. He never had a Fellowſhip, and is therefore placed, by Mr Fuller (d), among the learned writers of Emanuel College, who were not Fellows. Upon the death of Mr Henry Gellibrand, Aſtronomy Profeſſor in Greſham College, February the ninth 1636 (e), our author, Mr Foſter, made intereſt to ſucceed him, and was accordingly choſen (f) on the ſecond of March following, but for what reaſon does not appear; he quitted it again on the twenty-fifth of November in the ſame year, and was ſucceeded therein by Mr Mungo Murray (g), a Scots gentleman. He continued, however, to purſue his mathematical ſtudies with great diligence; and, in 1638, he gave another proof of this, in a work of his (h) that was then extreamly well received, and is to this day very much eſteemed [B]. In the mean time Mr Murray having been preſented to the rectory of Welles in Norfolk, by the Right Honourable Thomas Earl of Arundel, and marrying in 1641, his Profeſſorſhip was thereby vacated (i); and, as Mr Foſter had formerly made way for him, ſo, by this alteration in his condition, he made way for Mr Foſter, who was accordingly choſen May the twenty-ſixth the ſame year (k); the civil war breaking out very ſoon after his becoming a ſecond time Aſtronomy Profeſſor at Greſham College, he became one of that worthy and learned ſociety of gentlemen who had ſtated meetings for cultivating the new Philoſophy, to whoſe parts and induſtry this nation, and indeed the whole republick of letters, ſtand ſo much indebted (l). In 1646, Dr Wallis, another Member of that Society, received from Mr Foſter a Mathematical Theorem, which he afterwards publiſhed (m). Neither was it only in this branch of ſcience that he excelled, but he was likewiſe well verſed in the antient languages, as appears from his reviſing and correcting the Lemmata of Archimedes, which had been tranſlated from an Arabick manuſcript into Latin, but not publiſhed by the learned Mr John Greaves (n). Our author made alſo ſeveral curious obſervations of Eclipſes, both of the ſun and moon, as well at Greſham College as in his native county of Northamptonſhire, at Coventry, and in other places (o); and was particularly famous for inventing, as well as improving, of Aſtronomical and other Mathematical inſtruments. We have mentioned all the treatiſes of his publiſhed in his life-time; but, beſides theſe, he wrote many more, which his long and great infirmities, hindered him from fitting for the preſs in the manner he intended (p). Theſe, however, have not been loſt to the world, ſince the greateſt part of them at leaſt, have been printed by the care of ſeveral of his learned friends, particularly Dr John Twyſden, and Edmund Wingate, Eſq; as the reader will be informed at the bottom of the page [C]. [A] At the bottom of the page.] It is neceſſary to inform the reader, that this treatiſe, divided into two parts, was originally publiſhed at the end of the ingenious Mr Edmund Gunter's deſcription of the Croſs Staffe in three books. The titles ran thus.

I. The deſcription and uſe of a ſmall portable Quadrant for the more eaſy finding of the hour of Azimuth. 4to.

The Deſcription and uſes of another Quadrant fitted for daily practice for finding the hour and Azimuth, and other things of the ſun's courſe in reference to the Horizon, with new lines ſerving to the forementioned and other purpoſe more accurately. Invented by Mr Samuel Foſter ſometime Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Greſham-College. Lond. 1624. 4to. 1662. 4to. 1673. 4to. 1652. 8vo.

The laſt mentioned edition of this book was publiſhed within a ſmall time after the author's deceaſe, by one Anthony Thomſon mathematical inſtrument maker (1), who in his preface tells us, they were intended as appendices to Mr Gunter's treatiſes, and the reader is farther to know, that the quarto editions were actually printed as ſuch, only ſome few copies that were printed ſeparately of the firſt edition for the uſe of the author's friends. In this as in all our author's other works, there is a preciſeneſs and a perſpicuity which could not fail of recommending them extremely, more eſpecially in thoſe days when theſe ſciences were not ſo well or ſo generally underſtood as at preſent. But how much ſoever the modern mathematicians may ſurpaſs thoſe of the laſt age, yet there is certainly great reſpect due to the memories of thoſe worthy men, by whoſe diligence and induſtrious application the firſt ſteps were made towards thoſe improvements, which have ſince followed, and which like ſcaffolds in building were abſolutely neceſſary to the raiſing thoſe ſtately piles that now attract every eye.

(1) As appears by the Preface to Foſter's Miſcellanies.

[B] And is to this day very much eſteemed.] There might poſſibly be ſome particular reaſon for our author's reſigning his Profeſſorſhip, tho' we have no account of it; to which conjecture, I am led by the obſervation of the moſt judicious and accurate Hiſtorian of Greſham-College, that upon the reſignation of our author, Mr Mungo Murray, was recommended by King Charles the Firſt. The title of the latter work of our author, publiſhed after he reſigned his employment, and before he was rechoſe is,

II. The Art of Dialling. Lond. 1638, 1675. 4to.

The edition in 1675, has ſeveral additions and variations taken from the author's own manuſcript, as alſo a ſupplement by the editor William Leybourne, who was firſt a Printer, then an editor, and laſtly an author of books, and who, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion more than once to remark, was particularly inſtrumental in the preſerving and publiſhing ſeveral of Mr Foſter's writings.

[C] At the bottom of the page.] We are now come to ſpeak of ſuch of this gentleman's treatiſes as were publiſhed after his deceaſe, and which indeed make far the greater part of his works, the titles of them follow.

III. Poſthuma Foſteri: containing the deſcription of a ruler, upon which are inſcribed divers ſcales, &c. Lond. 1652. 4to.

This was publiſhed ſoon after the author's death by Mr Wingate.

IV. Four Treatiſes of Dialling. Elliptical or azimuthal horologiography. Circular horologiography. Rectilineal or diametrical horologiography. Elliptical horologiography by ſpherical and not projective work. Lond. 1654. 4to.

V. MISCELLANIES or MATHEMATICAL LUCUBRATIONS of Mr Samuel Foſter, ſometime publick Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Greſham-College in London, publiſhed, and many of them tranſlated into Engliſh, by the care and induſtry of John Twyſden. C. L. M. D. whereunto he hath annexed ſome things of his own.

As the greateſt part of this book is printed both in Latin and Engliſh, ſo there are prefixed to it two dedications, the firſt in Latin addreſſed to Sir Henry Yelverton, Baronet, who was nephew to the editor Dr Twyſden by his mother, in which he tells him that he had collected theſe pieces of Mr Samuel Foſter out of his looſe papers, and had added to them ſome few pieces of his own, that Sir Henry might have ever at his hand what might put him in mind of the moſt learned author, and prevent himſelf alſo from ſlipping out of his memory when removed from this world. The other dedication is in Engliſh. To the Right Honourable Lady Suſanna Longueville, Baroneſs Grey, Ruthin, Haſtings, Waſhford and Valence. The epiſtle to the reader is alſo both in Engliſh and in Latin, beginning thus. 'Courteous reader, we have at laſt 'made publick theſe poſthumous works of that learned, 'induſtrious, and moſt ſkilful Mathematician, Mr Samuel Foſter. They would have come out more poliſhed and with greater luſtre, had himſelf lived to 'have added his laſt hand unto them. But ſince it 'hath pleaſed God to deny this unto us, we have rather made choice to bring them to their birth with 'our hands, ſuch as they are, than ſuffer thoſe things 'to periſh which we judged worthy of the preſs, or 'that the learned world ſhould be longer deprived of 'the genuine offspring of ſo worthy a perſon. The 'treatiſes themſelves are of different kinds, ſome of 'them written by the author in Latin, ſome in Engliſh, others promiſcuouſly in both languages. The 'Aſtroſcope, Planetary inſtruments, and ſome others we 'have tranſlated into Latin, and cauſed them to be 'printed in a double column, to the end that thoſe of 'our own nation who are not much ſkilled in the 'Latin tongue, may read them in their mother language. But ſtrangers not remain deprived of the 'knowledge of new and profitable inventions. Some 'others of them are put out without any verſion, becauſe in truth being employed in other things, I 'could not get leiſure enough to do them; peradventure, if they ſhall bear a ſecond impreſſion, and no 'body elſe prevent me, I may labour in that alſo.' In this volume there are no leſs than twelve ſmall treatiſes of Mr Samuel Foſter's, the titles of which are very exactly ſet down, as indeed every thing is, by the judicious and induſtrious Mr Ward, in that laſting monument which he has raiſed to the honour of the Profeſſors of Greſham-College. We ſhall however ſet down theſe titles ſomewhat more at large, and with a ſhort account of each.

1. Stellæ fixæ, quas Tycho ad mille, in catalogum congeſſit, & Keplerus tabb. Rudolphinarum operi adnexuit ad annum incarnationis 1671. adſervatis eiſdem Latitudinibus, quoad Longitudines, ex additione nimirum gradus unius integri correctæ; & à polo Ecliptice ad polum mundi, quorum diſtantia eſt 23 grad. 31 min. reductæ: hoc eſt in aſcenſiones rectas & declinationes, eidem anno debitas conjectæ. A Samuele Foſtero, olim Aſtronomiæ Profeſſore in Collegio Greſhami, Londini. That is, A catalogue of the fixed ſtars which may ſerve for the year 1671. In Latin, but with a table of the ſun's right aſcenſion for every degree of the ecliptic, at the end in Engliſh; being a neceſſary introduction to the next treatiſe.

2. ASTROSCOPIUM, pro facillimâ ſtellarum dignotione, that is, Aſtroſcopium, an inſtrument for the ready finding of the ſtars in the Heavens. Written by Mr Foſter in Engliſh, with the Latin prefixed by Dr Twyſden. At the time the author invented this inſtrument it was equally curious and uſeful, being calculated for the ſervice of young Aſtronomers, with a view to encourage their progreſs in the ſcience.

3. De inſtrumentis Planetariis. Cui uſui inſerviunt, & quomodo ſunt tractanda. That is, Of the Planetary inſtruments; to what end they ſerve, and how they are to be uſed. In two columns, the Latin by Dr Twyſden, and the Engliſh by Mr Foſter.

4. Eclipſium tam Solarium quam Lunarium obſervationes. That is, Some obſervations of Eclipſes of the Sun and Moon. In ſeveral of theſe obſervations our author was aſſiſted by Dr Twyſden, who has alſo added to them his own obſervations, as to the motion of a comet at Eaſton in Northamptonſhire from December the 14th, 1652. to the 24th of the ſame month, as alſo an account of a ſpot ſeen in the ſun at the ſame place, July the 2d, 1651.

5. Ratio facillima computandi altitudinem Solis horarium ad quamlibet latitudinem, ſtruendis Tabulis altitudinem commodiſſima: quam à D. Foſtero olim acceptam, communicavit mihi D. Palmerus, Ectonenſis. That is, An eaſy way to calculate tables of the ſun's horarie altititude for any latitude, which being communicated to Dr Twyſden, by Mr John Palmer of Ecton, who received it long ſince from Mr Foſter, I thought worthy to be here inſerted. In two columns Latin and Engliſh.

6. Problemata Geometrica varia. That is, Geometrical Propoſitions of divers kinds. In Latin and Engliſh.

7. De Conſtructione Canones, Sin. Tang. & Secantium. That is, Of the Conſtruction of the Canon of Sines, Tangents, and Secants. In Latin only.

8. Quadrantis Horometrici olim editi demonſtratio. That is, A demonſtration of an horometrical Quadrant formerly publiſhed, in Latin only.

9. Epitome Ariſtarchi Samii de magnitudine Solis & Lunæ. That is, An Epitome of Ariſtarchus Samius, concerning the magnitude of the Sun and Moon, in Latin only. This great Philoſopher Ariſtarchus Samius flouriſhed long after Pythagoras, and a little before Archimedes; our author ſuppoſes, that he flouriſhed two hundred and eighty years before Chriſt. He held that which is now ſtiled the new ſyſtem, that the earth moved and the ſun remained at reſt; there is nothing extant of his, except his treatiſe of the magnitudes and diſtances of the ſun and moon, which, together with the learned commentary of Pappus of Alexandria, was publiſhed in Latin by the famous Ferdinand Commandine at Piſa in 1572.

10. Lemmata Archimedis, apud Græcos & Latinos jàm pridem deſiderata, e vetuſto codice M.S. Arabico; à Johanne Gravio tradu&a; et nunc primùm cum Arabum ſcholiis publicata. Reviſa & pluribus mendis repurgata a Samuele Foſter. That is, The Lemma's of Archimedes not extant either in Greek or Latin, tranſlated from an old Arabick manuſcript by John Greaves, and now firſt publiſhed with the Scholia of a learned Arabian. Reviſed, and in many places corrected, by Samuel Foſter. In Latin only.

11. The Geometrical Square with the uſe thereof in plain and ſpherical Trigonometrie, chiefly intended for the more eaſy finding of the hour and Azimuth. In Engliſh only.

12. The conſtruction and uſe of the horizontal planiſphere in projective Dialling refractive Dials. In Engliſh only.

To theſe are added two pieces of Dr Twyſden's, one of dialling, and the other of fortification, to which is annexed, an Appendix publiſhed by Mr William Leybourne conſiſting of three pieces, two written by Mr Halton, and the third entituled, Equations ariſing from a quantity divided into two unequal parts: and the ſecond book of Euclid's elements demonſtrated by ſpecies by John Leeke.

VI. The Sector altered, and other ſcales added, with the deſcription and uſe thereof, invented and written by Mr Samuel Foſter, ſometime publick Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Greſham-College in London, and now publiſhed by W. L. London 1661, 1673. 4to.

This

clining ſtate of health, departed this life in the month of July 1652, in his own apartment at Greſham College, and was buried in the church of St Peter le Poor in Broad-ſtreet (q). There have been two other perſons of his name, who have publiſhed ſome mathematical pieces, and therefore it may not be amiſs to give ſome little account of them; indeed all the account we are able to give, is very far from being conſiderable, but it may nevertheleſs be of uſe to prevent miſtakes, and to avoid confuſion. The firſt of theſe was William Foſter, who, in his youth, was a diſciple of the famous Mr Oughtred's, and afterwards a teacher of the Mathematicks in London (r). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a book he publiſhed, and dedicated to the celebrated Sir Kenelm Digby, of which the reader may find ſomewhat more in the notes [D]. The other was one Mark Foſter, (q) Ward's Lives of the Profeſſors of Greſham College, p. 85.

(r) See the note [D].

This was an improvement of Mr Gunter's Sector, and therefore publiſh'd amongſt his works, the fourth edition of which was printed in the former of theſe two years, and the fifth in the latter. In this laſt edition, Mr Leybourne corrected ſome overſights and miſtakes which were in the fourth edition from Mr Foſter's own manuſcript. Beſides theſe printed pieces, there was in the hands of the late William Jones, Eſq; a manuſcript treatiſe in folio, compoſed by Mr Foſter with this title,

VII. The uſes of a general Quadrant invented by Mr Samuel Foſter, late Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Greſham-College.

We have before mentioned our author's plain and perſpicuous manner of treating abſtruſe ſubjects, a ſhort inſtance will beſt ſupport what we have advanced, and this ſhall be taken from his deſcription of thoſe planetary inſtruments he called Theoricks (2). His words are theſe.

(2) Miſcellanies, §. iii. p. 18, 24, 27.

'The finding out of the places of the five planets, 'in reſpect of Longitude and Latitude, is the thing 'principally intended in theſe Theoricks. Now this 'having been already declared, it ſhall not be amiſs 'to add ſomewhat of the principal paſſions belonging 'unto them, of which there are theſe three chief 'heads.

'Firſt, at ſometimes theſe five planets, in reſpect 'of that motion which they make according to the 'Longitude of the Ecliptic, do appear to go forward, 'agreeably to the order and ſucceſſion of the ſigns, 'that is, they appear to be direct in motion. Some-'times again they ſeem to go backward in motion, or 'to be retrograde, and in their changes from the one 'of theſe motions to the other, they muſt neceſſarily 'appear to be ſtanding ſtill or to be ſtationary.

'Secondly, their places being compared in reſpect 'of diſtance from the ſun, or one from the other, the 'planets may have ſeveral aſpects; as conjunction, when 'they are (any two of them) in one place of Longi-'tude; oppoſition, when they are in oppoſite Longi-'tude; Trine, when they are $\frac{1}{3}$ part of a circle, or four 'ſigns, diſtant from each other; Quartile, when they 'are three ſigns or a Quadrant of a circle diſtant; Sex-'tile, when they are $\frac{1}{6}$ part of a circle or two ſigns 'diſtant. Venus and Mercury cannot make any of 'theſe aſpects with the Sun. And one of them with 'the other can make none, but the ſextile which often 'they do.

'Thirdly, their places being compared with the 'ſun's place, they are either under the ſun's beames, 'and are then ſaid to be combuſtible, or elſe they 'riſe after the ſun riſing when the ſun is up, and are 'called oriental; or they ſet after the ſun while the 'ſun is down, and are called occidental; or are op-'poſite to the ſun, and are called acronychal. Venus 'and Mercury can never be acronychal, becauſe they 'never go far enough from the ſun: Venus only forty 'eight degrees, Mercurius only twenty nine degrees.

'Theſe things will not be well diſcovered by theſe 'Theoricks, it being a difficult buſineſs to ſet the 'juſt times of theſe changes in their courſes. If you 'deſire to know in which of theſe motions any planet 'is, the beſt way will be, when you have found their 'places for any one day, to enquire their Longitudes 'about five or ten days after in Saturn, Jupiter, and 'Mars, or about two or four days after, for Venus 'and Mercurius, becauſe the motions of theſe are 'much ſwifter than of the other. And ſo having 'found their places of longitude at two ſeveral times, 'you ſhall perceive what courſe they hold in reſpect 'of progreſs, regreſs, or ſtanding ſtill. For it muſt 'always be noted, that if a planet paſs from direct 'motion to ſtation, then that ſtanding is the firſt ſta-'tion. But if it paſs from retrograde motion, then 'is the ſtation following to be taken for the ſecond 'ſtation.'——How modeſt he was in his opinion of his own abilities, and how ſenſible that, what he publiſhed in this treatiſe was valuable only to the younger ſtudents in Aſtronomy, we may gather from hence. ——The poetical kinds of riſing and ſetting, are called coſmical, acronychal, and heliachal. Theſe and ſome other paſſions of the planets, ſuch as are the emerſions and occultations are not to be expected from theſe Theoricks. They are difficult to be found, eſpecially for the planets which are always in motion, not reſiding any long time in one Longitude and Latitude. Beſides the ſame things have relation to the elevations of the pole above ſeveral horizons, which kind of concluſions are not proper for Theoricks, but muſt be referred to Aſtrolabes and other Spherical Inſtruments. The moſt exact practice this way is to be had in the aſtronomical tables, and trigonometrical ſpheric works to be conjoined therewith for ſuch purpoſes. They therefore that would have more; muſt there ſeek help and ways to ſatisfy themſelves. This that is here done may ſerve for an introduction to more exact workings: at leaſt it may ſupply the wants of ſuch whoſe ſkill and deſires reach not ſo far for whoſe ſakes it was principally intended——and that he was appriſed of the ſuperior merit of other Aſtronomers is plain from hence.——The way that I go is (in general) agreeable to Copernicus his frame of the world, and in particular to that which Kepler uſeth in his Rudolphin Tables. Only this difference there is: Kepler makes the orbits of the planets to be ellipſes, which is the better way; and I here do make them perfect circles, which is the eaſier way. And tho' it be defective, yet it makes no great difference in theſe ſmall inſtruments.

[D] In the notes.] The title of the book which he tranſlated and publiſhed, runs at large thus.

The Circles of Proportion and the Horizontal Inſtrument. The former ſhewing the manner how to work Proportions both ſimple and compound, and the ready and eaſy reſolving of Queſtions, both in Arithmetic, Geometry, and Aſtronomy, *and is newly increaſed with an additament for navigation. C. tranſlated into Engliſh, and ſet out for the publick benefit, by William Foſter. Lond. 1633. 4to. The dedication to Sir Kenelm Digby, is dated May 1. 1632. and in it, he writes thus.

'Being in the time of the long vacation, 1630, in 'the country of the Reverend, and my moſt worthy 'friend and teacher, Mr William Oughtred, to whoſe 'inſtruction I owe, both my initiation and whole pro-'greſs in theſe ſciences. I, upon occaſion of ſpeech, told 'him of a ruler of Numbers, Sines, and Tangents, 'which one had beſpoken to be made, ſuch as is 'uſually called Mr Gunter's rule, ſix feet long, to be 'uſed with a pair of beam compaſſes. He anſwered, 'that was a poor invention, and the performance very 'troubleſome. But, ſaid he, ſeeing you are taken 'with ſuch mechanical ways of inſtruments, I will 'ſhew you what devices I have had by me theſe many 'years. And firſt he brought to me two rulers of that 'ſort to be uſed, by applying one to the other with-

'out

Foſter, who publiſhed a treatiſe of Trigonometry (s), but lived later in point of time than either of the other two. As for our author's eldeſt brother, Mr Walter Foſter (t), who was himſelf likewiſe no mean proficient in the Mathematicks, he became Fellow of his College, and Rector of Allerton in Somerſetſhire, as the reader will ſee, with ſome other circumſtances relating to him, at the bottom of the page [E]. Dr John Twyſden, abovementioned, was a Phyſician, brother to Sir Roger Twyſden, Baronet, a very learned man (u), a lover of the Mathematicks, and one who had been an intimate friend, and the companion of his ſtudies, to our author (w), Mr Samuel Foſter; and, in the careful publication of his poſtumous works, may juſtly be ſtiled the executor of his fame.

'out any compaſſes. And after that, he ſhewed me 'thoſe lines caſt into a circle or ring, with another 'moveable circle upon it. I ſeeing the great expe- 'diteneſſe of both theſe ways, but eſpecially of the 'latter, wherein it far excelleth any other inſtrument 'which hath been known, told him I wondered he 'could ſo many years conceal ſuch uſeful inventions, 'not only from the world, but from myſelf, to whom 'in other parts and myſteries of art he had been ſo 'liberal. He anſwered, that the true way of art is 'not by inſtruments, but by demonſtrations, and that 'it is a prepoſterous courſe of vulgar teachers to begin 'with inſtruments, and not with the ſciences, and ſo 'inſtead of artiſts to make their ſcholars only doers of 'tricks, and as it were juglers, to the deſpite of art, 'loſs of precious time, and betraying of willing and 'induſtrious wits upon ignorance and idleneſs. That 'the uſe of inſtruments is indeed excellent, if a man 'be an artiſt, but contemptible being ſet and oppoſed 'to art. And laſtly, that he meant to commend to 'me the ſkill of inſtruments, but firſt he would have 'me well inſtructed in the ſciences. He alſo ſhewed 'me many notes and rules for the uſe of thoſe circles, 'and of his Horizontal inſtrument which he had pro- 'jected about thirty years before, the moſt part writ- 'ten in Latin. All which I obtained of him leave to 'tranſlate into Engliſh, and make publick for the uſe 'and benefit of ſuch as were ſtudious and lovers of 'thoſe excellent ſciences. Which thing, while I with 'mature and diligent care, as my occaſions would give 'me leave, went about to do, another, to whom the 'author in a long conference diſcovered his intent, 'uſing more haſte than good ſpeed, went about to 'pre-occupate, of which untimely birth and prevent- 'ing, if not circumventing, forwardneſs, I ſay no more, 'but adviſe the ſtudious reader only ſo far to truſt as 'he ſhall be ſure doth agree to truth and art.'

[E] At the bottom of the page.] All the proof we have, that the Reverend Mr Walter Foſter, was elder brother to our author Samuel, is, that he took his degrees ſomewhat earlier, for he was admitted Bachelor of Arts, in 1617, Maſter in 1621, and Bachelor of Divinity, in 1628, at which time he was Fellow of his College, had an exceeding fair character there, and was well beloved, as fully appears from the following paſſage in a letter written by Dr Samuel Ward to the Lord Primate Uſher (3).

(3) Archbiſhop Uſher's Letters, p. 437.

'As for Dr Walſall's manuſcript of Rathrammus, 'I know where it is. I think it were not amiſs to 'print both thoſe treatiſes of Rathram's, with that 'De Corpore & Sanguine Domini, which is already 'extant. If I do not print them, your Lordſhip ſhall 'have a copy. As for the Latin copy of Ignatius's 'Epiſtles in Caius College Library, I was in good 'hope it had been the ſame with an old printed tran- 'ſlation which I have, but comparing them together, 'I find them differ much. I acquainted Mr Thomas 'Whalley, now Dr Whalley, with that you wrote in 'your letter. He ſeemed to me not unwilling to un- 'dertake, but now in this contagious time he is gone 'into the country. I ſpoke alſo with Mr Foſter of 'Emanuel College, who it ſeemeth hath taken ſome 'pains already in it, but then he was to go into the 'country. I am informed by ſome Fellows in that 'College, that being ſhortly to depart from the Col- 'lege by his time there allotted, finding in himſelf 'ſome impediment in his utterance, he could wiſh to 'be employed by your Lordſhip in ſuch like buſineſs. 'He is a good ſcholar, and an honeſt man. The 'worſt is, the book cannot be lent out of the College. 'I will ſee (by God's grace) at the return of our ſtu- 'dents what can be done, if God ſend life.' But notwithſtanding what is ſaid of the impediment in his ſpeech, he continued his ſtudies in Divinity, entered into Holy Orders, and poſſeſſed the living in Somerſetſhire, which is mentioned in the text. Dr Twyſden in his epiſtle to the reader, prefixed to Mr Foſter's Mathematical Lucubrations, ſpeaks of Mr Walter Foſter in the following terms. 'In the laſt place, 'ſays he, let me admoniſh thee (courteous reader) 'that I have here obtruded nothing upon thee, which 'was not firſt taken out of the author's adverſaries 'written with his own hand, which were communi- 'cated to me by that learned Divine Mr Walter Foſ- 'ter, Bachelor in Divinity, ſkilful alſo in theſe ſtudies, 'to whom of right it belonged, to have raiſed up this 'ſeed to his deceaſed brother, had not his infirm health 'and domeſtick affairs held him in the country a 'great many miles diſtant from this place.' E

FOWLER (EDWARD) Biſhop of Glouceſter in part of this and the laſt century, and a moſt rational and moderate Divine, was born, in the year 1632 (a), at Weſterleigh in Glouceſterſhire, of which place his father William Fowler, was miniſter. His education in Grammar-learning was at the College-ſchool in Glouceſter, under William Ruſſell who had married his ſiſter. In the beginning of the year 1650. he became Clerk of Corpus-Chriſti-College in Oxford, and on the 14th of December 1653. one of the Chaplains thereof (b). The 23d of the ſame month, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c). Afterwards retiring to Cambridge for a time, he took his Maſter of Arts degree, as a member of Trinity-college in that Univerſity; and ſoon after returning to Oxford, was incorporated in the ſame degree July 5. 1656 (d). About that time he became Chaplain to Amabella Counteſs-dowager of Kent [A], who preſented him to the Rectory of North-hill in Bedfordſhire (*). Having been educated in the Preſbyterian way [B] he ſcrupled embracing for a while the terms of Conformity, at the Reſtoration (e); but he conform'd afterwards, and became a great ornament to the Church. moral Writings rendred him ſo conſiderable, that Archbiſhop Sheldon, in order to introduce him into the metropolis of the kingdom, the city of London, collated him, Auguſt 25. 1673, to the Rectory of Allhallows-Breadſtreet (f). The 29th of February 1675 6, he was inſtall'd into the fourth Prebend in Glouceſter-Cathedral (g): And the 31ſt of March 1681, had inſtitution to the Vicarage of St Giles's Cripplegate, vacant by the death of Dr John Prichett Biſhop of Glouceſter, who had held it in commendam (h). The 10th of June following he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity (i). During the ſtruggle between the Proteſtant Religion and Popery in this Kingdom, our Author appear'd to great advantage in defence of the former (*); being one of thoſe illuſtrious Champions of the Reformation, which were an honour both to the Church and to the Age in which they lived (k). But this rendered him obnoxious, among the reſt, to the Court, and its adherents: and, in all probability, cauſed an ill-natur d proſecution againſt him, in 1685, by ſome of his pariſhioners; who alledged, That he was guilty of Whiggiſm; That he admitted to the Communion excommunicated perſons before they were abſolv'd &c. We are told, this matter was carried ſo far, that Decemb. 9. after a tryal at Doctors-Commons, our author was ſuſpended, under pretence of his having acted ſeveral things contrary to the Canons of the Church, &c. (l). However, this affront did not intimidate or diſcourage him from performing what he thought his duty. For he was the Second who, in 1688, ſigned a Reſolution, entered into by the principal of the London clergy, Not to read King James the Second's new Declaration for liberty of conſcience (m). A perſon of ſo much learning and merit as Dr Fowler, was not left neglected or unrewarded at the Revolution. For April 23. 1691, he was nominated Biſhop of Glouceſter, (upon the deprivation of Dr Robert Frampton for refuſi g to take the oaths,) confirmed July 2. and conſecrated the 5th of the ſame month (n). In this See he continued, without any tranſlation, till his deceaſe; which happened at Chelſea Auguſt 26. 1714. He lies buried in a vault on the north ſide of Hendon Church-yard in Middleſex; within the Chancel of which Church there is ſet up a handſome monument for him, with an inſcription [C] containing his Character (o). 'To 'the pious memory of the Right Reverend Edward 'Fowler, late Lord Biſhop of Glouceſter; to which 'ſtation he was advanced by King William, in the 'year 1691. for his known ſteadineſs to the true in-'tereſt of the Church of England, and of his country 'in times of danger. He approved himſelf worthy 'of that dignity, by a faithful and diligent diſcharge 'of his paſtoral office; till diſabled by age and bodily 'infirmities, he reſted from his labours in the 82d 'year of his age, admitted to partake of his reward. 'He departed this life, Aug 26. 1714. and was in-'terred in the grave of his firſt wife, in this Church; 'leaving behind him, in the excellent treatiſes publiſhed 'by himſelf, laſting monuments of learning, judgment, 'piety, and chriſtian temper of mind. He was twice 'married, firſt to Ann, daughter of Arthur Bernar-'diſton, of the Inner Temple, Eſq; one of the Maſ-'ters of Chancery; ſhe departed this life, Dec. 19. '1696. He had by her three ſons, Nathaniel, Ed-'ward, and Richard; and five daughters, Anne, Anne, 'Suſannah, Elizabeth, and Mary; of whom Edward 'and Richard, Suſannah, Elizabeth and Mary, ſur-'vived him. His ſecond wife, Elizabeth, who like-'wiſe ſurvived him, was Elizabeth, widow of the Re-'verend Dr Ezekiah Burton, and daughter of Ralph 'Trevor of London, Merchant.'

At the bottom of this Epitaph, it is obſerved, that Richard, the younger ſon, 'did by his laſt will direct 'his executors, to cauſe a vault to be made, which 'for want of room in the Church, was made in the 'Church-yard, at the weſt corner of that wall;' wherein were removed the Biſhop's body, that of his firſt wife, and thoſe of the ſaid Richard, and his wife and daughter, in 1717 (3).

[D] The principles and practices of certain moderate Divines, &c.] The firſt edition of this book was printed at London, 1670. 8vo. and a ſecond edition came out in 1671.—Some of the rational principles of thoſe moderate Divines, were as follow. They admitted the uſe of reaſon in matters of religion, and preached the reaſonableneſs of the chriſtian precepts; for which they were, in contempt, called the rational preachers (4). They maintained, that moral good and evil are ſo eſſentially in their own nature; and not becauſe God commands the one, and forbids the other (5). They ſo handled the doctrine of imputative righteouſneſs, as to ſhew the neceſſity of inherent righteouſneſs, and did not build it upon a ſtrong faith only (6). They aſſerted, that faith juſtifieth only as it implyeth obedience (7). And they condemned the barbarous doctrine of unconditional and abſolute Predeſtination (8).

FOX (EDWARD) an eminent Stateſman in the XVIth Century, Almoner to Henry VIII. and biſhop of Hereford, was born at Durſley in Glouceſterſhire, and educated at Eton School (a). Thence he was admitted Scholar of King's College in Cambridge, March 27, 1512, and elected Provoſt of the ſame Decemb. 27, 1528 (b), which place he kept to the time of his death (c). He was in his youth a perſon of great vivacity, but having withal prudence to govern that ſpirit, it only ſerved to raiſe him, and render him eminent. His relation to Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter made him a Scholar, and his own inclination a politician (d). Being recommended as ſuch to Cardinal Wolſey, he took him into his ſervice; and, if our author is entirely to be credited (e), it was he that put the Cardinal upon aſpiring to the Papacy. However, being noted for a man of great ſenſe and addreſs, he was, in the beginning of the year 1528 (f), ſent embaſſador to Rome, jointly with Stephen Gardiner afterwards biſhop of Wincheſter, in order to obtain new Bulls from Pope Clement VII, for King Henry the Eighth's divorce from his queen Catharine of Arragon (g). He was then Almoner to that King, and reputed one of the beſt Divines in England (h). Having ſoon obtained the deſir'd Commiſſion or Bull from the Pope to the Cardinals Wolſey and Campegio, to try the affair in England; 'tis probable that they return'd from their Embaſſy, along with Campegio, who came over the October following (i). After that, Mr Fox whoſe abilities were ſufficiently known, had the honour of being employed in Embaſſies both in France and Germany (k). [A] It was [A] Had the honour of being employed in embaſſies both in France and Germany.] During which, as he was diſcourſing one day of terms of peace, he ſaid, 'Honourable ones laſt long, but the diſhonourable no 'longer than till kings have power to break them: 'the ſureſt way therefore, ſaid he, to Peace, is a 'conſtant was in converſation with him, in 1529, that Thomas Cranmer afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury diſcover'd a plainer and ſhorter way for the King's divorce, than a tedious application to Rome; namely, by taking the Opinions of the moſt learned perſons and Univerſities of Chriſtendom: and it was He that made it known to the King as Cranmer's advice, when Stephen Gardiner, who was preſent at that converſation, would have put it off as his own. To him therefore Cranmer owed his introduction to Court, and by natural conſequence his advancement to the See of Canterbury (l). In 1530, he was employed with Stephen Gardiner at Cambridge, to obtain that Univerſity's determination about the King's marriage and divorce above mention'd (m) [B]. On the 27th of September 1531, he was inſtall'd Archdeacon of Leiceſter, upon the reſignation of Dr Stephen Gardiner (n); and in November 1533, was made Archdeacon of Dorſet (o). It was he that appriz'd the Clergy of their being fallen into a Præmunire, and adviſ'd them to make their Submiſſion to the King (p); which they did, by acknowledging him Supreme Head of the Church of England, and making him a preſent of a hundred thouſand pounds (q). In the year 1535, he was promoted to the Biſhopric of Hereford, having obtain'd the Royal aſſent to his election, September 2. and receiving conſecration Septemb. 25, and the Temporalities Octob. 4 following (r). He was the principal pillar of the Reformation, as to the management of the politick and prudential part of it; being of more activity, and no leſs ability than Cranmer himſelf (s). But he took care not to bring himſelf in danger of ſuffering perſecution on that account (t) [C]. A few months after his conſecration, namely on the 6th of December 1535, he was ſent Embaſſador to the Proteſtant Princes in Germany, then aſſembled at Smalcald; whom he exhorted to unite, in point of Doctrine, with the Church of England (u) [D]. He ſpent the winter at Wirtemberg, and held ſeveral Conferences with ſome of the German Divines, endeavouring to conclude a Treaty with them upon many articles of Religion, but nothing was effected (w) [E]. He return'd to England in the year 1536; and, after having enjoy'd his Epiſcopal dignity but two years and ſeven months, dy'd at London May 8. 1538 (x). According to his deſire,

[B] In 1530 he was employed with Stephen Gardiner at Cambridge, to obtain that Univerſity's determination about the King's marriage and divorce.] When they came to Cambridge, they ſpake to Dr William Buckmaſter the Vice-chancellor, whom they found very ready to ſerve the King; as was alſo Bonner, and ſeveral others, but there was a contrary party that met together and reſolved to oppoſe them. So that, at length, it was (not without a conſiderable oppoſition,) determined, 'That the King's Marriage was 'againſt the Law of God.' And 'it is thought 'ſtrange, as Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that the King who 'was otherwiſe ſo abſolute in England, ſhould meet 'with more difficulty in this matter at home, than he 'did abroad.' This the Biſhop reſolves, into the Univerſity's averſion in general to Luther's Doctrine, which was profeſſed by the chief promoters of the Divorce (2).

[C] But he took care not to bring himſelf in danger of ſuffering perſecution on that account.] This Biſhop Godwin hints at, when he ſays, that he was Reformationis Eccleſiaſticæ illius tempore coeptæ, clanculum fautor: a ſecret Favourer of the Reformation. That is, to the length of the eſtabliſhment, in the reign of King Henry VIII, as Mr Collier expreſſes it (3).

[D] Whom he exhorted to unite, in point of Doctrine, with the Church of England.] After having obſerved, how nearly related the Kings of England and the Electors of Saxony were; he aſſures them of the King's great favour and affection to them, on account of their endeavours to propagate the true knowledge of God. And though they had been much reviled for caſting off the Pope, yet King Henry retain'd a very good opinion of them, and look'd upon them as honeſt perſons, who would not do any thing unſeemly, nor without ſufficient reaſon, and whoſe only aim was to promote the glory of God by the true preaching of the Goſpel. That the King his maſter's deſign was the ſame, as was manifeſt by the alterations he had made in England, having aboliſhed many errors, and renounced, with his Parliament's conſent, the Pope and all his impoſtures. And ſince they concurred in the ſame laudable work, the King had conceived a ſingular regard for them, and deſired them to go on ſo, that they might all profeſs the ſame doctrine, this being the moſt ſolid ground for a perpetual and laſting peace. That the King knew by experience, what confuſions aroſe from diverſity of opinions; and inſtanced in the Anabaptiſts amongſt them. That the Pope pretended now to call a Council; but unleſs there was a perfect agreement between the King his maſter and them, they would find themſelves under a great inconvenience, when they ſhould repair to that Council. They ought therefore to think of ſuch a peace, as ſhould be grounded on the ſure foundation of Scripture. The Pope would endeavour to the utmoſt to obſtruct ſuch an union, and therefore it could not be accompliſhed ſo long as his tyranny laſted. That the caſting off his uſurped authority in England, and reſtoring that kingdom to its original liberty, had put that idol and antichriſt in ſuch a rage; that what he could not do by force, (i. e. to reduce it again to ſlavery) he endeavoured to do, by ſtirring up underhand all the Princes in Europe againſt the King. But he was ſo well prepared, that he deſpiſed all his attempts: and he had informed them of it, not that he was afraid of the Pope, but that they might ſee, notwithſtanding his pretended peaceable diſpoſition in calling a Council, that he was far from thinking of peace. That a fair debate of the controverted points of religion, the King was ſenſible, would be very ſerviceable to the Church. But no Council ought to be ſuffered, which would only tend to eſtabliſh the papal tyranny. Therefore he exhorted them not to approve of ſuch a Council, till peace was reſtored to the Chriſtian World. In concluſion, he deſired a private conference upon thoſe points with ſome perſons appointed by them (4).

[E] Endeavouring to conclude a Treaty with them, &c.] The reader may ſee a particular account of this negotiation, in Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation (5); by which it appears, that the Elector of Saxony thought King Henry had only a political deſign in all this negotiation; intending to bring the German Proteſtant Princes into a dependance on himſelf, without any ſincere intentions with regard to religion. Biſhop Fox preſſed them alſo to approve of all that the King had done in the matter of his divorce, and of his ſecond marriage; but they could never be prevailed upon (6).

FOXE, or FOX, (RICHARD) a famous ſtateſman and biſhop in part of the XVth and XVIth centuries, and Founder of Corpus-Chriſti-College in Oxford, was born at Ropeſley near Grantham in Lincolnſhire [A] about the latter end of the reign of King Henry VI; being the Son of Thomas Fox and Helene his wife, perſons in mean circumſtances (a). His education in Grammar-learning was at Boſton, or according to ſome at Wincheſter. When fit for the Univerſity, he was ſent to Magdalen-college in Oxford, where he ſoon ſurpaſſed all his equals in knowledge and reputation. But the plague obliged him to retire from thence, and to go and finiſh his ſtudies at Penbroke-hall in Cambridge (b). He is ſaid to have taken the Degree of Doctor in law at Oxford (c); but it could not be till ſome years after. When he had ſtayed a competent time at Cambridge, he went, for his farther improvement, to Paris, where he ſtudied Divinity and the Canon-law. In this place, he became acquainted with Dr John Morton Biſhop of Ely, whom the cruelty of that wicked uſurper Richard III. had forced to quit his native country, and to fly thither (d). By him probably, who knew his great learning and abilities, he was introduced to Henry Earl of Richmond; that was then meditating a deſcent upon England, in order to dethrone the uſurper: and, with the reſt of the Engliſhmen reſiding at Paris, He vowed and ſware to take his part (e). The Earl immediately received Dr Fox into ſecret familiarity (f): And having applied to Charles VIII king of France for aſſiſtance in his deſigned expedition, but being called away by multiplicity of buſineſs before he could obtain his deſire, he left the further proſecution of this matter to the Doctor, whom he thought the fitteſt man to manage ſo important an affair. Nor was he deceived in him; for he acted with that induſtry and prudence, that he ſoon procured men and money from the Court of France (g). Henry having gained the Crown of England, by his glorious victory at Boſworth on the 22d of Auguſt 1485, took care to reward thoſe who had faithfully ſerv'd him. Among the reſt, he made his truſty friend Dr Fox one of his Privy-counſellors, that he might continue to have the benefit of his good counſel and advice [B]. About the ſame time, the Doctor was collated to the Prebend of Biſhopſton in the Church of Sarum; and, in February 1485-6, to the Prebend of South-Grantham in the ſame Church (h). The February following he was nominated Biſhop of Exeter (i), and had reſtitution of the Temporalities April 2. 1487 (k). On the 24th of February 1486-7, he was appointed Keeper of the Privy-ſeal; for the better diſcharge of which office his Majeſty granted him, the 5th of July following, a penſion of twenty ſhillings a day (l). He was alſo made Principal Secretary of State, and Maſter of St Croſſe near Wincheſter (m). And the King employed him continually either in matters of counſel at home, or in Embaſſies of great importance abroad (n). In September 1487, he was ſent Embaſſador, with Sir Richard Edgecombe Comptroller of the Houſhold, to James III. king of Scotland [C], and concluded concluded a Treaty with him, on the 28th of November; wherein the Truce between England and Scotland was prolonged to the 1ſt of September 1489 (o). He alſo was employed in an embaſſy to the King of France, about the beginning of the year 1491, with Thomas Earl of Ormond, and the Prior of Chriſt's-Church in Canterbury; and returned to England in November following (p). February 8. 1491-2, he was tranſlated from Exeter to the Biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, vacant by the death of Robert Stillington, and had reſtitution of the Temporalities May 4. 1492 (q) From this See he was removed to that of Durham, of which the Temporalities were reſtored to him Dec. 8. 1494 (r). He made great improvements at his palace in this city; walled round his park near the ſame; and repaired Hertlepole-caſtle (s). In the year 1494, he was at the head of an embaſſy to James IV. King of Scotland; but could not, with all his addreſs, end ſome differences ſubſiſting between the two nations about the fiſhery of the river Eſk (t). In 1497, the caſtle of Norham belonging to his See, being beſieged by the king of Scotland [D], was relieved by the Engliſh under the command of Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey (u). And the Biſhop being ſhortly after ſent Embaſſador to Scotland, ſigned a ſeven years truce between that kingdom and England on the 30th of Sept. 1497 (w): About which time, overtures were made for a marriage between James IV. king of Scotland, and Margaret King Henry's eldeſt daughter; which the latter had deſigned ever ſince the year 1495 (x). The propoſal being well received, Biſhop Fox was ſent into Scotland to negotiate that affair, but it was not fully concluded till January 24. 1501-2 (y). In the mean time, the Univerſity of Cambridge, out of a due ſenſe of the Biſhop's great authority and intereſt, choſe him their Chancellor in 1500, which honourable office he bore till 1502 (z). Upon the death of Dr Thomas Langton Biſhop of Wincheſter, he was removed to that See, whereof the Temporalities were reſtored to him October 17. 1500 (a). Here he ſpent the reſt of his life in great affluence and proſperity. For ſuch was his favour with the King, that no one could ever do ſo much with him; and no man there was upon whoſe counſel he ſo much relied (b) [E] Being not only a grave counſellor for war and peace, but alſo a good ſurveyor of works, and a good maſter of ceremonies, and any thing that was fit for the active part belonging to the ſervice of the Court or State of a great King; he had, upon that account, the ordering of the nuptial-ceremony of Prince Arthur with the Lady Catherine, which was performed on the 14th of November 1501, with great and true magnificence (c). One of our Biſhop's Chaplains, was the famous Thomas Wolſey, whom he afterwards introduced to Court; that he might be a check to the overgrown intereſt of the Earl of Surrey (d). About the beginning of Auguſt 1507, the Biſhop was choſen Maſter of Penbroke-hall in Cambridge, which place he kept till May 1519 (e). In 1507, and part of 1508, he was employed at Calais, with other Commiſſioners, to negotiate a treaty of marriage between Mary the King's third daughter and Charles Archduke of Auſtria, afterwards the moſt renowned Emperor Charles V (f). Thus was Biſhop Fox generally employed in matters of the greateſt importance; and thus did he continue to the laſt in the higheſt degree of favour with King Henry VII, who appointed him in his Will one of his Executors, and particularly recommended him to his Son and ſucceſſor King Henry VIII (g). But the Biſhop's Credit greatly declined at Court, and his excellent abilities and talent for buſineſs were ſlighted by the young luxurious Prince, (who minded nothing but pleaſures and diverſions,) chiefly through the artifices of Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey and Lord Treaſurer. This nobleman having been the Biſhop's rival in the late King's favour, continued to be ſo ſtill in his ſon's, endeavouring to win the affection of his new maſter by a blind compliance to his will. In order therefore to undermine and ſupplant ſo dangerous an adverſary, the Biſhop introduced Thomas Wolſey to Court, as hath been already obſerved, who ſoon engroſſed the King's favour (b). When the affair of King Henry's marriage with the Princeſs Katherine, widow of his brother Prince Arthur, was debated in council, Biſhop Fox adviſed the conſummation of that marriage, contrary to the opinion of Archbiſhop Warham (i). the truce, which was to expire July 3. 1488, till Sept. 1. 1489, as appears from Rymer's Fœdera. —— Mr Rapin obſerves (7), after my Lord Verulam (8), that 'Henry loved to employ Eccleſiaſtics, becauſe 'he had always Church-preferments ready for their 'reward. But he took care to promote them by de'grees from ſmaller to more conſiderable Sees. There'in he found his own profit; for by tranſlating Biſhops 'from one See to another, he made the more vacan'cies, and conſequently the firſt-fruits which accrued 'to the King, were greatly multiplied.'

And for the country likewiſe, he had cauſed the people to withdraw their cattle and goods into faſt places, that were not of eaſy approach; and ſent poſt to the Earl of Surrey (who was not far off in Yorkſhire) to come in diligence to his ſuccour. Whereupon King James retired into Scotland; and the Earl purſuing him, took the caſtle of Aton, then reckoned one of the ſtrongeſt places between Berwick and Edenburgh (9).

Being appointed by Margaret Counteſs of Richmond one of the Executors of her Will, and alſo one of the Superviſors of the ſame [F], he fully perform'd his part, in founding and compleating the ſettlement of St John's-college in Cambridge (k). In March 1509-10, he was ſent embaſſador to France, jointly with the Earl of Surrey, and the Biſhop of Durham, and on the 23d of the ſame month concluded a new Treaty of alliance with King Lewis XII (l). About the ſame time, a ſharp diſpute aroſe between him and William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, concerning the extent of the juriſdiction of the Prerogative Court, and its claiming the probate of Wills when the Teſtators had bona notabilia in divers Dioceſes. The diſpute at length grew ſo high, that an Appeal was made to the Pope. But it being referred back to the King, he determined it amicably in 1513 (m) [G]. This ſummer, he attended the King in his Expedition into France, with a large retinue, and was at the taking of Terouenne (n). Alſo the 15th of October following, jointly with Thomas Grey Marquis of Dorſet, he concluded a new Treaty with the Emperor Maximilian againſt France (o). In 1515, being no longer able to bear the repeated mortifications he received from Cardinal Wolſey, a creature of his own making, he withdrew in diſcontent to his own Dioceſe (p) [H]: But it is not known when he reſigned the Privy-ſeal. The reſt of his days he ſpent wholly in works of Charity and Munificence. Particularly, about this time, he was employed in the noble and generous Foundation of Corpus-Chriſti-College in Oxford [I]. which hath produced ſeveral learned and eminent men in every profeſſion. In 1522 he founded a free ſchool at Taunton in Somerſetſhire, where he had a fine manor as Biſhop of Wincheſter, and built a convenient houſe for the maſter. The like he alſo did at Grantham near his native place [K]. At Wincheſter, he covered the Choir of the Cathedral, the preſbytery and iſles adjoining, with a good vault; and new glazed all the windows of that part of the Church. He likewiſe built a handſome wall round the preſbytery, on the top of which he placed, in leaden coffins, the bones of ſuch Princes and Prelates, as had been buried in divers parts of the Church (q): but they were moſtly deſtroyed during our unhappy civil wars. He had the misfortune of being blind for about ten years before his deceaſe: However he attended the Parliament in 1523 (r). Cardinal Wolſey meanly taking advantage of his infirmities, would fain have perſuaded him to reſign his Biſhoprick to him, and to be content with a penſion; but the [G] But it being referred back to the King, he determined it amicably in 1513.] Biſhop Fox was ſeconded in this diſpute by the Biſhops of London, Lincoln, and Exeter. And what they inſiſted upon, was, that no ſum under ten pounds ſhould be accounted bona notabilia: that deſperate debts ſhould not be taken in, to make up that ſum: and, that the oaths of executors and adminiſtrators ſhould be ſufficient, without the Archbiſhop's appointing other perſons to value the goods of the deceaſed. All which the King determined againſt the Archbiſhop, in favour of the appellant Biſhops: tho' Warham pretended, that bona notabilia to the amount of forty ſhillings were ſufficient to found his prerogative. The King alſo decreed againſt him, that none but chattels or moveables were within his juriſdiction; and that he had no authority to intermeddle with real eſtates (14).

(14) M. Parker, ubi ſupra, p. 307, 308.

[H] He withdrew in diſcontent to his own Dioceſe.] As did alſo Archbiſhop Warham to his, about the ſame time. Before their departure, they beſought the King, that he would not ſuffer any ſervant to be greater than his maſter; alluding to John xiii. 16. Henry knowing that they meant this of the Cardinal, made anſwer, that he would diligently ſee, that every ſervant ſhould obey, and not command (15).

(15) Holinſhed's Chron. ed. 1587. p. 839.

[I] Particularly about this time, he was employed in the noble and generous Foundation of Corpus Chriſti-College in Oxford.] His deſign at firſt, was, to erect in Oxford a College or Seminary for eight Monks, members of St Swithin's Priory in Wincheſter, and profeſſed of the ſame, with a few ſecular ſcholars: for which he obtained a licence in Mortmain, dated March 12. 1512-13. But he altered his deſign, chiefly, as 'tis ſaid, through the perſuaſions of Hugh Oldham, Biſhop of Exeter; who thus repreſented to him, 'What, my Lord, ſhall we build houſes, and provide 'livelihoods for a company of buſſing Monks, whoſe 'end and fall we ourſelves may live to ſee? No, no, 'it is more meet a great deal, that we ſhould have 'care to provide for the increaſe of learning, and for 'ſuch as by their learning ſhall do good in the Church 'and Commonwealth.' To this Biſhop Fox readily yielded, accepting of Biſhop Oldham's kind aſſiſtance, who contributed no leſs than 6000 marks towards the building of this college (16). Having therefore purchaſed three tenements, called Corner-hall, Nevills-inne, and Nunhall, with ſome parcels of land adjoining; and having obtained a new licence in Mortmain, dated November 26. 1516; he went on with his new foundation, the charter of which bore date the firſt of March following. He dedicated it to the honour of God Almighty, of the moſt ſacred Body of Chriſt, [Corporis Chriſti] of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, of St Peter, and St Paul; and of St Andrew, St Birinus, St Cuthbert, and St Swithin, the tutelar patrons of the Cathedral Churches of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Wincheſter: directing, that it ſhould be named Corpus-Chriſti-College. In the Statutes, dated 1517, he ordained, that it ſhould conſiſt of a Preſident, twenty Fellows, twenty Scholars, two Chaplains, two Clerks, and two Choriſters. And he endowed it with poſſeſſions, lands, &c. to the yearly value of 401 l. 8 s. 11 d. Biſhop Hugh Oldham abovementioned enlarged its revenues, beſides what he contributed towards the building. And its moſt conſiderable benefactors ſince have been, William Froſt of Yavington in Hampſhire, who gave the manor of Mapleſderwell; John Claymond, and Robert Morwent, the two firſt Preſidents; Richard Pate, Eſq; Sir George, St Paul, Bart. FOX (John), the famous Martyrologiſt, was born at Boſton in the county of Lincoln, in the year 1517 (a). His father dying when he was very young, and his mother marrying again, he came under the tutelage of a father-in-law, with whom he dwelt till the age of ſixteen, when he went to the Univerſity of Oxford, where he was entered of Braſen-Noſe College, under the care of Mr John Hawarden, Fellow of that College, and was Chamber-fellow with the famous Dr Nowell, afterwards Dean of St Paul's. May the ſeventeenth 1538, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). His great parts and learning ſoon diſtinguiſhed him, inſomuch that he was choſen Fellow of Magdalen College, and proceeded Maſter of Arts in 1543, which was the higheſt degree he attained in the Univerſity (d). He diſcovered, in his younger years, a genius for poetry, and wrote ſeveral Latin comedies [A], but the ſubjects were choſen from the Scriptures; and in theſe, his firſt eſſays, he gave an earneſt of his ſtrong and natural bent to the ſtudy of Divinity, to which he ſoon betook himſelf with rather more fervency than circumſpection, diſcovering himſelf in favour of the Reformation then in hand, before he was known to thoſe who maintained and ſupported the cauſe, or had power to protect the maintainers of it; and hence began his troubles. In order to make himſelf a ſufficient judge of the controverſies which then divided the Church, his firſt care was to ſearch diligently into the antient and modern hiſtory of the Church; to learn it's beginning, by what arts it flouriſhed, and by what errors it began to decline; to conſider the cauſes of thoſe controverſies and diſſentions which had ariſen in the Church, and to weigh attentively of what moment and conſequence they were to Religion. To this end he applied himſelf with ſuch zeal and induſtry, that before he attained to thirty years of age, he had read over all that either the Greek or Latin Fathers had left in their writings, the Schoolmen in their diſputations, the Councils in their acts, or the Conſiſtories in their decrees; and alſo acquir'd a competent ſkill in the Hebrew language (e). But from this ſtrict and ſevere application, by night as well as by day, from his

We have a comedy of his, intitled, de Chriſto Triumphante, printed at London 1551; and at Baſil in 1556, in 8vo. Mr Wood aſſerts (1), that it was written at Baſil in the houſe of Operinus the Printer, but this muſt be a miſtake, becauſe Mr Fox did not go to Baſil till the reign of Queen Mary, who did not come to the Crown till 1553. This play was tranſlated into Engliſh by Richard Day, ſon of John Day the famous Printer in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and publiſhed with this title, Chriſt Jeſus triumphant, wherein is deſcribed the glorious triumph and conqueſt of Chriſt over ſin, death, and the law, &c. London, 1579; and in 1607, in 8vo. It was again publiſhed in 1672, at London in 8vo. and dedicated to all ſchoolmaſters, in order that it might be admitted into their reſpective ſchools, for the peculiar elegance of its ſtyle, by T. C. M. A. of Sidney-College in Cambridge.

his forſaking his friends, for the moſt ſolitary retirement; the great and viſible diſtractions of his mind; and, above all, his abſenting himſelf from the public worſhip of the Church, of which before he had been a moſt conſtant frequenter, aroſe the firſt ſuſpicions of his alienated affections from the Church, and in which his enemies were ſoon confirmed, upon a more narrow inſpection into his conduct, which was too open not to expoſe him to the ſnares which were laid for his ruin; and having been accuſed of hereſy, he was, by the judgment of the College, condemned as an heretick, and expelled the Houſe; and was thought to have been favourably dealt with, that he eſcaped with his life [B]. This miſfortune, however, was the heavier upon Mr Fox, as it loſt him the favour and good offices of his friends, who were afraid to countenance or protect one condemned for a capital offence; and his father-in-law took a handle from hence, to with-hold Mr Fox's own father's eſtate from him, thinking that he who ſtood in danger of the Law himſelf, would with difficulty find relief from it. Being thus forſaken by his friends, he was reduced to great diſtreſs, when he was taken into the houſe of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickſhire, to be tutor to his children. Here he married a citizen's daughter of Coventry, and continued in Sir Thomas's family till his pupils were grown up, after which, with ſome difficulty, he procured entertainment from his father-in-law, and his wife's father at Coventry; from whence he removed to London a few years before King Henry's death, where, having no employment nor preferment, he was again driven to great neceſſities and diſtreſs, from which he was ſeaſonably relieved, in a remarkable manner, as we ſhall relate in the note [C], and was ſoon after taken into the Ducheſs of Richmond's family, to be tutor to her nephew the Earl of Surrey's children, who, upon the commitment of the Earl and his father the Duke of Norfolk to the Tower, were committed to the care of the Ducheſs of Richmond to be educated. In this family Mr Fox lived, at Ryegate in Surrey, during the latter part of King Henry's reign, the five years reign of King Edward the Sixth, and part of Queen Mary's reign, being at this time protected by one of his pupils then Duke of Norfolk, and is ſaid to have been the firſt perſon who preached the Goſpel at Ryegate (f). Anthony Wood alſo ſays, he was reſtored to his fellowſhip in Magdalen College, under Edward the Sixth (g). But Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who hated him, and fearing leaſt the heir of one of the nobleſt families in the kingdom, ſhould, as might naturally be expected, tread in the ſteps of his tutor, by him greatly reſpected and honoured, ſought by many ſnares and ſtratagems to work his ruin; inſomuch, that Mr Fox, very much againſt the Duke's inclination (b), was obliged to quit his native country, and ſeek ſhelter abroad. Accordingly, the Duke having cauſed every thing neceſſary to be prepared for his tutor's voyage, he ſet ſail from Ipſwich-haven, taking his wife along with him, who was then big with child, and ſome other perſons who went abroad on the ſame account. But a ſtorm ariſing, they were obliged the next day to put back to port, where, having with much difficulty arrived, Mr Fox found that Biſhop Gardiner had iſſued out a warrant for apprehending him, and cauſed the moſt diligent ſearch to be made after him; upon which, having prevailed upon the Maſter of the ſhip to put to ſea again, to the great peril of their lives, they arrived ſafe in two days at Newport-haven, from whence Mr Fox and his company travelled to Antwerp and Franckfort, and thence to Baſil in Germany, where great numbers of Engliſh ſubjects reſorted in thoſe times of perſecution [D]. This city was

[B] Condemned as an Heretick, and expelled the Houſe.] Anthony Wood ſays (2), he reſigned his fellowſhip in 1545, merely, as it was thought, to prevent expulſion; and the ſame writer in his Hiſtory and Antiquities of Oxford (3), ſays that he was in a manner obliged to reſign his fellowſhip. But Mr Fox's own ſon informs us (4), that our author being ſuſpected of hereſy, and upon examination, not concealing his ſentiments, was condemned as an heretick, and actually expelled the College; and his enemies affirmed that he was favourably dealt with by that ſentence, and that he might have been queſtioned for his life, if they had not deſigned to have uſed clemency towards him.

[C] Was relieved in a remarkable manner.] As he was ſitting one day in St Paul's Church, almoſt ſpent with long faſting, his countenance wan and pale, and his eyes hollow, there came to him one whom he never remembered to have ſeen before, who ſitting down by him, accoſted him very familiarly, and put into his hands an untold ſum of money, bidding him be of good chear, and to be careful of himſelf, and uſe all means to prolong his life; and that within a few days, new hopes were at hand, and more certain means of ſubſiſtence. Mr Fox uſed all his endeavours to find out the perſon, by whoſe bounty he was ſo ſeaſonably relieved from extreme neceſſity, but in vain; however the prediction was fulfilled, for within three days afterwards Mr Fox was taken into the ſervice of the Ducheſs of Richmond (5).

(5) Vita J. Foxii.

[D] He travelled to Baſil in Germany, &c.] We have followed his ſon, the Hiſtorian of his life, in this account, who muſt certainly be ſuppoſed to have been beſt informed in all particulars of his father's life. Anthony Wood however differs in his account of Mr Fox's travels; he ſays, that he went over to Baſil in King Henry the Eighth's time, when he was about thirty years old, and became a laborious writer, at the houſe of one Operinus a Printer there. After King Henry's death, he returned to Magdalen-College, and after a ſhort ſtay there went again to his charge at Rygate, and remained there till after Queen Mary came to the Crown, when he again left England, and as Dr Heylyn ſays, was at Franckfort, and appeared in the ſchiſm among the Engliſh there; for we find his name among thoſe of the Engliſh Proteſtants who took refuge in that city, in the tract entitled, The troubles of Franckfort, printed in 1575; was againſt the Church of England as ſettled in the reign of Edward the Sixth, and took part with Knox and Whittingham (6). Afterwards he retired to his old landlord at Baſil, where he continued a ſevere drudge at writing, till Queen Elizabeth was ſettled in the throne, when he again returned to England. The former part of this account however contradicts itſelf, for if Mr Fox was born in 1517, and firſt went abroad at thirty years of age, that muſt have been in 1547, which was in King Edward's reign; whereas Mr Wood ſays, he went abroad in King Henry's time. It ſeems much more probable, as we have before ſhewn, that he did not leave England till Queen Mary's reign, according to his ſon's account.

was at that time one of the moſt famous in Europe for Printing, and moſt of thoſe who retired thither got their ſubſiſtence by reviſing and correcting the preſs; and to this employment Mr Fox betook himſelf, and it was here he laid the firſt plan of his Acts and Monuments of the Church. Upon the death of Queen Mary, which (according to the teſtimony of Dr Elmare, afterwards Biſhop of London) Mr Fox in a ſermon foretold the day before it happened; and, as ſoon as he found the Proteſtant religion likely to be eſtabliſhed, he ventured to return to his native country, where he ſtill found a faithful and ſerviceable friend in his quondam pupil, the Duke of Norfolk, and was entertained by him at his Manor-place called Chriſt-Church, in London, as long as his Grace lived, and at his death he ſettled a penſion upon him, which his ſon the Earl of Suffolk confirmed to him (i). Mr Secretary Cecil alſo obtained for him of the Queen, the rectory or prebendſhip of Shipton, in the church of Saliſbury, tho' Mr Fox himſelf would have declined accepting it; and tho' he had many great and powerful friends, as Sir Francis Walſingham, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Thomas Greſham, Sir Drue Drury, the Biſhops Grindal, Pilkington, Elmare, &c. who would have raiſed him to very conſiderable preferments; yet he declined them, being, as Anthony Wood ſays, always averſe to ſubſcribe to the Canons, tho' tendered to him by Archbiſhop Parker, and to ſome part of the ceremonies of the Church [E]. But tho' he was a Nonconformiſt, he was a moderate one, and diſapproved of the heats of the rigid Puritans [F]. In 1564, he ſent a Latin panegyric to the Queen, upon her indulgence to ſome noncomplying Divines, and ſuffering them to hold dignities in the Church [G]. In July 1575, he wrote a Latin Letter to the Queen, to diſſuade her Majeſty from putting to death two Anabaptiſts who had been condemned to be burnt [H]. He

[E] Tho' tender'd to him by Archbiſhop Parker]. Dr Fuller tells us (7), that the Archbiſhop ſummoned him to ſubſcribe, 'that the general reputation of his 'piety might give the greater countenance to Conformity.' That the old man produced the New Teſtament in Greek, to this, ſays he, will I ſubſcribe. And when a ſubſcription to the Canons was required of him, he refuſed it, ſaying, I have nothing in the Church ſave a Prebend at Saliſbury, and much good may it do you, if you will take it away from me. However he continued in his place till his death, ſuch reſpect, as Dr Fuller obſerves, did the Biſhops, moſt of them formerly his fellow-exiles, bear to his age, parts, and labours.

[F] And diſapproved of the heats of the rigid Puritans.] Dr Fuller obſerves (8), that tho' Mr Fox came not up in all particulars to cleave the pin of Conformity (as refuſing to ſubſcribe) yet he utterly diſtaſted the factious people of that age. The Hiſtorian then gives us a Latin letter written by our author to a Biſhop, upon occaſion of his ſon Samuel's being expelled by the Puritan party from his fellowſhip of Magdalen-College in Oxford, after his return from his travels abroad, upon the groundleſs imputation of his having turned Papiſt. In this letter he ſays, 'I confeſs it 'has always been my great care, if I could not be 'ſerviceable to many perſons, yet not knowingly to 'injure any one, at leaſt of all thoſe of Magdalen-College. I cannot therefore but the more wonder 'at the turbulent genius which inſpires thoſe factious Puritans, ſo that violating the laws of gratitude, 'deſpiſing my letters and prayers, diſregarding the 'interceſſion of the Preſident himſelf, without any 'previous admonition, or aſſigning any cauſe, they 'have exerciſed ſo great tyranny againſt me and my 'ſon; were I one, who, like them, would be violently outragious againſt Biſhops and Archbiſhops, or join 'myſelf with them, that is, would become mad, as 'they are, I had not met with this ſevere treatment; 'now becauſe, quite different from them, I have 'choſen the ſide of modeſty and publick tranquillity, 'hence the hatred they have a long time conceived 'againſt me, is at laſt grown to this degree of bitterneſs. As this is the caſe, I do not ſo much aſk 'you what you will do on my account, as what is to 'be thought of for your ſakes; you who are Prelates 'of the Church, again and again conſider. As to 'myſelf, tho' the taking away the fellowſhip from my 'ſon, is a great affliction to me; yet becauſe this is 'only a private concern, I bear it with more moderation; I am much more concerned upon the account of the Church, which is publick. I perceive 'a certain race of men riſing up, who if they ſhould 'increaſe and gather ſtrength in this kingdom, I am 'ſorry to ſay what diſturbance I foreſee muſt follow 'from it. Your prudence is not ignorant how much the Chriſtian Religion ſuffered formerly by the diſſimulation and hypocriſy of the Monks. At preſent in theſe men I know not what new ſort of 'Monks ſeems to revive; ſo much more pernicious 'than the former, as with more ſubtle artifices of 'deceiving, under pretence of perfection, like Stage-players who only act a part, they conceal a more 'dangerous poiſon: who while they require every 'thing to be formed according to their own ſtrict diſcipline, and conſcience, will not deſiſt till they have 'brought all things into Jewiſh bondage.' Upon this letter, Dr Fuller (9) bids us remark the violence of rigid Nonconformiſts. 'We may perceive, ſays he, by 'this letter how powerful the party of Nonconformiſts was grown at that time, and to what violences 'and extravagancies, ſome went in their practices, 'inſomuch that Dr Humphreys, then Preſident of Magdalen, and Mr Fox himſelf (both which ſcrupled 'ſubſcription in ſome particulars) were deſerted by 'them as lukewarm, and remiſs in the cauſe.' Mr Fox's ſon however was at laſt reſtored to his fellowſhip by the Queen's mandate.

[G] In 1564, he ſent a Latin panegyric to the Queen, upon her indulgence of ſome Divines, &c.] In the beginning of this addreſs, he mentions her Majeſty's retrieving the kingdom from the laſt degree of miſery and declenſion; that ſhe had reformed religion and the ſtatute book, corrected idleneſs, ſuppreſſed robberies, and made the country orthodox and quiet. That ſhe had recovered the mint to its old ſtandard; and that the manners of her ſubjects were no leſs refined and brightned than the coin. That theſe ſtate regulations, tho' very valuable in their kind, came ſhort of the bleſſings in religion. That now truth was no longer perſecuted, conſcience had its juſt liberty, and ſuperſtition gave way to the goſpel. 'And of 'this, ſays he, we have a remarkable inſtance in your 'Majeſty's anſwer to the petition of ſome divines concerning the eccleſiaſtical habit. What ſatisfaction 'this gracious indulgence gave the univerſal Church, 'what an advantage after-ages would receive by it; 'and what an immortal honour would deſcend upon 'her memory, is ſcarcely to be imagined.' From hence he proceeds to commend her for her encouragement of learning, and the expectations of favour which ſhe had given to the Univerſity of Cambridge. In the cloſe he acquaints her Majeſty that he deſigned to write her hiſtory, and had prepared ſome materials for that purpoſe; but that theſe would be imperfect without further information from her Majeſty: and after all, he thought her own genius nobly furniſhed to deſcribe her reign, and that no body could do her juſtice better than herſelf (10).

He was remarkable for his piety and great zeal for Religion, his charity, humility, and intenſe application to the duties of his function. He died on the eighteenth of April 1587, in the ſeventieth year of his age, greatly lamented, and was buried in the chancel of the church of St Giles's Cripplegate, where a monument was erected to his memory on the ſouth wall, and an inſcription on it. It is ſaid Mr Fox had the vicarage of St Giles's; but, as Mr Wood ſays (if he had it at all), he kept it but a little while in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign. In the note is an account of our author's writings [I]. He left two who tranſcribed this letter from the original, has publiſhed it in his Church Hiſtory (11); Mr Collier obſerves (12), that it is written in a very handſome Chriſtian ſtrain. In this letter, Mr Fox declares, that with regard to thoſe fanatical ſects, he does not think they ought to be countenanced in a ſtate, but chaſtiſed in a proper manner. But that to puniſh with the flames, the bodies of thoſe who err rather from blindneſs than obſtinacy of will, is cruel, and more ſuitable to the example of the Romiſh Church, than the mildneſs of the goſpel. He declares he does not write thus out of an indulgence to error, but as he is a man, out of regard to the lives of men, that they may have an opportunity of repenting of their errors; and entreats her Majeſty therefore to ſpare the lives of theſe wretches, or at leaſt to change the ſhocking manner of their puniſhment; to baniſh them, or commit them to perpetual impriſonment; or ſtigmatize, or even hang them; at leaſt not to revive the Smithfield fires, which thro' her Majeſty's care had been ſo long extinguiſhed. If this could not be granted, at leaſt to allow them a month or two, in order that endeavours might be uſed to reclaim them from their errors, and thereby to prevent the deſtruction of their ſouls as well as bodies. But Fuller tells us, that tho' the Queen conſtantly called Mr Fox her father, yet ſhe gave him a flat denial as to the ſaving of their lives, if after a month's reprieve, and conference with Divines, they would not recant their errors; and they continuing ſtill inflexible, were accordingly burnt in Smithfield.

[I] In the note is an account of our author's writings.] Beſides thoſe already mentioned, he wrote, Syllogiſticon admonitio ad Parliamentum. De lapſis per errorem in Eccleſiam reſtituendis. A Latin tranſlation of the controverſy between Archbiſhop Cranmer, and Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter, about the Euchariſt. This our author did at Baſil, and there was only a part of it printed. De cenſura, ſeu excommunicatione Eccleſiaſtica, interpellatio ad Archiepiſcopum Cantuarienſem. London 1551. in 8vo. A Sermon preached at St Paul's Croſs, on Good-Friday, upon the ſubject of Chriſt's Crucifixion, printed by John Day, at London, 1570, in 4to. It was dedicated, 'to all 'ſuch as labour and be heavy laden in conſcience, to 'be read for their ſpiritual comfort.' The text is, 2 Cor. v. 20, 21. and the Sermon is divided into two parts, to which are ſubjoined, a prayer made for the Church, and all the States there; and a poſtſcript to the Papiſts. Mr Wood mentions (13) an edition of this Sermon at London, 1609. in 8vo. and a Latin tranſlation of it intitled, De Chriſto crucifixo: concio in Die Paraſcev. in 2 Cor. cap. v. verſ. 20, 21. London 1571, in 4to. Mr Strype, who does not appear to have ever ſeen the edition of this Sermon in 1570, is miſtaken in ſaying (14) that it was preached in 1578, and printed in 1585, unleſs reprinted in that year. His argument that it was preached about 1578, is drawn from a paſſage in the prayer, wherein Mr Fox ſays, that the Queen had doubled the years of her ſiſter and brother; but theſe very words are alſo to be found in the prayer publiſhed in the edition of the Sermon in 1570. Tables of Grammar; London 1552. London 1577, and 1581, in 4to. and he publiſhed the four Evangeliſts in the old Saxon Tongue, with the Engliſh thereunto adjoined. London 1571, in 4to. Bale mentions ſeveral other writings of his, but Mr Wood ſays ſome of them were never printed; we ſhall therefore proceed to give ſome account of the principal and greateſt of our author's works, his Acts and Monuments of the Church, commonly called, Fox's Book of Martyrs. We have before obſerved that the author firſt applied himſelf to write this Hiſtory of the Church, whilſt he was at Baſil, but he reſerved the greateſt part of it againſt his return into his own country, that he might have the authority and teſtimony of more witneſſes. It appears by the author's own notes, that this moſt laborious work was eleven years in hand; and in this, as well as in ſome others of his labours, Mr Fox was greatly aſſiſted by that pious prelate Dr Grindal, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who beſides his conſtant counſel and advice in the courſe of the work, ſupplied him with materials, which he digeſted and methodized himſelf; for whilſt Dr Grindal was abroad, he had eſtabliſhed a correſpondence in England for this purpoſe, by which means accounts of moſt of the acts and ſufferings of the perſecuted in Queen Mary's reign, came to his hands (16); and it was owing to Dr Grindal's ſtrict and tender regard to truth, that the Martyrology was ſo long in hand, for he rejected all common reports and relations that were brought over, till more ſatisfactory evidence could be procured; and hence he adviſed Mr Fox at firſt only to print ſeparately the acts of ſome particular men, of whom any ſure and authentic memoirs came to hand, till materials for a more compleat hiſtory of the Martyrs and their perſecutions and ſufferings could be procured. In purſuance of this advice Mr Fox publiſhed at Baſil, diverſe hiſtories of the Engliſh Biſhops and Divines, in ſingle pieces, ſoon after their reſpective ſufferings and martyrdoms. He had alſo publiſhed at Straſburgh, in 1554, in octavo, Commentarii rerum in Eccleſia geſtarum,

It was alſo by the advice of Dr Grindal, that the Martyrology was printed both in Latin and Engliſh, for the more general uſe, the author having began it in Latin It was publiſhed at London 1563, in one thick volume in folio, with this title, Actes and Monuments of theſe latter perillous days touching matters of the Churche, wherein are comprehended and deſcribed the great perſecutions and horrible troubles that have been wrought and practiſed by the Romiſh Prelates, ſpecially in this Realme of England and Scotland, from the yeare of our Lorde a thouſand unto the time now preſent, &c. gathered and collected accordynge to the true copies and wrytinges certificatorie, as well of the parties themſelves that ſuffered, as alſo out of the Biſhops regiſters, which were the doers thereof By John Fox. Imprinted at London by John Day, dwelling over Alderſgate beneth St Martin's, Anno 1563, the 20*th of March. Cum gratia & privilegio regiæ Majeſtatis.* Mr Fox preſented a copy of this edition to Magdalen-College, Oxford, and at the ſame time wrote a Latin letter to Dr Lawrence Humphreys, printed by Mr Thomas Hearne in his appendix, No. 5. to his Preface to Adami de Domerſham Hiſt. de Rebus Geſtis Glaſtonenſibus, Oxon. 1727, in 8vo. 2 Vols. There was a fourth edition at London 1583, in two volumes in folio, and it was reprinted in 1632, in three volumes folio. The ninth edition was printed at London in three volumes in folio, with copper cuts, the former Editions having only wooden ones. Mr Wood obſerves (17), that the undertakers of this edition had in a manner obtained a promiſe from King Charles II to revive the order made in Queen Elizabeth's time, of placing it in the common halls of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans, Archdeacons, Heads of Colleges, &c. according to the Canons of Dr Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in 1571. Mr Strype tells us (18), that when this book was firſt publiſhed, our author was thought, 'to have done very 'exquiſite ſervice to the Proteſtant cauſe, in ſhewing, 'from abundance of antient books, regiſters, records, 'and choice manuſcripts, the encroachments of Popes, 'Papalins, and the ſtout oppoſitions that were made 'by learned and good men, in all ages and countries 'againſt them; and eſpecially under King Henry the 'VIIIth, and Queen Mary here in England; preſerv-'ing to us the memories of thoſe holy men and wo-'men, thoſe Biſhops and Divines, together with their 'hiſtories, acts, ſufferings, and their conſtant deaths, 'willingly undergone for the ſake of Chriſt and his 'goſpel, and for refuſing to comply with Popiſh doc-'trines and ſuperſtitions.' Archbiſhop Whitgift (19) ſtiles Mr Fox that worthy man, and tells Mr Cartwright the Puritan, that he had read over his Acts and Monuments from the one end to the other; and declares that Mr Fox hath very diligently and faithfully laboured in this matter, (of Archbiſhops and Metropolitans) and ſearched out the truth of it as learnedly as I knowe any man to have done Camden likewiſe gives him and his work this character (20); Ex eruditorum numero obiit Johannes Foxus Oxonienſis, qui Eccleſiaſticam Angliæ Hiſtoriam ſive Martyrologiam indefeſſo veritatis ſtudio, primum latine, poſtea anglice auctius, magna cum laude contexuit. The Papiſts were very angry at the publication of this hiſtory; in which their lyes and cruelty were ſo fully expoſed; and accordingly did all they could to blaſt the credit both of that and its author. They called it Fox's golden Legend, and repreſented it an huge fardel of notorious lyes and falſehoods (21). In 1673, above forty years after the publication of Mr Fox's book, father Robert Parſons publiſhed, under the name of N. D. that is, of Nicholas Doleman, A Treatiſe of the three converſions from Paganiſm to the Chriſtian Religion, in three volumes in 8vo. the principal deſign of which is to expoſe Mr Fox's Church Hiſtory. In this performance he charges Mr Fox with falſities and impoſtures, manifeſt foolery and lying, with having a wicked ſpirit, being guilty of tergiverſation, uſing impertinent arguments, ſhewing a contempt of antiquity, &c. of wilful corruptions and falſifications of authors, particularly of Venerable Bede He tells us Mr Fox endeavoured to corrupt the acts of old Martyrs, nay, that he diſcredited his own Martyrs, and pretends to have found no leſs than 120 lyes in leſs than three leaves of his book (*). Mr Collier, who takes all opportunities of depretiating Mr Fox's character, and undervaluing his work, accuſes him of diſingenuity and ill nature, and ſays he ought to be read with caution. That a vein of ſatire and coarſe language runs thro' his Martyrology (22), and inſtances in his calling (23) the Biſhop of Winchelſea an inſenſible aſs, and ſaying he had no feeling of God's Spirit, in the matter of Juſtification Mr Fox does certainly ſometimes fail in decency and temper; but this was no more than was common to the zealous promoters of the Reformation, who it muſt be confeſſed were ſometimes hurried on by their zeal to lengths by no means defenſible Mr Wood ſays Mr Fox was a ſevere Calviniſt, and ſhewed himſelf a very bitter enemy in his writings, againſt the Roman Catholicks, exceeding as ſome conceive the rules of charity. He obſerves (24), that as our author 'hath taken a great deal of pains 'in his work, and ſhewed ſometimes much judgment 'in it; ſo hath he committed many errors therein, by 'truſting to the relations of poor ſimple people, and 'in making ſuch Martyrs as were living after the firſt 'edition of his book came forth, tho' afterwards by 'him excuſed and omitted.' He charges Mr Fox likewiſe (25) with committing a moſt egregious falſity in reporting, that one Grimwood of Higham in Suffolk, died in a miſerable manner for ſwearing and bearing falſe witneſs againſt one John Cooper a Carpenter of Watſam in the ſame county, for which he loſt his life. The account which Fox gives of his death, is this. 'When he was in labour ſtacking up 'a goffe of corn, having his health, and fearing no 'peril, ſuddenly his bowels fell out of his body, and 'immediately moſt miſerably he died' Now Wood relates, that in the reign of Queen Elizabeth one Prit became Parſon of the pariſh where the ſaid Grimwood dwelt, and preaching againſt perjury, not being acquainted with his Pariſhioners, cited the ſaid ſtory of Fox; and it happening that Grimwood being then alive and in the church, he brought an action upon the caſe againſt the Parſon. But Judge Anderſon, who ſat at the Aſſizes in the county of Suffolk, adjudged it not maintainable, becauſe it was not ſpoken maliciouſly. Mr Wood refers to the abridgement of many caſes and reſolutions of the Common Law, written by Judge Henry Rolles, p 87. Sect. 7. tit. action ſur caſe. But Mr Strype has ſhewn (26), that Mr Fox has not had juſtice done him in this paſſage, ſince there was one Grimwood who died in the manner above mentioned, though Mr Fox was miſled in inſerting this ſtory in his Martyrology, becauſe the ſaid John Cooper was not tried for his religion, but for ſpeaking rebellious words againſt the Queen. But there are many other facts, in the relation of which, Mr Fox is not to be depended upon; particularly in his account of the death of the perſecuting Biſhop Gardiner. He tells us (27), as he ſays from credible intelligence, that the Biſhop refuſed to go to dinner on the day Ridley and Latimer were burnt, till his ſervants who were poſted on the road for that purpoſe had brought him word that the faggotts were kindled about them; that this barbarous reſolution occaſioned the dinner to be kept back till four o' clock, and that the old Duke of Norfolk, who that day dined with the Biſhop, was uneaſy at ſtaying ſo long That when Gardiner heard the two Biſhops were burning, he was tranſported with the news, and went immediately to dinner, but was ſeized at table, carried to his bed where he lay a fortnight, and died. To diſprove this tragical ſtory, it may be ſufficient to obſerve that Gardiner appeared twice in the Houſe of Lords, after he is reported to have been ſeized with this mortal diſtemper; and the old Duke of Norfolk had been dead above a year, when Fox makes him at dinner at the Biſhop of Winchelſea's afterwards Fellow, and Maſter of Arts. In 1586 he had a leaſe of the manor annexed to the prebend of Shipton, ſettled on him by his father [K]. He was ſteward to Sir Thomas Heneage, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen; and in 1589 married Mrs Anne Leveſon, in the houſe of Sir Moyle Finch, of Eaſtwell in Kent (l). In 1610, he wrote the Life of his father, prefix'd to the Acts and Monuments of the Church (m). Thomas Fox, the younger ſon of our author, was educated at King's College Cambridge, and became afterwards an eminent Phyſician at London, and Fellow of the College of Phyſicians (n). His daughter Anne, who was his heir, married Sir Richard Willis, of Ditton in Eſſex, Bart. ſome time Colonel-General of the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Rutland, and Governor of the town and caſtle of Newark.

cheſter's, for he died at Framingham caſtle, September 1554, and was ſucceeded by his grandſon, who could not then be an old Duke, as the ſtory ſays. As to Gardiner he died of the gout, as Godwin relates, and not of a ſuppreſſion of urine as Fox would have it (28). Mr Fox, as Mr Collier alſo obſerves, is particularly ſevere upon the memory of the famous Cardinal Wolſey, and in many places of his Martyrology laſhes him and loads him with cenſure, ſometimes wrongfully, and diſingenuouſly. He gives a remarkable inſtance (29) of an exaggeration of Mr Fox, in the account he gives of the charge exhibited againſt the Cardinal by the Privy-Council, in the fourth article of which, Wolſey is accuſed of preſumption in ſpeaking and writing in this manner, The King and I would you ſhould do thus; and, the King and I do give you our thanks, &c (30). This to be ſure was an high preſumption in the Cardinal, but Mr Fox has ſwelled it much higher, by making him ſet himſelf before the King, and ſpeak in the language of Ego & rex meus, as Fox reports he did (31). The ſame author (32) alſo gives us, among others, a very remarkable inſtance of Mr Fox's intemperate zeal, which hurried him almoſt to a degree of prophaneneſs. When it was thought that Queen Mary was with child, there were prayers printed and diſperſed about the kingdom, for her Majeſty's happy delivery, &c. which Fox has taken the freedom to ridicule (33), and to rally the people's devotion upon this occaſion, with this extraordinary and odd ſentence in his margin; cry up louder you Prieſts, peradventure your God is aſleep; as if (as Mr Collier juſtly obſerves,) their devotions had been directed to Baal or Aſhteroth; as if the Papiſts had worſhipped one God, and the Proteſtants another. 'I can't perceive (ſays Mr Collier) that the Martyrologiſt had any right to Elijah's ſarcaſm; his zeal was without doubt too much imbittered; he was plainly ridden by his paſſion, and puſhed, by diſſaffection, towards prophaneneſs.' Mr Strype (34) remarks that the eſteem of our author grew low among ſome even of the Clergy; and it is intimated by Dr Walker (35), that 'the Diſſenters pay a known and particular regard to Mr Fox's Acts and Monuments;' which paſſage is animadverted upon by the Reverend Mr John Lewis (36), who obſerves, that 'as to private ſtories, Mr Fox and his friends uſed the utmoſt diligence and care, that no falſehood might be obtruded on the reader, and were very ready to correct any miſtakes that might happen.'

[K] In 1586, he had a leaſe of the manor annexed to the Prebend of Shipton ſettled on him by his father.] Mr Strype tells us (37), that this was done upon Mr Samuel Fox's return home from his travels, which was about the end of June, as appears from a journal of his; but Dr Piers, Biſhop of Sarum, a Court Prelate, had begg'd it of the Queen to collate it, and accordingly had the grant of it. Upon this, Mr Fox applied himſelf in his father's name to Archbiſhop Whitgift, declaring his caſe, who immediately gave him a letter dated July the 14th, to the Biſhop of Sarum, and the Biſhop readily granted his requeſt, 'out of a due ſenſe, (ſays Mr Strype) of a man that had ſo well deſerved of the Church for his vaſt written labours of the Hiſtory of the Church, and the perſecutions of the true profeſſors of it. Nay, more than his requeſt, for he promiſed to ſettle an exhibition upon father Fox's ſecond ſon, whoſe name was Thomas, bred up in King's-College, Cambridge; and when he was capable of it, of a Prebend in his Church of Sarum. For to this tenour did the Biſhop's anſwer to the Archbiſhop run, dated the ſame day with the Archbiſhop's to him. This was the judgment and venerable eſteem the Archbiſhop and Churchmen in thoſe days, had of that reverend and learned confeſſor and his labours.' H

FREIND (John), a learned Philoſopher, an excellent Phyſician, and a moſt elegant Writer in the XVIIIth Century. His father was Rector of Croton, in Northamptonſhire, a man of great learning, piety, and integrity; and extreamly careful in the education of his ſons (a). Of theſe, John was born in 1675, and, together with his brother Robert, put under the care of the celebrated Dr Richard Buſby, then Maſter of Weſtminſter-School; under whom both brothers diſtinguiſhed themſelves, as well by the quickneſs of their parts, as the ſteadineſs of their application. From thence, John was elected into Chriſt's-Church College in Oxford, in 1690, where he had again the ſignal advantage of being under the eye of the famous Dr Aldrich, who, for his exemplary vigilance, true zeal for learning, and well conducted generoſity, was univerſally admired and applauded while living, whoſe memory will be ever revered in that ſeat of the Muſes, where he made it the buſineſs of his life to promote uſeful and polite literature (b), and whoſe praiſes ought always to accompany thoſe of the great men formed under his care. In conſequence of that warm ſpirit of emulation which then prevailed in Chriſt-Church, as well as the natural inclination of our young ſcholar, he applied himſelf with the greateſt vigour to ſtudy the writings of the moſt celebrated Poets, Orators, and Hiſtorians, among the Antients; by which he acquired an early facility in writing elegant Latin, in Verſe as well as Proſe, and a perfect knowledge of the Greek language, of which he gave ſome publick ſpecimens, which were generally and juſtly admired (c) [A]. He was not however diverted, either by the pleaſure

[A] Which were generally and juſtly admired.] It may be affirmed without the leaſt flattery, or even complaiſance towards the memory of this learned perſon, that even in the earlieſt part of his life he gave unqueſtionable teſtimonies of thoſe two admirable qualities, which when conjoined never fail of producing great men in every profeſſion, genius, and application. We have obſerved in the text, that it was impoſſible for one endowed with ſuch ſignal advantages, not to receive all imaginable encouragement in that ſeminary of pleaſure that accompanies this kind of reading, or the reputation he had acquired by his proficiency therein, from the deſign which he had formed of purſuing ſeverer ſtudies; and accordingly began with great diligence to cultivate thoſe ſciences, without the knowledge of which it is impoſſible to become abſolutely maſter of Phyſick (d). His firſt care was to digeſt thoroughly the true and rational principles of Natural Philoſophy, Chymiſtry, and Anatomy; and to theſe he added a ſufficient acquaintance with the Mathematicks, reading afterwards the beſt phyſical authors antient and modern, examining, weighing, and comparing what they ſaid, and labouring to gain a true judgment of their excellencies and defects, from the dictates of ſound reaſon and the unbiaſſed light of experiments. How well this method ſucceeded, and how ſoon he became a great maſter in this truly noble and uſeful ſcience, appeared from a letter of his, dated from Oxford July the twenty-ſixth 1699, to Sir Hans, then Dr Sloane, which was very ſoon after publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (e) [B]. In this firſt exerciſe of his pen, on the proper buſineſs of his

of learning, where Dr Aldrich preſided. Under his auſpice, Mr Freind undertook, together with another young gentleman of great parts and riſing reputation, to publiſh a Latin tranſlation, with ſeveral neceſſary helps, of two Greek orations (1), one of Æſchines and the other of Demoſthenes, which were at that time generally well received, and have been ſince reprinted. The title of this book runs thus.

About the ſame time, being then in the twenty firſt year of his age, he was prevailed upon to reviſe that edition of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, which had been prepared in France for the uſe of the Dauphin, which was then re-printed at Oxford (2) with the following title.

To theſe proofs of his diligence and learning, let us alſo add one of his genius excited by a very melancholy occaſion, that of the death of his Royal Highneſs, William Duke of Glouceſter, which happened July the thirtieth 1700, at Windſor, in the eleventh year of his age. It was upon this ſubject, that Mr Freind addreſſed a Latin Ode to Dr Edward Hannes (3) an excellent Phyſician, and one who was alſo diſtinguiſhed by his poetic writings in the ſame language. The concluſion of this Ode, which has been always regarded as an admirable performance, as well in point of ſentiment as elegance, cannot but be acceptable to the reader at the ſame time, that it juſtifies what is aſſerted in the text. After expatiating on the high hopes that were entertained of this promiſing young Prince, he returns to the ſad ſubject of his loſs in theſe ſtanzas.

[B] Which was very ſoon after publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions.] This letter contains the hiſtory of a very remarkable Hydrocephalus, or watry head, and is more preciſe, and at the ſame time more perſpicuous, than almoſt any thing of the ſame kind extant in other authors (4). The external dimenſions of this head before it was opened, were from the eye brows over the crown to the nape twenty three inches, the circumference from the nape round the Oſſa Bregmatis twenty ſix, but round the Os Frontis twenty four; from ear to ear over the crown nineteen, from the eye brows to the chin four, from one extremity of the eye brows to the other, four and a half from the chin to the coronal future, ſeven and a half, the circumference from the chin round the crown thirty, from one extremity of the ear backwards to the other; round the noſe twelve, and round the nape ſix and a half, from temple to temple over the forehead eleven; the circumference of the head round the Os Frontis and Occipitis twenty nine; the circumference of the neck nine and two thirds, the length of the neck two, the length of the body thirty three, the circumference of the Thorax eighteen, the length of the foot four and a half, from the end of the middle finger to the acromion twelve and a half, the circumference of the arm five, of the calf five and a half, and of the thigh eight inches. After the integuments were removed, the top of the Cranium appeared ſoft and membranous, the extent of the membrane from one temple to the other was eight inches, between the parietal bones three and a half, from the Os Frontis to the Os Occipitis twelve; in the middle, juſt upon the crown, lay a bone in ſome places a little cartilaginous five inches long and one broad, joined to the membranes on every ſide of the ſame thickneſs, with the reſt of the upper part of the Cranium that was bony, which was extremely thin every where, and the Laminæ lay ſo cloſe, that in many places no Diploe could be diſcerned, the membrane was as thin as the Pericranium, which yet was eaſily divided from it, none of the ſutures were entirely cloſed, thoſe of the upper jaw were very looſe in the temporal and lambdoidal ſutures, there was a vaſt number of the Triquetra wormiana, all which had ſo many diſtinct ſutures: upon piercing the Dura Mater, a great quantity of water guſhed out which lay in the ventricles of the brain, as well as between the Dura Mater, and the Pia; the liquor was thin, pale, and inſipid, of which there was taken out five quarts; the Dura Mater was firm and entire, of its uſual thickneſs, and it ſtuck very cloſe to the bony as well as membranous parts of the Cranium; all its proceſſes and ſinus's were ſingular, the fourth ſinus ſomewhat larger than ordinary, a very large vein of the Dura Mater entered the longitudinal ſinus directly forwards towards the Criſta Galli, contrary to the courſe of the blood.

(4) No 256, Sept. 1699.

The Pia Mater was very much diſtended, and ſeemed to be ſtretched as much as it could bear, it lay ſmooth and equal upon the ſurface of the brain, there being neither any circumvolutions in the brain for it to go between, nor any partition to the Corpus callojum, tho' there was a large Falx in the Dura Mater; the lateral ventricles were very thin, their upper part towards his profeſſion, he ſhewed the ſame exactneſs, regard to method, and modeſty in expreſſing his own ſentiments, which were ſo conſpicuous in his ſucceeding Treatiſes. He was very careful in reſtraining that eagerneſs which is naturally incident to young men, and without ſuffering himſelf to be led away by the commendations of his friends, continued his aſſiduity in his ſtudy and practice, from whence he would rarely ſuffer himſelf to be drawn aſide by the deſire of adding to that fame which conſtantly attended his writings. However, in the ſpring of 1701, he wrote to the ſame worthy perſon a Latin letter, concerning ſome extraordinary caſes of perſons afflicted with convulſions in Oxfordſhire (f), which, at that time, made a very great noiſe, and might very probably have been magnified into ſomething ſupernatural, if our author had not taken great pains to ſet them in a true light [C]. He was already known and conſidered in the Faculty, when he began to meditate wards the Cerebellum was quite waſted, ſo that nothing was left to cover the cavity in that place but the Pia Mater, this was ſo thin that in bending down the head to empty the water it broke, and hindered the knowing exactly how much water the lateral ventricles contained, but by their cavity which was very large, one might gueſs they held at leaſt a pint each. The third and fourth ventricles had a little water in them, but were ſcarcely larger than uſual, as Steno obſerved in his Hydrocephalus calf; the brain had all its parts plain and entire, tho' its ſubſtance in moſt places was but very thin and looſe about the Corpora ſtriata, thalami nervorum opticorum, it was tolerably thick and firm enough, tho' nothing to what it is in a natural ſtate; the Cerebrum and Cerebellum, when laid out in their proper poſition, were eleven inches long; the Cerebrum croſs the lateral ventricles was nine inches broad; after all the water was taken out, both of them weighed one pound and a half.

The Corpora ſtriata, and thalami nervorum opticorum, were very ſmall in all their dimenſions, on the inſide towards the ventricles they were wrinkled, and lay in folds like thoſe in the inner coat of the ſtomach; in the Corpora ſtriata, there were no Striæ diſcernible, the Plexus Choroides was very ſmall, the Glandula Pinealis was ſomewhat larger, but leſs compact than ordinary; the Nates were very red and large two inches long, one broad, and one thick, the Teſtes were not diſtinguiſhed from them by any protuberance, they ſeemed rather to be a production, into which the Nates leſſened by degrees like a ſugar loaf. The Cerebellum was very firm every where, and did not much exceed its natural bulk, the medullary trunk, which ſends out thoſe little branches like trees, was thicker and harder than uſual, the branches were not ſo much diſpoſed like thoſe of a tree, but went rather in ſingle oblique lines, like ſo many rays from a point; the nerves were all regular and plain, only the olfactory were very ſmall, the optic nerves did not join before they entred the orbits; the Rete mirabile was very large, and ſo was Dr Ridley's circular ſinus, on the right ſide were two carotidateries, the intercoſtal nerve lying between them, and they entered the ſcull at the ſame hole; the trunk of the vertebral where thoſe arteries unite was extremely large and full of blood, the veins were neither larger nor more in number than uſual; Mr Freind could eaſily diſcern three or four lymphatics upon the brain over the lateral ventricles, but they were too ſmall to be traced: whether this great effuſion of water was cauſed by an obſtruction in the capillary arteries, which might make the finer part of the Serum ouze thro' their coats, or by a rupture in the lymphatics Mr Freind could not determine. The mother of the child brought it to Oxford for a ſhew, the account ſhe gave of it was, that ſhe had been three weeks in travail, and that at laſt ſhe was obliged to have the vagina ript for its paſſage, the child was two years and ſix weeks old, it could ſpeak a little, it could neither walk nor hold up its head, it was always merry, never ſubject to drowſineſs, pain in the head, want of appetite or indigeſtion; its ſight was ſomewhat dim, and its ſmelling but indifferent; it never had any illneſs only two or three days before it died, it was very much troubled with the gripes, and upon opening the Abdomen, the guts were found extremely ſwelled with wind, every thing elſe in both the lower cavities was in its natural ſtate. By comparing thoſe two Hydrocephali which Tulpius gives an account of, with this, we may ſee how different each of them is from it; his firſt was a boy five years old, the ſcull no larger than a man's, and contained only five pints of water, the brain had loſt all its ſhape and moſt of its ſubſtance, the relicks of which ſtuck to the ſcull; and all he ſays of the ſecond is, that it had a quart of water in one of the lateral ventricles.

[C] To ſet them in a true light.] We ſhall give the reader the ſubſtance of this (5), as of the former paper, the rather, becauſe we do not meet with either of them in the collection of our author's phyſical works. At Blackthorn in Oxfordſhire, five little girls were ſeized with frequent fits of barking like dogs, together with violent motions of the head, no convulſions were obſerved in their faces, only frequent diſtortions and oſcillations of the mouth, their pulſe was like that of perſons in health, but that towards the end of the fit it was ſomewhat weaker, the noiſe as it ſeemed to the Doctor did not reſemble the barking of dogs ſo much as their howling, only that the returns were more frequent with alternate ſobbings. The youngeſt of the girls was but ſix, and the eldeſt fifteen years of age. At intervals they had their reaſon and ſenſes entire, but it was not long ere one of them renewing her yelling would affect the reſt. At length their ſpirits being exhauſted, they would fall down like epileptics upon a couch, laid in the middle of the room to receive them, for ſome time they would lie quietly and decently, but upon a new irritation, or orgaſm of the ſpirits, they would beat their breaſts and other parts and diſcommode each other. July the twelfth 1700, Dr Friend viſited another family at Blackthorn, where a boy and three girls had been ſeized with convulſions ten weeks before without any apparent preceding cauſe, at firſt one of the girls was affected, and the firſt fit laſted for two hours, and the reſt, as the mother informed him, were ſo ſtruck with their ſiſter's diſorder, that in a few days they were alſo ſeized therewith. At his arrival they were all before the doors upwards of half an hour at play very briſk and unconcerned, and their complexion laudable from this diſorder, was produced no other bad effect than a little weakneſs and languor, their pulſe was in every reſpect regular. At length the eldeſt girl about fourteen years of age was ſeized as uſual, the only ſymptoms of its approach was a ſwelling of the ſtomach, which riſing gradually like a ball up the throat, ſet the muſcles of the larynx and head upon their wonted convulſions, this riſing was a certain and conſtant forerunner of the paroxyſm, and if they endeavoured to ſtop it, it broke out with the greater violence and continued the longer: the noiſe they made, which was inceſſant and diſagreeable, did not ſo much reſemble the barking or howling of dogs as had been given out as an uncouth kind of ſinging, conſiſting of three notes or tones repeated twice over, and ſucceeded by deep ſighs, which ended in a plain note that was much ſtronger and ſharper than any of the reſt. No words can deſcribe this ſong. At intervals ſhe varied her note, but when her ſpirits began to fail her motions and bawling increaſed, till being at length almoſt choaked, ſhe would expreſs a note or two and repreſs a little the ſhaking of her head, by this means recovering ſtrength ſhe would renew the ſame ditty, which was always accompanied with an alternate nodding of the head backwards and forwards, the muſcles of the neck were very tenſe and inflated, all the other parts of the body were free of convulſions. All the time of the paroxyſm ſhe had her ſenſes entire, and would ſit or walk as ſhe pleaſed, but could not utter one word, her complexion did not change, her eyes were immoveable as if dead, ſhe had no diſtortion but tate a work truly worthy of his own genius and learning; and of thoſe free, rational, and inconteſtible principles on which it was founded. He obſerved, that Sanctorius, Borelli, and Baglivi in Italy; and Pitcairne and Keil, here at home, had introduced a new and more certain method of enquiring after phyſical truths, than had been known to moſt of the writers in the preceding age (g). He therefore reſolved to apply this way of reaſoning, in order to ſet a certain ſubject of great importance, of daily uſe, and general concern about which the learned had been always divided, in ſuch a light as might put an end to diſputes, and open the eyes of mankind to a natural unperplexed theory, from whence, of conſequence, an effectual and ſatisfactory practice might be deduced. This he accompliſhed in his EMMENOLOGIA (h), which he gave to the publick when he was about twenty-eight years old; and tho' at firſt it met with ſome very conſiderable oppoſition, through the reverence that many entertained for old tho' unintelligible ſyſtems, and the prejudices with which others beheld the diſcoveries made by their contemporaries, as if their ſagacity and induſtry rather outraged than obliged ſuch as were of the ſame profeſſion; yet all candid and competent judges acknowledged it to be an excellent performance; in reſpect to which, it was hard to affirm whether the beauty of the ſtile, the elegant diſpoſition of the parts, or that wonderful ſuccinctneſs which detracted nothing from it's perſpicuity, ought to be more admired than the happy concurrence of learning and penetration, which enabled him ſo effectually to reconcile the judicious obſervations of the Antients, with thoſe diſcoveries in Anatomy which are indiſputably due to the Moderns. In ſhort, his plainneſs in ſtating the principal points in queſtion, his eaſy and ſatisfactory ſolutions, his wonderful application of all previous, concomitant, and ſucceeding circumſtances, to that ſimple principle, which, he ſuggeſts, quickly gained that acquieſcence in his doctrine (i) which it deſerved. Some years after a ſecond edition of this treatiſe appeared, which is likewiſe to be found in the general collection of his medical works [D]. In the ſucceeding year 1704, he was appointed in her mouth, which by reaſon of the contraction of the muſcles, was quite a Spaſmus cynicus; during the paroxyſm you could ſcarce feel a pulſe, and thus ſhe continued upwards of half an hour, tho' the brother and ſiſters ſtood by, yet they were not ſeized with the Spaſmus as uſual: they ſlept pretty well in the night, provided they were inclined to it when they lay down, but if not, they were ſeized with the paroxyſm till morning, at the ſame intervals, as in the day time; the girls of the other family were troubled with this diſorder about the beginning of the year, at which time their mouth was diſtorted and ſwelled, and a little after that theſe juſt mentioned had convulſions, the others were ſeized with epileptic fits, and a total deprivation of ſenſe; they would ſometimes, as if they were poſſeſſed beat upon their breaſts, and at other times run about, &c. but there was nothing of this the firſt three months, only the ſymptoms the Doctor has already deſcribed. The uncommon appearance, or long continuance of theſe ſymptoms, does not hinder concluding that this is a natural diſorder, for this Spaſmus agrees with all other convulſions, as ariſing from the irregular motions of the animal ſpirits within the nerves, variouſly contracting the muſcles according to the diſpoſition of the orgaſm; ſo that in this caſe nature does nothing but what is uſual in other kinds of convulſions, uſing the ſame organical motions here, as in the Chorea S. Viti, or in hyſteric diſorders, where the patient is at one time ſeized with laughing, at another with howling, and at another time beats upon the breaſt, all which is occaſioned by the various and involuntary motions of the muſcles; ſeeing therefore the muſcles of the larynx, head, hands, and feet, are equally diſpoſed to convulſions, whatever ſeems to be ſtrange and uncommon in theſe girls, is owing not ſo much to the nature of the ſymptoms as to the part affected.

EMMENOLOGIA, in quâ Fluxus muliebris menſtrui Phænomena, periodi, vitia, cum medendi methodo, ad rationes mechanicas exiguntur. Authore Johanne Friend, M B. Æd Chriſti Alumno. Lond. 1703. 8vo.

This treatiſe was tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr Thomas Dale, who dedicated it to the late Dr James Douglas.

Our author takes notice in his preface, that there are very few ſubjects on which Phyſicians had written more, or with leſs ſatisfaction to their readers than this, which he had undertaken to explain; the cauſe which he aſſigns for this, is their having recourſe to dark, abſtruſe, and unintelligible principles, neglecting thoſe that were plain and eaſy, as if their being more obvious made them leſs valuable. He acknowledges, that in his performance he has followed the principles and the example of the learned Bellini; and that one of the principal points he had in view, in compoſing this work, was the opening a clear road to the relief of one half of the human ſpecies, ſince almoſt all the diſeaſes incident to the ſex, either ariſe from, or are connected with, the ſubject of his book. As to the final cauſe of the catamenia, he agrees with Galen, and that it is to provide for the health of the mother and to provide nutriment for the embryo; with the ſame learned perſon he agrees with reſpect to the efficient cauſe and rejecting the influence of the moon, the operation of the Archeus, and the doctrine of ferments, as equally repugnant to truth and reaſon, he adheres to that of a Plethora. He proceeds next to explain this, to ſhew how and whence it ariſes, and why it is peculiar to the ſex. He demonſtrates the truth of this opinion from the ſtructure of the parts, and then goes on to ſhew, from mechanical principles, how this is effected; he then anſwers the objections that have been made to this doctrine; after this he proceeds to the periods, and gives a plain ſolution of thoſe difficulties that from other methods are inexplicable. The way being thus cleared, he enters on an explanation of the phænomena, then conſiders whatever is known to promote or to retard the menſes. He next points out the ſymptoms which ariſe from a ſuppreſſion, and eſtabliſhes the proper method of cure. In like manner he deſcribes the ſymptoms attending an immoderate flux, and the moſt effectual means of removing them, illuſtrating all that he delivers with the moſt exact and inſtructive hiſtories or caſes. He concludes with a diſcourſe on the virtue and operation of the uſual remedies, and from a retroſpective view of the whole makes it evident, that his theory is founded in truth and the operations of nature, and is not the fruit of a happy invention, and the power of explaining in a plauſible manner principles that have no foundation but in the mind of the contriver. Such is the deſign and diſtribution of this excellent work.

Soon after the publication of this treatiſe, our author's opinion that the Menſes are occaſioned by a Plethora, was attacked by Dr Thomas Snellen, or Snellenus a Dutch Chymiſt (6), who aſcribes that purgation to a ferment. He wrote with much warmth, or rather rudeneſs, and, as the ingenious author of the hiſtorical preface to Dr Freind's Medical Works, obſerves, uſed rather the language of Billinſgate, than the Schools, in his performance. In 1712, Peter Freſart pointed to read chymical lectures in the Univerſity, which he performed with great applauſe, the novelty and perſpicuity of his lectures, attracting and giving the higheſt ſatisfaction to a numerous audience (k). In 1705, he attended the famous Earl of Peterborough in his Spaniſh expedition, and was the companion of his fatigues, in which, as Phyſician to the army, he had no ſmall ſhare for very near two years together; and, in his return home through Italy, he made a tour to Rome, as well for the ſake of ſeeing the celebrated antiquities of that famous city, as for the pleaſure of viſiting and converſing with Baglivi and Lanciſi, men whom their ſkill in phyſick, and their excellent writings, had juſtly merited reſpect and renown (l). On his coming back to England, he found the character of his illuſtrious patron very rudely treated; and, out of a ſpirit of juſtice and gratitude, fart, a Phyſician of Liege, publiſhed an Emmenologia, in which he rejects our author's notion, as well as that of a ferment, and aſſerts the cauſe of the Menſes to be Sal evectum purgaminis uterini in vaſis collecti, which, as the author before mentioned rightly remarks, is in reality ſaying nothing, and therefore it is impoſſible that there ſhould be any thing ſaid in anſwer to it. Since Dr Friend's death, Dr Thomas Simſon, Chandos Profeſſor of Phyſick and Anatomy in the Univerſity of St Andrew's, in his Syſtem of the womb: with a particular account of the Menſes independent of a Plethora; to which are ſubjoined a few obſervations relating to cold and its effects upon the body, printed at London 1730. in 8vo. has declared againſt the doctrine of a Plethora, and aſſigns another cauſe of it. Monſieur Tellier the younger, Phyſician at Peronne, in his Reflections Critiques ſur l'Emmenologia de Mr Freind, printed at Paris 1730, recommends our author's treatiſe on account of its perſpicuity, ſtrength of argument, and the uſeful obſervations contained in it, and owns that the Plethora contributes not a little to this purgation; but differs with Dr Friend among other points, in this, that the latter ſuppoſes the flux to be occaſioned by the rupture of the capillary veſſels, whereas Monſieur Tellier affirms it to be performed by the influx of the blood into the lymphatic veſſels, or as Helvetius calls them the lymphatic arteries. But Dr Wigan obſerves, that tho' Dr Friend often ſpeaks of the rupture of the veſſels, yet we are not to imagine that he meant a preternatural or violent breaking of them, ſince he expreſsly ſays, 'that 'the orifices of the veſſels open upon the impulſe of 'the blood.' Per impulſum ſanguinis, eorum orificia diſſilere; conſidered in this light, Dr Wigan does not perceive any great difference between the theories of our author and Monſieur Tellier. He acknowledges that Freſart, Simſon, and Tellier, have raiſed ſome difficulties againſt Dr Freind's doctrine, which deſerve to be ſolved, and that the Doctor might be miſtaken in ſome points of leſs importance, and advanced ſome things in this treatiſe not altogether conſiſtent with what he wrote afterwards in his riper years; and he aſſures us, that the Doctor deſigned in the ſecond edition publiſhed at London, to have corrected ſome things, added others, and anſwered ſome objections, but was prevented by buſineſs from executing that deſign. But Dr Wigan thinks that none of the objections are of ſuch weight, but that the ſubſtance of his doctrine of a Plethora ſtill ſtands firm.

In 1735, there was publiſhed an academical exercitation upon Dr Friend's Emmenologia, under the following title, Exercitatio Academica ad Emmenologiam Freindianam: quâ fundamenti loco ſuppoſitæ quædam Doctrinæ modeſte examinantur. Præſide Jo. Friderico Herelio, Medicinæ Doctore & Phyſico Reipublicæ Norinbergenſis, deſignato placidæ Eruditorum diſcuſſioni A. D. Martii CIↃ. IↃCC XXXV. ſubjicienda, reſpondente Jo. Philippo Zellmano Hertzbergæ Hannoverano: Halæ Magdeburgicæ in 4to. p. 26. Dr Herelius in his preface obſerves, that tho' a great many foreigners as well as Engliſh extol Dr Freind's book, as a compleat work, and adhere to his doctrine, yet that when he ſtudied phyſic under Dr John Henry Schulze, he perceived many reaſons which weakened the authority of that book, and ſhewed its inſufficiency both in theory and practice. Theſe reflections were confirmed by Monſieur Tellier's treatiſe abovementioned, upon which Dr Herelius tranſlated it into Latin, and wrote notes upon it, and deſigned to publiſh his tranſlation with an appendix, containing further animadverſions upon Dr Freind's Emmenologia, but was prevented for the preſent from executing this deſign by his travels. However he committed the Exercitation abovementioned to Dr Schulze in order to be publiſhed, which was accordingly done.

It contains five Theſes which the author amply explains and illuſtrates, and which are as follow. I. Freindi Syſtema non ſuppeditat ullam rationem, cur fluxus menſtruus ſit periodicus, & non perpetuus. II. Freindius nihil agit, quando ſolis humanis fœminis purgationes uterinas vindicatum it, ideoque uteri ſitum perpendicularem in mulieribus, in quadrupedibus horizontalem urget. III. Freindius Plethorâ ſuâ quam a Galeno adoptat, rem minimè expedit, nec alii expedient, quam diu nihil aliud niſi Plethoræ imminuendæ viam interpretantur menſtruæ evacuationis negotium. IV. Freindius nullam rationem indicavit, cur ſuppoſitâ Plethora vim potius in vaſa capillaria, uſque ad diſruptionem eorum, edat, quam majores truncos, quos tamen prius debet ingredi, antequam ad capillares perveniat. V. Freindius contendit, quod in gravidis menſtrua ceſſent, quia ſanguis alendo fœtui inſumitur. Id ſi verum eſt, concipi non poteſt, cur fœmina paupercula, laborioſa, & non plethorica, non diutius uterum gerat, aut minores fœtus excludat, quam fœmina ſanguine ad modulum Freindianæ Hypotheſeos abundans, tantamque abundantiam ſuo fœtui impendens.

It is viſible enough from the heads of theſe diſcourſes, that Dr Herelius had either read our author's diſcourſe with little attention, or had the misfortune not to comprehend his meaning. For with reſpect to the firſt, the account which Dr Freind has given of a Plethora, the conſequences of it in a human body, and the different ſtructure of the parts in women, very clearly explains, not only why they are ſubject to this flux, but alſo why they are not always ſubject to it. The ſecond aſſertion is a bare begging of the queſtion, and if he had been well acquainted with Natural Hiſtory, he would have known that there are ſome exceptions to that general rule, which very plainly prove the reaſon aſſigned by Dr Freind to have very great weight. What he affirms in the third place, will not affect the candid reader's judgment in any degree, when he is informed that the beſt Phyſicians and Anatomiſts are now of a contrary opinion. His fourth objection proceeds from a miſtake of Dr Freind's meaning, who plainly enough declares that he did not intend a preternatural breaking or ſeparation of the veſſels, but their yielding to an impinging force, in conſequence of their natural ſtructure, which is the plain ſolution of his doubt. The laſt is the leaſt founded objection of them all, ſince there is nothing more commonly known, than that the nutriment depends as much on the quality as the quantity of the aliment; and therefore there is no reaſon in the world, why ſtrong women ſhould go longer with their children, much leſs that their offspring ſhould be weaker than the children of thoſe who have a more delicate conſtitution. But after all theſe objections, all this oppoſition, and not a little ill uſage, if the reader will conſult the learned Boerhaave (7), he will find the truth of Cicero's maxim, that the credit of opinion laſts but for a day, whereas truth rightly ſtated makes its paſſage in time, and remains eſtabliſhed for ever. This has been the caſe of our author's doctrine which is now generally received, and received upon the arguments which he advanced, tho' we often find them mentioned without the leaſt notice taken of him; ſo certain it is, that both envy and gratitude are ſhort lived, in compariſon of truth and experience.

gratitude, he drew his pen in the defence of that brave man, whoſe actions he is truly ſaid to have vindicated, with the ſame ſpirit and fire with which they were performed (m). It is no wonder therefore, that the Doctor's book met with the ſame fate that the Earl's conduct had done; and, that as the ſurprizing ſucceſſes of the latter were attributed to a happy temerity, ſo the detail given by the former, was, in ſpite of all the evidence he produced, conſidered as abſolutely incredible, even by thoſe who confeſſed that nothing could be written with more ſprightly eloquence, or a more plauſible appearance of truth (n). As time has now worn out all prejudices and prepoſſeſſions, ſo we may have leave to ſay, without giving much offence to any party, that the Doctor's hiſtory, however ſhort, may be eſteemed as correct and as perfect a piece, as any thing that ever appeared of the kind; and no doubt, had it been written in favour of any of their Generals, and publiſhed in a neighbouring country, it would have been extolled to the ſkies, compared to the moſt finiſhed writings of the Antients, and treated as a work that deſerved to be univerſally read, and as univerſally admired (o). But with us, things of this kind are run down by a party-ſpirit when they are new, and buried in oblivion when they are old; while, at the ſame time, we do all the juſtice imaginable to the writings of foreigners, whether new or old; which is indeed as reaſonable as the other practice is abſurd. What truth there is in theſe reflections, and what merit in that work of our author which occaſioned them, we ſhall take occaſion to explain in the notes [E]. It is now time to return to the hiſtorical thread of our article. He

[E] To explain in the notes.] The title of our author's work at large, runs in the following words.

An Account of the Earl of PETERBOROW's Conduct in SPAIN, chiefly ſince the raiſing the Siege of Barcelona, 1706; to which is added, The Campaign of Valencia. With original Papers. Lond. 1707, 8vo.

He dedicated this book to his patron Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough and Monmouth; and it is generally reported, that he gave the ſtrongeſt teſtimony a man could do, of his being fully informed, and thoroughly perſwaded, of the facts that are contained in the whole ſeries of his relation (8). The character we have given it in the text, requires that ſomething farther ſhould be ſaid of it here. There are ſome places that ſeem fated to be always famous, and one would think that Saguntum was of the number; the ſiege of that place, in early times, has been deſcribed by maſterly pens; we will leave to the reader's own judgment this account of the ſurprizal of it by the Earl of Peterborough, which fell from the pen of Dr Freind (9).

(9) An account of the Earl of Peterborough's conduct in Spain, chiefly ſince the raiſing the ſiege of Barcelona, 1706; to which is added, the campaign of Valencia. Lond. 1707, 8vo. p. 254.

'The Duke of Arcos, who commanded for the 'Duke of Anjou (as Philip the Fifth was then ſtiled 'by the Allies), kept the main of his army to the right 'of Valencia, towards a place called Torrente; but 'ſent Brigadier Mahoni, with a detachment of horſe, 'to ſecure the ſtrongeſt paſs in the country, over a 'river which was juſt under the walls of Molviedro, 'the antient Saguntum ſo famous in the Roman Hiſtory. This place, which is about four leagues diſtant from Valencia, my Lord muſt paſs, for no other 'way was practicable. All the officers were of opinion, 'that his Lordſhip muſt come to a full ſtop here, having no artillery, no miners, no preparations to take a 'walled town; where, beſides numerous inhabitants, 'all armed and zealous for the Duke of Anjou, there 'was a very good General officer, and near eight hundred men, near half of them being Mahoni's regiment of Iriſh dragoons. What made our circumſtances the more deſperate in appearance, this place 'was for us moſt unfortunately ſituated, becauſe, after 'paſſing the river, there was a plain of two leagues to 'a Carthuſian convent, where the enemy, to all advantage, might make uſe of their horſe, which were 'excellent, and double in number to ours. The Earl 'of Peterborough gave the officers hopes, that what he 'could not do by force, he did not fear but to compaſs by art; and told them, that if he could but prevail to get Mahoni to come out to ſpeak with him, 'he was almoſt confident of getting immediate poſſeſſion of the town, and the opportunity of paſſing the 'plains without oppoſition.

'Molviedro lies about a league from the ſea, the 'greateſt part of the town upon a flat, except the ſide 'riſing towards the caſtle, which ſtands on a high hill. 'On the right runs a long ridge of mountains; but, a 'little above cannon-ſhot from the place, there is, towards the country, a little round hill diſtinct by itſelf: 'our troops came towards the town by a great deſcent, 'and the way towards the paſs was behind the round 'riſing ground, turning ſhort on the left to the river. 'The place of the interview intended by his Lordſhip, 'was on the ſide of this little riſing ground next Molviedro, behind which my Lord had ſtolen ſome of 'his troops towards the paſs, and brought them within 'view of the town; the reſt were at the ſame time 'marching on purpoſe to make a ſhew, and, coming 'down the hills, the ſoldiers edging, as it were, the 'country people on that ſide where they could be ſeen. 'The few field-pieces we had were diſpoſed to the like 'advantage, and every thing was ſet in a ſort of perſpective to the place of the interview.

'The ſcene being thus prepared, the Earl of Peterborough ſent an officer and trumpet into the town to 'Mahoni, to let him know that it ſhould not be his 'fault if the country was expoſed to unneceſſary hardſhips and ruin, it being the intereſt of both ſides to 'prevent it, ſince each had a chance to be maſter of it: 'that beſides, he ſhould be glad to have an interview 'with a countryman of ſo good a reputation; that ſuch 'a conference could have no ill conſequence, and 'might perhaps have ſome good effects; and that he 'was ready to meet him, with ten or twelve horſe, in 'any convenient place betwixt his troops and the town. 'My Lord had the more hopes of ſucceeding in this 'project, ſince, that beſides in theſe conferences, 'every body preſumes to make his own advantage; he 'thought it might be reaſonable enough, that Mahoni 'ſhould be glad of a capitulation, and an opportunity 'to join his horſe with thoſe of the Duke of Arcos, in 'order to prevent our paſſing the plains towards the 'Carthuſian convent.

'The Condé de las Torres, the beſt officer in Spain, 'but by many thought no enemy to the Houſe of Auſtria, was luckily recalled, upon pretended faults 'found in his conduct, in relation to the ſiege of St Mattheo; ſo that the Earl of Peterborough met an 'advantage he well improved, a General juſt come to 'an army, a man of great quality, but no ſoldier of 'ſervice. Mahoni returned an officer with this compliment, that he would immediately wait upon the 'Earl of Peterborough, upon his Lordſhip's parole for 'his ſecurity, being deſirous to ſhew him any proper 'reſpect, and to concert meaſures with him, that 'might prevent any diſorders but thoſe which were inevitable in war. This gentleman being related to 'the late Counteſs of Peterborough, of the Thomond 'family, was the more inclined to pay any civility to 'his Lordſhip. He came, with ſome of the principal 'officers of the Spaniſh forces, to the place where his 'Lordſhip received him, as the moſt proper to make 'an advantageous ſhew of his ſtrength; and, after he 'was entertained upon a ſubject which had no effect, 'my Lord's ſecond deſign was more ſucceſsful.

'It was not improper for my Lord to offer the moſt 'preſſing motives, to incline him to take part with 'King Charles the Third, and to ſupport them with 'the greateſt offers; which were refuſed upon the 'principles of honour, and the impoſſibility of leaving 'a ſervice to which he was engaged, for any advantages. But, as all paſt with great compliments, the

He was created Doctor of Phyſick by diploma, July the twelfth 1707 (p); his reputation every day increaſing, in proportion as the true ſenſe and real merit of his writings became better known. In 1709, he publiſhed his Chemical Lectures, read at Oxford five years before; in which he rendered the ſame ſervice to that ſcience, that he had before done to Phyſick,

'Earl of Peterborough, to ſhew how ſenſible he was 'of his confidence in coming to him, told him, that 'he was willing to return his marks of eſteem, with 'what he conceived he would be well pleaſed with, 'and which might prevent likewiſe ſome unavoidable 'cruelties very much againſt his inclination. The 'Spaniards, ſaid he, have uſed ſuch ſeverities and 'cruelties at Villa Real, as will oblige me to retaliate. 'I am willing to ſpare a town that is under your pro'tection: I know you cannot pretend to defend it 'with the horſe you have, which will be ſo much more 'uſeful in another place, if joined with the Duke of 'Arcos, to obſtruct my paſſing the plains of Valencia. 'I am confident you will ſoon quit Molviedro, which 'I can as little prevent as you can hinder me from tak'ing the town. The inhabitants then muſt be expoſed 'to the utmoſt miſeries; and I can no otherwiſe pre'vent it, but by being tied by a capitulation, which 'I am willing to give you, if I had the pretence of the 'immediate ſurrender of the place this very night. 'Some caſes are ſo apparent, that I need not diſſemble: 'I know you will immediately ſend to the Duke of 'Arcos, to march to the Carthuſian convent, and meet 'him there with the body of horſe under your com'mand. My Lord, with a pretended frankneſs, of'fered him, if he pleaſed, to let him ſee his troops, 'and the artillery which he had; and, beſides, told 'him, what he could bring from the ſea.

'Mahoni ſeemed almoſt to confeſs, that his part 'was to ſtrengthen the Duke of Arcos with his horſe; 'and laughing, ſaid to my Lord, I may ſay ſo to your 'Lordſhip, who is ſenſible of it, but cannot prevent it. 'The Brigadier, however, ſeemed to be very well 'pleaſed with my Lord's openneſs, and told his Lord'ſhip, that he would go back into the town, and ſend 'an anſwer in half an hour. The capitulation was a'greed upon, and the anſwer came by the chief of the 'Spaniſh officers, with whom my Lord had occaſion 'to talk, and to feel his pulſe; but finding no proba'bility of prevailing on him to change ſides, he con'trived all he could, and not without ſucceſs, to give 'him jealouſies of Mahoni.

'Mahoni, who of his ſide managed this matter with 'a great deal of dexterity, and very much like an of'ficer (had his advices been followed) in his capitula'tion, had agreed not to quit the place till about one 'at night; neither was the Earl of Peterborough to 'paſs the river till that hour. This was to get time 'for the Duke of Arcos, to have made the march to 'the plains; and the Brigadier allowed himſelf the 'time before day-break, to have gained the ſame poſt. 'But the Earl of Peterborough ſo increaſed the jealouſy 'betwixt the Spaniſh officers and Mahoni, that the 'latter was forced to ſend to my Lord, to let him 'know that his Lordſhip was obliged, in honour to 'the moſt ſincere and punctual compliance with his 'capitulation; and confeſſed to him, that he was in 'danger from the Spaniſh troops, even for his perſon, 'if there were not the greateſt aſſurances and evidences 'given of the performance of his word.

'I am ſatisfied nothing would have engaged the 'Earl of Peterborough to the leaſt breach of faith, nor 'could any conſideration have juſtified his Lordſhip in 'going over the paſs of the river till the appointed 'time, the enemy upon agreement having withdrawn 'their dragoons which defended the intrenchments on 'the other ſide. But my Lord having over-heard the 'neighing of horſes in the night, took it for granted 'that ſome part of the troops had evacuated the town; 'and that if the noiſe of firing was heard, it might 'cauſe a jealouſy that they were attacked, and ſo pro'duce the deſired effects of his plot upon the Duke of 'Arcos, if any of the Spaniſh officers ſhould arrive in 'the enemy's camp perſuaded of an ill deſign in Ma'honi.

'Upon this, my Lord ordered a party of men a 'little up the river, with directions to make diſcharges 'that might reſemble an engagement of ſmall parties. 'Mahoni ſent immediately to my Lord, to let him 'know that whatever umbrage was given, he depended 'upon his word, and would never believe there could 'be of his ſide any foul play. Mahoni was ſo preſſed, 'that many of his officers ſollicited his immediate 'march; but his aim was not to move till one o'clock, 'to give time to the Duke of Arcos; and the point 'my Lord was labouring, was to improve the ſuſpi'cions and jealouſies of the Spaniards. He thought 'the meſſage from Mahoni gave him a good occaſion, 'and therefore ſent back an officer with this ſeeming 'compliment, which ſucceeded to his wiſh, and entire'ly accompliſhed what he aimed at. My Lord begged 'of Mahoni to conſent, that, for his ſecurity from any 'accident, he might order a regiment of dragoons to 'paſs the river, and wait the hour appointed under the 'walls of the town; that his own officers might ac'company them, and ſend them to the proper place, 'his Lordſhip having ordered two thirds of the officers 'to come into the town, and put themſelves into his 'hands as hoſtages, for the exact and honourable per'formance of all articles.

'Upon the march of theſe troops towards the town, 'moſt of the Spaniſh officers, with the detachments 'they commanded, marched ſeparately towards the 'Duke of Arcos; and ſome left their men, to give 'their General an account of what had paſt. My Lord, 'as his officers conceived, had two inſuperable difficul'ties; the one, to get poſſeſſion of Molviedro, and ſe'cure the paſs on the river; the other, to paſs the two 'leagues of the plains, which were betwixt Molviedro 'and Valencia, before ſo good and ſo ſtrong a body of 'horſe. My Lord was in hopes, if he ſucceeded in 'one, to compaſs the other; and to that end, as ſoon 'as he found the treaty in a fair way, he choſe two 'Iriſh dragoons out of Zinzendorf's regiment, which 'he well inſtructed, and well paid, and ſent imme'diately as deſerters to the Duke of Arcos. He pro'miſed to make them officers if they ſucceeded, which 'was punctually made good to one, who had well de'ſerved it, the other dying ſoon after his return. They 'were to diſcover to the Duke of Arcos, that, being 'hid under the rocks of the hill where they were drink'ing a glaſs of wine, they had heard all the diſcourſe 'betwixt the Earl and Mahoni; that they ſaw five thou'ſand piſtoles delivered; and that Mahoni was to be a 'Major-General upon the Engliſh and Spaniſh eſtabliſh'ment, and to command a body of ten thouſand Iriſh 'Catholicks, which were raiſing for the ſervice of King 'Charles. They agreed with the Duke of Arcos, to 'have no reward, if he were not ſoon made ſenſible of 'the truth of what they ſaid by Mahoni himſelf, ſince 'they were perſwaded that he would quickly ſend, to 'engage the Duke of Arcos to march immediately, with 'the whole army, towards the Carthuſian convent, 'under pretence of joining with his horſe, in order to 'prevent the Earl of Peterborough from paſſing the 'plains of Molviedro; but that whereas this march 'muſt be made in the night, all matters were ſo agreed 'and contrived betwixt the Earl and Mahoni, and the 'troops ſo placed, that he muſt fall into the ambuſhes 'deſigned, and run great hazards of an entire de'feat.

'It fell out, that ſoon after theſe ſpies had given 'this account to the Duke of Arcos, Mahoni's Aid de 'Camp arrived, with propoſals exactly to the ſame 'purpoſe; the Spaniſh General, whoſe ſuſpicions were 'confirmed, by the jealouſies the Earl of Peterborough 'had raiſed in ſeveral of the Spaniſh officers that were 'come from Molviedro to him, inſtead of complying 'with the immediate march propoſed by Mahoni, re'moved his camp quite the contrary way. Mahoni, 'with his horſe, expected the whole army at the Car'thuſian convent, till the approach of the Earl of Pe'terborough made him retire to the Duke of Arcos's 'camp; as ſoon as he arrived, he was ſecured by that 'General, and ſent to Madrid. I muſt add here, that 'when Mahoni came to tell his ſtory at Court, he was 'made a Major-General, and the Duke of Arcos was 'recalled.'

Phyſick, by reducing it from fictitious and fabulous, to rational and real principles (q). This ſmall work of his, for ſmall it is in bulk, however weighty in it's contents, gave as much ſatisfaction to all judicious readers, as the ſame lectures, when read, did to the learned audience which attended them. They were ſo much the more agreeable, to the lovers of undiſguiſed truth, and of knowledge capable of being reduced to practice, as hardly any thing of the ſame nature had appeared; ſo that this ſcience was left in the worſt hands, and, from their ill management, had contracted ſtains that could be no other way wiped out, but by ſhewing that they were not in the art, but in the abuſe of it (r). In fine, his lectures were clear, and yet very conciſe, plain, and perſpicuous, tho' deduced from mathematical principles, and in which many curious and inſtructive diſquiſitions were made, of a philoſophical nature, without the leaſt perplexity or confuſion. It was no wonder, therefore, that a performance ſo much wanted, and of ſuch general uſe, ſhould meet with general eſteem [F]. But as theſe chymical lectures were written, read, and publiſhed in Latin; ſo when they came to the view of the learned Philoſophers in Germany, the novelty of the doctrine they contained alarmed ſuch as were zealous for the old principles, and of that learning which was built upon them, and of which they looked upon themſelves as in full poſſeſſion. The authors therefore of a celebrated Literary Journal, prefixed, to their account of this treatiſe, a cenſure of it (s), in which they were pleaſed to treat the principles of the Newtonian Philoſophy as figments, and the method of arguing made uſe of in the lectures as abſurd; becauſe, in their opinion, it had a tendency to introduce again occult qualities in Philoſophy. To this unfair and unfounded charge, an anſwer was given by Dr Freind, which was publiſhed in Latin in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (t), and afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh [G]. In 1712, he attended his Grace the Duke of Ormond into Prælectiones Chymicæ: in quibus omnes fere operationes chymicæ ad vera principia & ipſius naturæ leges rediguntur; Anno 1704. Oxonii in Muſæo Aſhmoleano habitæ. A Johanne Freind, M. D. Æd. Chriſt. Alumn. Lond. 1709. 8vo. That is, Chymical Lectures, in which almoſt all the operations of Chymiſtry are reduced to their true principles, and the laws of nature. Read in the Muſeum at Oxford, 1704.

Theſe lectures are dedicated to Sir Iſaac Newton, and are nine in number, beſides three tables. In the firſt lecture, after having obſerved the great defect of all chymical writers, in the theory of Chymiſtry, he proceeds to take notice, that no perſon had contributed more to the improvement of this art, than Mr Boyle, who did not ſo much lay new foundations of it, as deſtroy the old ones; and tho' he left ſufficient materials from whence to deduce a true explication of things, yet his explications themſelves are very defective. As to the way of deducing the operations in Chymiſtry, from the true mechanical principles, this he aſcribes to Dr John Keil, as its firſt diſcoverer. Our author's deſign is, from theſe principles, to diſcourſe ſomewhat largely upon ſuch things, as tend moſt to the illuſtration of the nature of Chymiſtry, and to explain, as clearly as he can, its principal operations. This method he thought by far the moſt proper to be uſed, becauſe it is the moſt natural and ſimple; and alſo, becauſe he found by experience, that the common confuſed courſes were of ſuch little advantage, as not to leave the leaſt tolerable idea of Chymiſtry, upon the minds of thoſe who hear them. Upon this account, he proceeds in the following method. Firſt, to explain all the operations in their natural order, and to ſhew by what law of mechaniſm they are produced, and to what uſes and purpoſes they are principally ſubſervient. Secondly, to ſhew all the ways in which they either are, or may be performed. Thirdly, to record all the experiments relating to this ſubject, under their proper heads, and to reduce them to the general theory. It is impoſſible to enter into a cloſer analyſis of this work, our author having written ſo conciſely, that it is ſimply impoſſible to give his meaning, or any thing like it, in fewer words. We may be well aſſured, that to write perſpicuouſly, and to bring all he was to deliver on ſuch a variety of ſubjects, in which almoſt every thing he had to ſay was entirely new, muſt have coſt him a great deal of pains, which, however, he willingly underwent for the information of mankind, by the ſubverſion of the antient errors, and opening a new road to truth.

[G] Tranſlated into Engliſh.] We find it added by way of appendix, to the ſecond edition of our author's book, in Latin, and to the Engliſh tranſlation of it. A ſhort extract will be acceptable to the reader, as it will be ſufficient to give him a juſt notion, both of the cenſure and the reply.

The publiſhers of the Leipſick Tranſactions, ſays the Doctor, without making any objection to the experiments themſelves, or ſhewing any falſe reaſonings in the manner of explaining them, attack ſome of the principles, upon which the explication is founded, and this they do before they give any account of the treatiſe itſelf, with a deſign to raiſe a prejudice againſt it: a method ſurely very new, and very unfair, in theſe retailers of learning, who pretend only to give a naked and impartial relation of what is contained in books, and to leave the readers at liberty to judge for themſelves. The grounds upon which I proceeded, in my Theory of Chymiſtry, were the principles and method of reaſoning introduced by the incomparable Sir Iſaac Newton, whoſe concluſions in Philoſophy are as demonſtrative, as his diſcoveries are ſurpriſing. And ſince the editors ſeem to have no true notion of his method, which is the only one by which natural knowledge can be advanced, I will here endeavour to explain it to them; I ſhall ſhew that it is to this we owe the late great improvements in Philoſophy; that the objections they produce againſt it, ariſe from their wrong apprehenſions of it, that the ſame objections are of much more force, againſt their own principles, than thoſe of Sir Iſaac Newton; and if, from what I have to offer upon theſe points, the reader be convinced, that the principles upon which my lectures are founded, are ſufficiently juſtified and confirmed, I hope he will the eaſier be inclined to believe that they are rightly applied, which the editors, by their ſilence in this point, ſeem to confeſs.

It has been the conſtant method of the Carteſians, and of thoſe too, for the moſt part, who call themſelves mechanical Philoſophers, to aſſume an hypotheſis, or figment, which has no foundation any where, but in the imagination only; and then, in general terms, to tell us how every thing in nature may be produced, according to that hypotheſis, without being able to give a clear and ſatisfactory account of one ſingle appearance. Nothing of this kind can be charged upon Sir Iſaac Newton, he aſſumes nothing but obſervations and experiments, which are evident to the ſenſe of all mankind; and from thence he deduces demonſtrative concluſions, and then again, by the aſſiſtance of theſe concluſions, he explains the cauſes of many phænomena in nature. Thus it is evident, by undoubted obſervations, that the planets move in ellipſes round the ſun, and deſcribe areas always proportional to the times; and that the ſatellites do the ſame, in reſpect of their primary planets: from this he clearly demonſtrates, that all the planets have into Flanders as his Phyſician (u), and remained abroad the beſt part of a year. He had been a little before his departure admitted a Member of the Royal Society (w), which afforded him the honour and the happineſs of converſing with Sir Iſaac Newton, Dr Halley, Dr Keil, and ſeveral other eminent perſons, whoſe great knowledge, and wonderful diſcoveries, reflected glory on their country. To them alſo Dr Freind was ſo much the more agreeable, as the learning he drew from books, had been cultivated and improved, after the

have a tendency towards the ſun, and the ſatellites towards the planets, which they attend, that this tendency decreaſes in a duplicate proportion of their diſtance; that moreover, there is an univerſal tendency of matter to matter, and that the tendency of the moon towards the earth, is the very ſame with the force of gravity, and is the cauſe of the flux and reflux of the ſea. This tendency, or attraction, ſome indeed may, if they pleaſe, term an occult quality, and I believe it will always remain ſo, for I cannot find that the greateſt Philoſopher among the editors will undertake to ſhew how it may be produced mechanically.

But then, however occult it be, as to its cauſe, it cannot be called what their principles are own'd to be, an hypotheſis or figment; ſince the exiſtence of it is as undeniably proved, as that of the ſun, or the planets. If then there be ſuch a principle, which demonſtrably belongs to matter, what reaſon can there be why we may not make uſe of it in Philoſophy? and ſhew how it is the real and adequate cauſe of a great many effects which we daily obſerve. So likewiſe, by the moſt evident experiments and obſervations, Sir Iſaac Newton has found the different refrangibility of the rays of light, and by that means has diſcovered ſuch wonderful properties of light and colours, that all the attempts which have been made, in this part of Optics before, are trifling, in compariſon of his performance.

The true way certainly of proceeding in theſe philoſophical enquiries, is, firſt to find out, by many and undoubted experiments, the properties of bodies, and then, without any farther ſearch into the cauſe of ſuch properties, which perhaps are inſearchable, to explain the particular phenomena which depend upon them. By this method Archimedes diſcovered the principles of Mechanics, and the laws of Hydroſtatics, without determining the cauſe of gravity and fluidity. He aſſumes ſuch facts as are evident to obſervation and ſenſe, and from thence he demonſtrates the principles of thoſe ſciences. So likewiſe, Galilæo, tho' he knew no hypotheſis which explained the cauſe of gravity, did, notwithſtanding, find out the laws of acceleration in heavy bodies, the motion of projectils, and the doctrine of pendulums: and, in a word, laid a foundation for all the diſcoveries which have been made in natural knowledge ſince his time. Have not the Mathematicians made great advancements in the ſcience of Optics, by aſſuming two principles of reflection and refraction, which are evident to experience, tho' the real cauſe of theſe two principles, is ſtill unknown to moſt of them? According to the principles of our philoſophical editors, all theſe great and noble diſcoveries muſt be rejected, becauſe they are founded upon ſuch properties of bodies as have unknown cauſes, and cannot be explained without admitting occult qualities, which confound the principles of true Philoſophy, and reduce it to its antient chaos.

Wolfius, in his Aerometria, has aſſumed for a principle, the gravity of the air; and from thence has deduced the reaſon of many phænomena in nature, but he has no where given us a mechanical account of the cauſe of this gravity; and, I believe, never any hypotheſis has been yet produced to explain it, but what Wolfius himſelf could eaſily demonſtrate to be falſe. Will the editors object to him, that he has introduced an occult quality into Natural Philoſophy. Indeed, Sir Iſaac Newton has gone farther towards explaining the cauſe of gravity, which we feel and obſerve, than any one beſides, for he has ſhewn that it ariſes from the principle of attraction, which all matter has to matter. Such a principle of attraction they are pleaſed to call a figment, but how any thing ſhould be a figment which really exiſts, is paſt comprehenſion. Sir Iſaac Newton has undeniably proved one ſpecies of attraction to be diffuſed through the whole planetary ſyſtems, and I have not heard that any objections of the leaſt weight have been raiſed againſt his demonſtrations.

I have more experiments to prove the exiſtence of this other kind of attraction, which decreaſes in a greater proportion than the ſquares of the diſtance, and that it exerts itſelf vigorouſly in the minute particles of matter, than Wolfius has to prove the gravity of the air. Why then muſt we reckon the principles upon which the reaſoning is founded, more a figment in one caſe than in the other? We find by obſervation that the particles of light which flow from the ſun, the fixed ſtars, or even our terreſtrial fires, are all equally attracted towards the edges of ſolid bodies, and whereever there is action, there muſt be re-action, and therefore it may be concluded that this principle is really exiſtent, and equally diffuſed through all the matter of the univerſe. And tho' it may be inherent equally in all matter, yet Mr Keil has demonſtrated, that it muſt of neceſſity produce the moſt ſenſible effects in the ſmalleſt bodies.

But they ſay, if we once allow ſuch a liberty of feigning, others will invent other occult qualities, and ſo, by degrees, we ſhall return to the old refuge for ignorance: as if there be an attractive force or ſympathy, why not likewiſe an antipathy, or an antiperiſtaſis, and qualities emitted by way of ſpecies: we may likewiſe allow of the attractive funicles of Linus, and the variation of extenſion in the ſame manner. If there be an attractive force? 'Tis clear and demonſtrable that there is ſuch a force. This is not an hypotheſis invented to ſolve other phænomena, but is itſelf a phænomenon in nature, and therefore tho' theſe editors may think they have urged the defenders of it to an abſurdity, yet the foregoing argument, in which they ſeem to place ſo much confidence, has really no more in it than this: If we allow of one principle, which by undoubted experience we are ſure exiſts in nature, therefore we ought upon the ſame account, to admit of others which do not exiſt: for inſtance, if we allow of gravity, which by experience we find to be in all bodies, tho' we know not the reaſon of it, therefore we muſt acquieſce in all the fictions and fancies of Philoſophers, of which we have no experience, and for which no reaſon can be aſſigned. If this be a mathematical way of reaſoning, I muſt confeſs we had better return to any old refuge of ignorance, than allow of ſuch a liberty of arguing.

But the great objection againſt the principle of attraction is, that there can be no mechanical reaſon given for it. Muſt we then allow of nothing, but what we can give a reaſon for? have ever any of them yet given a true and mechanical account of the elaſticity of the air? which however, is acknowledged by all Philoſophers, and ſeveral phænomena are owned to be rationally ſolved by it. We don't deny but a clock maker may underſtand the mechaniſm of a clock or watch, tho' he knows nothing of the nature of gravity, or elaſticity, which are the principles that ſet all the wheels in motion: and for the ſame reaſon, why may not he be allowed to know the mechanical operations of nature, who has diſcovered the ſpring which actuates all the bodies in the univerſe, and preſerves them in their orders and motions, and can give an account how it mechanically produces each particular phænomena, tho' at the ſame time he is intirely ignorant as to the cauſe of that firſt ſpring, upon which they all depend? however, if the editors have a mind to attempt explaining this principle of attraction mechanically, they have their full liberty: Sir Iſaac Newton, I dare ſay, will willingly reſign to them the glory of the diſcovery, and be ſatisfied if he eſcapes their cenſure for not undertaking the ſolution of ſuch an intricate problem.

the manner of the Antients, by travelling through various countries, and converſing with the learned of different nations. He had now viſited Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Flanders, and heightened the lights which his great genius and extenſive learning enabled him to receive from experience, by a ſtrict attention to the havock made by wounds and diſeaſes in fleets and camps (x). He reſided moſtly after his return at London, and gave himſelf up wholly to the cares of his profeſſion. In this if he ſucceeded, it was wholly owing to his merit, for he was incapable of uſing any of the little arts that paſſed for wiſdom with men of meaner minds; he had neither an obſequious complaiſance for patients of high quality, nor could he readily diſpenſe with all the received opinions amongſt thoſe of the ſame Faculty (y). But theſe, and ſome other wants, were ſupplied by true knowledge, great integrity, and happy ſucceſs, which triumphed over all obſtacles, and carried him to the very ſummit of medical practice. He paſſed through his firſt examination July the third 1713, was admitted a candidate on the thirtieth of September following, and April the ninth 1716, was elected a Fellow of the Royal College of Phyſicians (z). He publiſhed the ſame year the firſt and third books of HIPPOCRATES de morbis popularibus, to which he added a commentary upon fevers, divided into nine ſhort diſſertations (a), which he dedicated to Dr Richard Frewen, of Oxford, a perſon of excellent character, with whom he had lived long in the moſt entire friendſhip. This was ſtill a more important work than any which had fallen from his pen, and as he was deſirous of eſtabliſhing, for the true principles of Phyſick, thoſe that having been diſcovered by the ſagacity of the Antients, were confirmed by the experiments of the Moderns, he thought a more proper method could not be taken than this, of preſixing the moſt valuable parts of the Epidemics of Hippocrates before his own diſcourſes, that it might inconteſtibly appear that he had not only ſound ſenſe and right reaſon, but alſo the higheſt authority on his ſide (b). Few books have met with better reception than this did, from all who were competent judges of the ſubject; and indeed it had all the merit of his former pieces, with this additional advantage, that it contained a greater variety of matter [H]. It is no improbable conjecture, that the loud and general applauſe

[H] A greater variety of matter.] The title of this learned and curious book, in which our author ſhewed an equal reverence for the Antients, and juſt reſpect for the diſcoveries of the Moderns, runs thus.

HIPPOCRATIS de morbis popularibus liber primus & tertius Græco Latinus. His accommodavit novem de Febribus Commentarios, Johannes Freind, M. Doctor, Coll. Med. Londinenſis. Londini 1717. 4to. That is, The firſt and third books of Hippocrates of Epidemick Diſeaſes in Greek and Latin. To which are added nine Commentaries upon Fevers accommodated to his Doctrine, by Dr John Freind. Theſe Commentaries were tranſlated by Dr Thomas Dale into Engliſh, after the death of their author.

We find a copious and curious dedication prefixed to this work, as has been obſerved in the text, addreſſed to the author's old and intimate friend, Dr Frewen, dated December the firſt, 1716. In this our author obſerves, that the antient Phyſicians were not only ſkilled in their profeſſion, but likewiſe in all other parts of learning, and diſtinguiſhed for the elegance of their ſtile. They applied themſelves to give an exact account of diſeaſes, and their different ſymptoms, and explained them with the utmoſt perſpicuity and accuracy. Among the Latin Phyſicians, he particularly extols Celſus as an admirable writer, as well as an excellent Phyſician, and obſerves that Cœlius Aurelianus would deſerve a place amongſt the principal phyſical writers, if his ſtyle had been leſs barbarous. Amongſt the Greek writers he commends Alexander Trallianus, who expreſſes himſelf politely enough, except with regard to ſome few words. We find ſome things in him which ſavour of the Empiric, and of one full of ſuperſtition, he is alſo too diffuſe upon the remedies, but he gives a very clear and exact account of diſeaſes. Dr Freind ſeems to doubt, whether Galen is to be ranked among the Phyſicians, who have explained the nature of diſeaſes, ſince this does not appear to be his deſign in any one of his books, tho' he was himſelf an excellent Phyſician, and delivers the notions of his predeceſſors, and eſpecially of Hippocrates, with great ſubtilty and elegance. Our author recommends Aretæus, and then proceeds to the character of Hippocrates, whom he ſtiles the moſt compleat Phyſician of all Antiquity, and is ſurprized that ſeveral Moderns neglect the ſtudy of him, as if he was of little conſequence, and prefer ſeveral writers to him. He remarks, that thoſe who abandon the Antients, do not underſtand the ſubjects of which they treat, or expreſs themſelves in a very bad manner, and that the reaſon why we have ſo few good writers among the vaſt number who have written of diſeaſes in the two laſt centuries, is, that they never read the Antients, but formed their ſtyle merely upon the Moderns; and not content with writing ill, have added to the explication of diſtempers, ſo many vain chimeras of Philoſophy, that they ſeem rather to have compoſed fables than hiſtories of diſeaſes; for being infatuated with their own hypotheſes, they lay down not only uſeleſs, but even falſe and pernicious rules for the cure of them. Dr Freind does not pretend to deprive the Moderns of the honour due to them, he owns that they have cultivated anatomy, and inriched it with a great many new diſcoveries, and explained the virtues of medicines with great diligence and accuracy. But perhaps, ſays he, the uſe which anatomy may be of in phyſic, has not yet been ſufficiently ſhewn. And with regard to medicines it may be affirmed, that they frequently perplex the Phyſician, and that the needleſs multitude of them is a great obſtacle to the cure of diſeaſes.

In the preface our author informs us, that all the editions of Hippocrates's works are full of errors. That of Aldus Manucius is very defective, but Frobenius's is more correct. Jerom Mercurialis has followed the latter ſo implicitly, that he has ſometimes copied even the faults. Though Foeſius's edition is not exempt from miſtakes, it is more correct. Charterius's is the moſt erroneous. There is but one manuſcript in England of Hippocrates de morbis popularibus, which was of great advantage to Dr Freind, who, in order to publiſh the text as correct as poſſible, conſulted all the editions, without adhering to any one in particular. After the preface, follows Hippocrates's treatiſe in Greek, with Foeſius's Latin verſion at the bottom of the page.

In the firſt of his commentaries, our author diſcourſes of the manner of writing which Hippocrates purſued in his books of epidemick diſeaſes. He gives us two reaſons for the pains he took in publiſhing theſe pieces; the firſt is, that only theſe two books are held to be genuine, and that in them we find all that this great man delivered concerning fevers. For the better underſtanding of which, our author enters very learnedly and cloſely into his method of writing and recording, that the reader may the more eaſily apprehend the meaning of his obſervations, and have the clearer idea of the matters of fact which he ſets down. In his ſecond diſcourſe, he conſiders the uſe of bleeding, and more eſpecially the ſafety, expedience, and even neceſſity, of opening the jugulars, where the brain is affected; at the cloſe, he mentions the opening the temporal artery, which applauſe with which this learned treatiſe was received, had an unhappy effect; either on the head or heart of another Phyſician, who ſet himſelf immediately an unpleaſing, or at leaſt an unſucceſsful taſk (c), that of deſtroying with the publick the credit which ſome new points in practice, recommended by our ingenious author, had gained, purely from that force of reaſoning with which they were ſupported. To this extraordinary piece, in which great bitterneſs of heart appeared, with no ſmall acrimony of ſtile, it is ſaid our author oppoſed a very ludicrous anſwer (d), in which the vivacity of his wit, was ſhewn to be not at all inferior to the extent of his learning, and the ſolidity of his underſtanding. His rival ſhewed ſome inclination to fight him with the ſame weapons, but his vinegar was not near ſo ſtrong as his gall; ſo that it was quickly diſcerned that all the lovers of raillery were on the ſide of Dr Freind, and were extremely diverted with the controverſy, of which, had it been managed in a ſerious light, they would not have ventured to aſſume the character of judges [I]. Upon this the ſcene changed, the Doctor's adverſaries cried out, that they had been laughed at, but not refuted; that the ſubject was very ſerious and important, and therefore called for a ſober and judicious, not a humourous or whimſical reply. Upon this Dr Quincy took them at their words (e), and very learnedly and modeſtly, as well as plainly and judiciouſly, anſwered all the little cavils that had been raiſed againſt Dr Freind's Commentaries. Yet even this did not do; thoſe who called ſo loudly for argument, found it not at all grateful to their palates, and therefore choſe to put an end to the controverſy, by a flat piece of irony, which could be only ſcorned and deſpiſed [K]. Our author ſupported that ſentiment of his, which had occaſioned ſo warm an altercation, in which he commends; but at the ſame time adds, that he is unwilling to dwell upon it, ſince it is very unlikely that our countrymen will ever be reconciled to this kind of practice. The utility of ſweating is the ſubject of the third commentary, which is very ſhort. In the fourth, he treats of vomiting, which he adviſes at the beginning, and the uſe of which he diſſuades at the approach of the criſis in fevers, and more eſpecially in the ſmall-pox when at the height, unleſs where there is evident danger of ſuffocation. In the fifth, he treats of a purulent ſpitting, of a pleuriſy likewiſe and peripneumony. What he ſays concerning an abceſs, an ulcer of the colon, and the bladder, compoſes the ſixth commentary, in which there is a very ſingular and accurate hiſtory, of a curious caſe that fell under our author's inſpection. The ſeventh commentary, which is larger than all the other ſix taken together, relates to purging, what effect it may have in the putrid fever which attends upon the confluent ſmall pox, and in an eriſypelas of the head; in this there are inſerted, with the conſent of the perſons who wrote them, a letter from Dr Richard Frewen, dated Chriſt-Church Oxon, July the twentieth 1710; another from Dr H. Levett, dated June the tenth 1710; another from Dr Saluſbury Cade, dated September the eighth 1716; another curious, critical, and circumſtantial letter from Dr Richard Mead, dated September the firſt 1716; as alſo a letter from Dr Freind, to the ſame gentleman, dated November the twenty-ſixth 1716, and in this there is a very exact hiſtory of a caſe in which they were conſulted together. At the cloſe of this commentary, there is added a very clear and learned account of the inteſtinal diſcharge. What he ſays concerning a profluvium of urine takes up the eighth diſcourſe; and the ninth relates to thoſe veſicatories into which cantharides enter, and concludes with the author's aſſuring the candid reader, he will find by experience, that tho' many kinds of fevers generally yield to evacuations, without making uſe of any other remedy; yet there are ſcarce any, which, if they are become any thing vehement, can be extinguiſhed by any medicine whatever, if this method of evacuating be ſet aſide.

[I] The character of judges] The hiſtory of this diſpute, which was carried very high, would take up much more room, than, in a work of this nature, can be allowed; we muſt therefore be content to report the titles of the principal pieces publiſhed during this controverſy, with a few remarks. It was begun by a book written by Dr John Woodward, Profeſſor of Phyſick in Greſham College, and eminent in his profeſſion. The title of which ran thus:

The State of Phyſick and of Diſeaſes: With an Enquiry into the Cauſes of the late Increaſe of them, but more particularly of the Small-Pox: With ſome Conſiderations upon the new Practice of purging in that Diſeaſe: To the whole is premiſed, An Idea of the Nature and Mechaniſm of Man, of the Diſorders to which it is obnoxious, and of the method of rectifying them. Lond. 1718, 8vo.

Dr Woodward tells us in his preface, that this book, together with remarks upon ſome of the other heads treated of by Dr Freind in his Commentaries, were drawn up in the winter of the year 1716, ſoon after theſe Commentaries came out; and in the ſecond ſection he writes thus (10). 'In every thing that Dr 'Freind hath hitherto publiſhed, and particularly the 'preſent Commentaries, he hath advanced ſeveral hy- 'potheſes, ſome of which are rightly ſupported, and 'and the reſt all ſo ingenious, that I cannot but be 'pleaſed with them. But then I can ſee no reaſon to 'debar myſelf of the ſame pleaſure, from thoſe of 'Dr Willis, Dr Sydenham, Dr Morton, and other Phy- 'ſicians, to whoſe hypotheſes Dr Freind is ſo very a- 'verſe, he having not, excluſive of others, the ſole 'privilege of entertaining the world in this way.'

(10) Woodward's State of Phyſick, p. 54.

To this, Dr Freind oppoſed a ludicrous anſwer, under the title of A Letter to the learned Dr Woodward, by Dr Byfield. Lond. 1719, 8vo. It was purely calculated to expoſe Dr Woodward, and his manner of writing. About the ſame time, there was likewiſe publiſhed another pamphlet againſt Dr Woodward, intituled, A Letter from the facetious Dr Andrew Tripe, at Bath, to his loving Brother the profound Greshamite, ſhewing that the Scribendi Cacoethes is a Diſtemper ariſing from the redundancy of Biliose Salts, and not to be eradicated but by a diurnal Courſe of Oils and Vomits. With an Appendix concerning the Application of Socrates his Clyſter, and the uſe of clean Linnen, in Controverſy. Lond. 1719, in 8vo. pages 48. In anſwer to this, and the Letter by Dr Byfielde, there was publiſhed, The two Sofia's: Or, the true Dr Byfielde at the Rainbow Coffee-Houſe, to the Pretender in Jermyn Street; in anſwer to a Letter wrote by him, aſſiſted by his two Aſſociates. With a Preface relating to the late famous exploits of the facetious Dr Andrew Tripe. As alſo an Account of the new Creed of theſe Phyſicians, deſigned as an Appendix to the Religio Medici. Lond. 1719, in 8vo. pages 58. In this Pamphlet, Dr Freind is every where repreſented as the author of the Letter from Dr Byfielde, and ſeverely reflected upon; and his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, is particularly cenſured. Another bitter invective, which appeared on the ſame ſide, bore the following title:

A Letter to the fatal Triumvirate, in Anſwer to that pretended to be written by Dr Byfielde; in which, ſufficient Reaſons are aſſigned, why Dr Woodward ſhould take no Notice of it. Lond. 1719, 8vo. There were alſo ſeveral ſmaller pieces inſerted in the publick papers, and periodical productions of thoſe times, of which it is not requiſite that we ſhould take any further notice.

in a letter addreſſed to the learned Dr Richard Mead, and dated September the twentieth 1719 (f); in the beginning and at the cloſe of which, if we diſcover ſomething of heat, or cannot avoid perceiving an unuſual quickneſs and acidity in the ſtile, we ought, not only to excuſe it, on the ſcore of the many admirable things which that moſt learned epiſtle contains; but we muſt likewiſe acknowledge, that ſome amends is made us by that honeſt zeal which our author expreſſes for the dignity of his profeſſion, the ſincerity and tenderneſs of his friendſhip for that worthy perſon to whom his letter is addreſſed, and, if one may be allowed to avow it, that elegant ſpirit of invective by which his reſentment is conveyed in all the energy and force of the Roman language. This letter had it's effect, and every body that took any ſhare in matters of this kind, could not avoid being pleaſed to find the hiſtory of ſo capital a diſeaſe as the ſmall-pox, deduced, with ſo much accuracy and ſuccinctneſs, from the very earlieſt accounts that authors give of it; ſo many ſlips of the learned, as well as vulgar miſtakes, convincingly rectified; and the ſubject, with all it's circumſtances, this debate in ſo fantaſtick a way, there came out a ſhort treatiſe which had a graver aſpect; it was intituled,

An Appeal to common Senſe, or a ſober Vindication of Dr WOODWARD's State of Phyſick, by a Divine of the Church of England. Lond. 1719, 8*vo*.

The apparent deſign of this ſhort diſcourſe, was to ſhew how very inconſiſtent the language hitherto uſed in this diſpute was, not only with regard to the perſons concerned therein, but alſo to the importance of the ſubject, as a thing in which mankind was deeply intereſted, and had a juſt right to expect it ſhould be no longer conſidered as a jeſt. Upon this, the very learned and ingenious Dr Quincy immediately took up the challenge, and very ſoon after publiſhed

An Examination of Dr WOODWARD's State of Phyſick. Lond. 1720.

In that treatiſe, Dr Woodward had advanced the following hypotheſis. 'That the beginnings of all 'things, good or bad to the body (bating exterior acci-'dents) are in the ſtomach, in which more or leſs of 'a bilious juice is ordinarily reſident, containing ſalts 'of a very different nature. Theſe ſalts are the inſtru-'ments of digeſtion, and, while they retain their na-'tural ſtate, are in a proper quantity, and regular mo-'tion, the body is in health; but when they become 'too redundant or vitiated, they are the cauſes of all 'diſtempers. Therefore the ſpeedieſt, as well as the 'moſt effectual, method of removing all bodily diſor-'ders, is to cleanſe the ſtomach by emetic medicines. 'And as this generally holds good in other caſes, ſo 'particularly in the ſecond fever of the confluent ſmall-'pox, in which purging is very dangerous.' In anſwer to this, Dr Quincy aſſerts, 'That ſeveral diſeaſes 'have not their origin in the ſtomach; that the natural 'reſidence of the bile is not there, but, being ſeparated 'by the liver, is emptied out into the bowels, a con-'ſiderable diſtance below the further orifice of the 'ſtomach, and never aſcends thither but by convulſive 'and preternatural means; that conſequently the diſ-'orders attributed to the bilious matter in the ſtomach, 'and the method of removing them by vomits, muſt 'be groundleſs (*).' And then he proceeds to vindicate the practice of purging in the ſecond fever of the confluent ſmall-pox, in the following manner; he inſinuates, that Dr Woodward diſguiſes, under the name of purging in the ſmall-pox, the practice recommended, and adds, 'Thoſe Phyſicians have adviſed that e-'vacuation only in ſome particular circumſtances of 'this diſtemper; that is, chiefly in ſuch caſes of the 'confluent kind, where the whole load of humours 'cannot be thrown off by the ſurface and glands about 'the mouth, but ſtopping, when the puſtules grow 'hard, returns back into the blood, and raiſes a ſecon-'dary fever, which proves often fatal; and their rea-'ſons for thus doing, they have communicated to one 'another in the Latin language, as a point in practice 'of great importance. But Dr Woodward, in Engliſh, 'has harangued the populace, and endeavoured to 'frighten people with a belief that their general prac-'tiſe, in this diſtemper, is by purging; and, from in-'ſtances of it's impropriety in ſome caſes, takes occaſion 'to be very compaſſionate for his country, to weep 'over the Weekly Bills, and inveigh as bitterly againſt 'purges, as a craſty Enthuſiaſt would againſt the Scarlet 'Whore, by this means proſtituting the honour of the 'profeſſion, and marking out thoſe of greateſt emi-'nence therein to publick reſentment. He traduces 'theſe gentlemen alſo by a deluſory name, for purging, 'in the common acceptation in Engliſh, has a very dif-'ferent idea from thoſe terms of the learned, whence 'it is tranſlated. Solliciting the diſcharge of an over-'load of bad humours by ſtool, which the conſtitution 'is not of itſelf able to ſtruggle with, is amongſt them 'expreſſed in terms which may bear the Engliſh word 'purging in a reſtrained ſenſe, but in the moſt inlarged 'acceptation of it, and as Dr Woodward uſes it, it is 'not true of their writing or practice. After all, ſo far 'as theſe Phyſicians adviſe purging in the ſmall-pox, it 'is alſo practiſed, by common conſent, in many other 'caſes of fevers; that is, wherever nature makes an 'imperfect criſis, and the efforts of the conſtitution are 'not able to bring the peccant matter to a head, or 'throw it off the principal parts, and wherever ſuch 'matter threatens miſchief to ſome noble part. Theſe 'happen frequently in inflammatory fevers; and eva-'cuation often by ſtool is promoted both to eaſe the 'conſtitution of the over-load, and draw off the hu-'mours that would be otherwiſe troubleſome; and this 'aſſiſtance, in ſome particular caſes of the ſmall-pox, 'ſeems ſo conſonant to nature and reaſon, that an omiſ-'ſion of it can ariſe only from an unacquaintance with 'the true procedure of the diſtemper.' Dr Quincy alſo gives the following anſwer, to the paſſage cited from Dr Woodward in the foregoing note (11). 'Every one 'who has read Dr Freind, will find it very difficult to 'underſtand what is meant by hypotheſes. That gen-'tleman has advanced many propoſitions, which he 'has fully proved; but for hypotheſes, in the common 'acceptation, he diſclaims them, and is an utter ene-'my to them. But yet, in this ſenſe, Dr Woodward 'muſt uſe the word; becauſe he ſays, juſt after, But 'then I can ſee no reaſon to debar myſelf of the ſame 'pleaſure from thoſe of Dr Willis, &c. Yet, here a-'again, we are in a contradiction, for Willis's works 'are profeſſedly an hypotheſis, being founded upon 'ſuppoſitious principles, ſuch as ſulphur, ſalt, &c. 'And Dr Morton accounted for diſeaſes, and their 'cures, from a ſuppoſition of their ſeat being in the 'animal ſpirits. But then Dr Sydenham went upon no 'hypotheſis, but utterly declaimed all ſuch deluſory 'conceits, and drew no concluſions except from facts 'and experience.' The whole of this work was conducted in ſuch a manner as to convince by reaſoning, and to give no other offence than what muſt neceſſarily attend every endeavour to refute opinions, warmly, and even angrily, eſpouſed. At the ſame time, it gave a fair occaſion to wipe out the remembrance of thoſe miſtakes, by a conduct of another nature, and by a defence worthy the importance of the ſubject, and of the characters of thoſe who were embarked in this affair. But inſtead of a ſerious anſwer to this book, there was publiſhed ſoon after, An Account of Dr Quincy's Examination of Dr Woodward's State of Phyſick and Diſeaſes, in a Letter to the Free-thinker; which conſiſted, in a great meaſure, of invectives againſt the author and his performance, without entering into the ſubject. This occaſioned Dr Quincy to print a ſecond edition of his examination; to which was ſubjoined, A Letter to Dr Woodward, wherein he complains of the ill treatment he received in that pamphlet, for having complied with the invitation of bringing the matters in diſpute to the teſt of truth and argument. And thus at length ended this controverſy.

ſtances, ſet in ſo very clear a light [L]. The connecting ſeveral points relating to the ſame ſubject, has carried us a little out of the direct path of Chronology, into which it is but reaſonable we ſhould return. March the ſeventh 1717, he read the Gulſtonian lecture in the [L] In ſo very clear a light.] This was written in the heat of that diſpute, and before ſeveral treatiſes mentioned in the former note, but it ſeemed to be the cleareſt, as well as the moſt natural, method to carry on the hiſtory of the paper war in that quarter without interruption, and this finiſhed, to give an account of his epiſtle, the title of which runs thus.

Johannis Freind, M. D. De Purgantibus, in ſecunda Variolarum confluentium febre, adhibendis Epiſtola. Lond. 1719. 4to. That is, Concerning purging in the ſecond fever of the confluent ſmall pox, in an Epiſtle to Dr Richard Mead.

This letter is dated, London, September the twentieth 1719, our author begins with lamenting the hard ſtate of thoſe Phyſicians, who have no other way of enlarging their practice, or raiſing their reputation, but by a diligent application to the ſtudy of the profeſſion. He ſpeaks of the little arts, the low complacencies, the mean cunning of ſome men, who by conſtantly purſuing the beaten road, falling in with popular prejudices, and vainly pretending to follow nature, tho' they are not able to penetrate much leſs to explain her operations, endeavour to ſupport themſelves, and to decry others who labour with unwearied pains to tread in the footſteps of their judicious predeceſſors, and, if poſſible, add a farther degree of perfection to the healing art themſelves. He then enters into the reaſon of that practice, in which he had concurred with the worthy and learned perſon to whom he wrote, which from his experience he had recommended, and which he was deſirous of ſeeing farther explained, and ſupported by a work which this gentleman had then in hand, and which having lately appeared fully juſtifies the character given it ſo long ago, by ſo good a judge. He afterwards delivers ten caſes, which, in point of accuracy, perſpicuity, and coming clearly up to the point they were brought to prove, are in every reſpect ſatisfactory. He enters afterwards into a very curious, but conciſe hiſtory of the diſeaſe, and of the method in which it had been treated in all its ſtages, by the ableſt of the Faculty in different countries and ages, to ſhew how little foundation there was for ſtiling this a new practice, he comes then to the apprehenſions which ſome had endeavoured to raiſe upon this manner of treating the diſeaſe, as if a temporary relief ought not to be ſought by running the hazard of future evils, which he fully ſhews to be without either meaning or foundation. His words are very worthy the reader's obſervation (12). ‘ For to ſay ‘ ſomething, continues he, of that danger which ſome ‘ dread, as being the certain conſequence of this me‘ thod of cure, they ſeem to me not to underſtand, ‘ either what that diſtemper can bear, or in what ‘ manner this medicine ought to be applied. But do ‘ they know any one to have been killed or carried ‘ off by purging? Perhaps they may: for my part I ‘ do not: nay, not one whom it did not recover, un‘ leſs in a caſe which in the judgment of every one ‘ was plainly deſperate. Farther I can affirm, which ‘ may perhaps ſeem ſtrange, that not one of thoſe ‘ who could not be ſaved by this kind of remedy, ‘ ever died of a looſeneſs, and that no one ever ſunk ‘ under the operation of the purge: but that thoſe ‘ very perſons, who tho' catharticks were given ‘ them, however died, almoſt always found ſome re‘ lief from them for a time. And this, indeed, is ‘ agreeable to reaſon; for nature at this time labours ‘ under the too great weight of the diſtemper, and ‘ has no occaſion for an additional load from the in‘ teſtines: by what medicine then can ſhe be more ‘ expeditiouſly relieved, than that whereby this load ‘ of fæces is diſcharged? But neither yet, becauſe a ‘ ſpontaneous flux of the belly has proved deſtructive, ‘ which does not however very often happen, is the ‘ opening of the body to be ſcrupled at this time of ‘ the diſtemper, for whatever agreement there may ‘ ſeem to be betwixt them they differ very widely, ‘ for one of theſe caſes ſhews plainly, that the ſtrength ‘ is diſſolved; in the other caſe, what hinders, if the ‘ other inclinations agree, our trying thoſe purges ‘ which are ſuited to the ſtrength, upon this account ‘ likewiſe, is there the leſs danger from this evacua‘ tion, in that we can moderate it at our pleaſure, ‘ either by giving the moſt gentle remedies, or in a ‘ moderate quantity, or at the longer intervals. Be‘ ſides, at this time of the ſmall pox the belly having ‘ been ſo long ſhut up, and immoderately charged with ‘ fæces, is not ſo readily looſened, as to occaſion any ‘ fear of too great a flux. Therefore it is in our own ‘ power, either to hold in or let go the reins, we may ‘ try this experiment of purging without any danger ‘ in the moſt gentle manner, we may, if it avails any ‘ thing, repeat it at times, ſo that we may proceed ‘ gradually as far as we deſire. Wherefore, ſince this ‘ kind of remedy is not only free from hurt, but ‘ greatly advantageous to the patient, I admire at the ‘ dulneſs of ſome men who, being prejudiced, are en‘ tirely averſe to it, or at leaſt they adminiſter it ſo ‘ timorouſly and cooly, that they are not willing to ‘ try it till the health is even irrecoverable. As if it ‘ were better to wait for the danger than prevent it: ‘ as if he would not more eaſily ſurmount the danger ‘ of this diſtemper, who is thus relieved on the ninth ‘ or tenth day, than by deferring this medicine till the ‘ thirteenth or fifteenth, when the diſtemper is become ‘ already inveterate.’ He goes on to enquire to what cauſes theſe people themſelves attribute theſe jealouſies and terrors, and demonſtrates them to be vain from thoſe cauſes, having no foundation, but in their imagination. They dread that nature ſhould be diſturbed in her courſe, or defeated in her endeavour, to throw out the morbific matter; he ſhews that in this caſe nature makes ineffectual efforts, and without the aſſiſtance of art can only ſtruggle againſt death, till the ſtrength of the patient is exhauſted. They are afraid of ſinking the ſpirits by purging; he affirms, that this does not happen, but that the body being relieved by the removing an oppreſſive load, is quickly freed from many alarming ſymptoms. They take it for granted, that the tumification in the hands muſt be abated by the purging, he gives many inſtances of the direct contrary. In reference to the abuſe of a true principle, that Phyſicians ought to ſtudy nature, and the occaſion taken from them, to reflect upon learning, as if a Phyſician deſerted nature by applying himſelf to books, he ſays with much warmth, but at the ſame time with much good ſenſe (13). ‘ I muſt confeſs the ‘ conſtant cant of thoſe triſling, and as they imagine ‘ themſelves philoſophiſing, fellows, has often times ‘ raiſed my indignation, and often times alſo my ‘ laughter, when they tell us we muſt always attend ‘ nature, and proceed in that path which nature's ſelf ‘ points out to us: as if no body knew this, but per‘ ſons entirely unſkilled in all the arts and ſciences: ‘ as if they were leſs capable of this, who are aſſiſted ‘ by the writings of the Antients, and have made ſome ‘ progreſs in learning. What elſe have thoſe inge‘ nious and learned men done, thoſe great reſtorers of ‘ phyſick among the Greeks and Arabians, what end ‘ did they propoſe to themſelves in their ſtudies, than ‘ to underſtand only how to follow nature; to follow ‘ her however in ſuch a manner, as that they might ‘ guide and direct her by art, whenever there was oc‘ caſion? Can we receive therefore no advantage from ‘ their lucubrations? Can we find no aſſiſtance in our ‘ endeavours towards relieving the afflicted from their ‘ experience, hiſtories, and inſtitutions? Becauſe, for‘ ſooth, it is the part of an honeſt Phyſician to obſerve ‘ only what is indicated by nature. In truth, thoſe ‘ very perſons who entertain theſe ſentiments, truſting ‘ too much to their own natural ſagacity, will not ‘ eaſily underſtand what is meant by the word Nature, ‘ neither will they underſtand what ſhe indicates, nor ‘ what of help ſhe ſtands in need, or laſtly by what ‘ means ſhe may be aſſiſted.’ To this epiſtle are added two letters, the firſt from Dr Sedgewick Harriſon, dated All Soul's College Oxon, September the tenth, 1719, containing five caſes; the other from Dr Bate, dated Aſhford, September the nineteenth, 1719, containing ſix caſes.

the College of Physicians; he was chosen one of the Censors September the thirtieth 1718, in which honourable post he continued two years. On the twenty-fifth of March following, he gave the sum of fifty pounds towards repairing the College. October the eighteenth 1720, he pronounced the anniversary oration before that learned body, which was published, and, as might be well expected, highly applauded (g). He takes occasion therein, to bestow just praises on the great men who had adorned the Faculty, by their learning and labours, in this kingdom; and as there was no subject more agreeable to his temper and inclination, as he had a great facility of composing, and withal a very strong judgment, so we need not wonder that this oration is a peculiar proof of the felicity of his genius, and of his excelling in those qualities for which he has so justly, and so highly, commended the famous Linacre (h). In 1722, he was elected a Burgess to Parliament for Launceston, in the county of Cornwall; and acting in his station as a Senator, with that warmth and freedom which was natural to him, he distinguished himself by some quick speeches against such measures as he disapproved (i). As those were very critical times, and a matter of great importance was upon the carpet, in which Dr Freind thought himself obliged to take some share; it drew upon him so much suspicion, or so much resentment, that, the Habeas Corpus Act being at that time suspended, a warrant was issued against him for high-treason, and, after the House of Commons had been made acquainted therewith, he was on the fifteenth of March 1722-3 committed to the Tower (k), where he continued prisoner till the twenty-first of June following, when he was first admitted to bail, and afterwards discharged from his recognizance (l). This affair made a great deal of noise at the time it happened, and was then very little understood; which is the reason that what some publick writers have delivered concerning it, is at once obscure, and not much to the purpose [M]. The leisure afforded him by this confinement, being not at all disturbed

Immediately after the publication of this Latin epistle, came abroad a burlesque piece under the following title.

Dr Freind's Epistle to Dr Mead, rendered faithfully into English, divided into proper chapters, with notes learned and unlearned. Lond. 1719. 8vo.

The design of this ingenious piece was by a ridiculous translation of a few of the first paragraphs in Dr Freind's letter, and the heightening this coarse humour with some notes of the same kind, to raise a laugh amongst those who were incompetent judges of the point in dispute, of which it is requisite to give the reader an instance, that it may appear we have no intention to deceive him. At the beginning of his epistle, Dr Freind writes thus, as we have literally translated his expressions (14).

(14) Ibid. p. 303.

'In this therefore, as well as in the business of 'Painting or Sculpture, if any has a desire to excel, 'it is necessary that he should have an understanding 'framed as it were and accommodated to the art he 'would pursue, for no man by mere dint of study can 'ever become a Physician, unless he is in some sort 'born thereto. For in this art there are many things 'obscure and hidden, many complicated and subtile, 'which cannot by any precepts be taught or fully 'delivered by any explanation; so that, tho' much 'may be learned from the writings of Physicians, 'from whence that he may the better draw them, it 'is requisite that they should be thoroughly known to 'a Physician, yet much more must after all be left to 'his judgment and penetration. Neither is this in 'any thing more evident, than in the being able to 'distinguish amidst the variety of pulses, for those 'who are well acquainted with this happy effect of 'the touch, are very sensible that it is not to be ac'quired by the lessons of masters, but from daily 'practice and their own proper sagacity; insomuch, 'that in the affair of physic, more especially, the be'nefit is found of a natural quickness of apprehension, 'and the felicity of forming readily a true and sound 'judgment of things.' The remarks upon these observations of Dr Freind, in the piece before mentioned, are in the following words (15).

(15) Dr F's Epistle to Dr M. rendered into English.

'This is the most extraordinary discovery the Doc'tor ever made, that no man can be a Physician, un'less he be born one, or as he more elegantly phrases 'it, as it were, and in some manner, born one. This 'softening quodammodo instead of mitigating the non'sense inflames it, and turns his poor attempt at a 'meaning into ridicule. Pray, after what manner, 'which way, or how, must he be born a Physician, or 'as it were one? Must he come into the world with 'receipts in his hand, or must the name like the Beasts 'in the Revelations be written on his forehead? But 'I know what deceived the Doctor, having heard of 'Poeta nascitur non fit, and knowing himself to have 'as indisputable a right as Sancha Panca to the mis'application of all Proverbs and quaint Sayings, he 'he changes the word Poeta for Medicus, and makes 'the proverb his own. There may be something in 'the assertion, when it refers to works of fancy and 'imagination, as Poetry and Painting, but I hope 'Physic is not in that number, nor any Physician proud 'of the title, but as it stands in opposition to the un'born Doctor, unless the great F——— who is the 'most fanciful of his brethren, writes treatises of Poe'try instead of Physic, and paints when he should pre'scribe. The secret is now out, a Physician must be 'born a Pulse-feeler, having a nicer sensibility in ex'tremis partibus, than a Tanner or a Tinker. After 'the same reason, long and small fingers denote a man 'born a Musician, or a Man Midwife, an erect coun'tenance makes an Astronomer, and a down-cast look 'a Botanist. Te, vir clarissime, hisce oculis sæpius 'vidi, & dum lineamenta tua, cum figuris Baptistæ Por'tæ contuli, nunquam Te alium, quam Saltatorem na'tum judicavi, adeoque Te tuis verbis, proprio Magi'sterio relicto, in Medicæ Artis Munera insiluisse cre'do.' Such were the arguments made use of to refute the learning, reasoning, and facts, advanced by Dr Freind!

[M] And not much to the purpose] In the close of the year 1722, a discovery was made of that design, which has been since stiled the Bishop of Rochester's plot, upon this there was a bill brought into the House of Lords, 'to impower his Majesty to secure 'and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect, 'are conspiring against his person and government;' by which the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act was taken away for a whole year, which before had never been suspended, for above six months; after it had passed the Lords, it was brought down to the Commons, on the fifteenth of October read the first time, the same day a second, a third time the next, and soon after received the Royal Assent. In regard to what happened to Dr Freind, we find the following account given which we transcribe without altering a letter (16).

(16) History and Proceedings of the House of Commons, Vol. VI. p. 301, 302, 303.

'March the eleventh, 1722-3. Mr Yonge stood 'up and took notice how deeply Dr Francis Atter'bury Bishop of Rochester had been concerned in this 'detestable conspiracy, aggravating his crime from 'his holy function and high station in the Church of 'England, a Church ever conspicuous for its loyalty, 'from the solemn oaths he had on so many occasions 'taken to the government, and by which he had ab'jured the Pretender, when at the same time he was 'traiterously conspiring to bring him in, upon the ruin disturbed by any uneasy thoughts or apprehensions, was, in some measure, employed in writing a second epistle to Dr Mead, on the subject of the small-pox, in which the strength of thought, the freedom of stile, and the accuracy of the several cases set down, most evidently demonstrates, that he never had a greater command of his parts, or exercised his judgment in his profession more happily, than at this time (m); so that however his health and his affairs might suffer by his confinement, his reputation increased, and the Republick of Letters was the better for it [N]. Here also he laid the plan of his last and most elaborate

(m) J. Wigan. Præfat. ad Oper. med. Johan. Freind.

' of his country, and of all that was dear and valuable ' to us as free men and christians: concluding, that as ' he was a disgrace to his order, and dishonour to the ' Church, so he might apply to him on this occasion ' these words, of the first of Acts verse the twentieth, ' Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell ' therein: and his Bishoprick let another take.' And therefore he moved ' that it appears to this house, that ' Francis Lord Bishop of Rochester was principally ' concerned, in forming, directing, and carrying on ' the said wicked and detestable conspiracy for invading these kingdoms with a superior foreign force, ' and for raising insurrections, and a rebellion at home, ' in order to subvert our present happy establishment ' in Church and State, by placing a Popish Pretender ' upon the throne.' Mr Yonge was seconded by Sir John Cope, but they were answered by Sir William Wyndham, who said, ' He saw no cause to proceed ' against the Bishop in so severe a manner, there being ' little, or indeed no evidence, besides conjectures and ' hearsays.' He was back'd by Mr Bromley, Mr Shippen, Mr Hutcheson, Mr Hungerford, Colonel Strangeways, Mr Lutwyche, and Dr Freind. They were replied to by Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr R. Walpole, Mr Pelham, Mr Talbot, Mr John Smith, and Mr William Pulteney; and a motion being made, and the question being put, that the House do now adjourn, it passed in the negative by two hundred eighty five voices, against one hundred and fifty two; after which the question being put upon Mr Yonge's motion, the same was carried without dividing. Then a motion was made, and the question put, that a bill be brought in To inflict certain pains and penalties on Francis Lord Bishop of Rochester, which after some debate was also carried without any division. March thirteenth, Mr Robert Walpole acquainted the House, ' that he had received his Majesty's commands to acquaint the House, that his Majesty having had just ' reason to apprehend Dr John Freind, a Member of ' this House, for High-Treason, had caused him to be ' apprehended, and desired the consent of the House ' to his being committed and detained for High-Treason, according to an Act of this present Session, intituled An Act for impowering his Majesty to secure ' and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect ' are conspiring against his person and government. ' Upon which he moved, that an humble address be ' presented to his Majesty, that he would be pleased ' to give order for committing and detaining Dr John ' Freind, pursuant to the Act of this Session of Parliament for that purpose.' This motion was seconded and backed by several members: but Mr Shippen, and Mr Bromley opposed it, saying, ' they could not see ' any reason for that House giving leave for detaining ' any Member, unless the species of Treason was declared, and that the information was upon oath.' Sir Joseph Jekyll, and Mr Robert Walpole replied, ' that by the late Act for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, the King was impowered to take up any ' person he had reason to suspect, that therefore the ' Government was not obliged to say, whether the ' information was upon oath or not.' But Mr Walpole added, ' He did not doubt, but Dr Freind was ' charged upon oath, and privately declared to several Members, that they had positive proof of his ' being guilty of the blackest and basest Treason.' Mr Shippen then suggesting, ' That Dr Freind's having spoke so warmly two days before in Mr Kelly's, ' and the Bishop of Rochester's behalf was, in his opinion, the reason of his being taken up the next day ' himself, and that at that rate there was an end of ' the liberty of speech, which every Member of that ' House had a right to.' Mr R. Walpole with a great deal of warmth replied, ' He wondered any ' gentleman could think any Ministry capable of so ' base a thing, as to take up any gentleman for what ' he said in that House without any other cause, when ' they knew themselves to be accountable as well as ' others for their actions,' adding, ' That they who ' made such insinuations, might more easily be proved ' to be Jacobites, than they could make out such an ' allegation against the Ministry;' Mr Pulteney spoke on the same side, and in relation to Dr Freind's speaking in Kelly's behalf, ' observed, that it was usual in ' all conspiracies, for one traitor to endeavour to excuse another.' Mr Shippen animadverted severely upon this reflection, saying, ' It was not to be endured to have a Member of that House called a ' traitor, before he was convicted as such.' But Mr Pulteney having explained himself, that matter ended, and then the motion for an address was carried without dividing.

We have observed in the text, that on the twenty-first of June following he was admitted to bail, his sureties being Dr Mead, Dr Hulse, Dr Levett, and Dr Hale. On the first day of Michaelmas term following he appeared at the King's-Bench Bar, and November 28, 1723, being the last day of Michaelmas term, Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk; Charles Boyle, Earl of Orrery; William North, Lord North and Grey; Dennis Kelly, Esq; John Freind, Esq; M. D. and Thomas Cockran, Esq; who had been prisoners in the Tower, and were admitted to bail, appeared on their recognizances, and were discharged (17).

[N] Was the better for it.] The title of this short work at large, runs thus.

Joannis Freind ad Ricardum Mead, M. D. de quibusdam Variolarum generibus Epistola. That is, An Epistle to Dr Richard Mead, concerning some particular kind of the small pox. This letter is dated March the thirtieth, 1723, and begins thus (18). ' Enjoying, Sir, unexpectedly, abundance of leisure, and my ' mind being even in this confinement not over sollicitous, I thought I could not better employ my ' vacant hours, than in cultivating my former studies, ' and adding a few observations to what I have already ' writ, concerning acute diseases. And indeed, I the ' more willingly undertake it, since I learn from that ' elegant book concerning the small pox, which Helvetius has lately presented us with, that that learned ' author has either trod in our steps in his method of ' cure, or at least set out in the same road with us. ' I read that work over, I cannot say whether with ' greater eagerness or pleasure. So diligently has this ' learned and experienced practitioner traced out the ' various and greatly dissimilar kinds of the small pox, ' so wisely delivered the whole method of cure, that ' he alone has happily supplied many things, which ' have hitherto been wanting in the generality of authors. But neither has this gentleman explained ' every thing so fully, but that this Province seems by ' a certain fatality to be reserved for you, Sir, namely ' that you should one day give us a full and compleat ' account of the nature and difference of the several ' kinds of the small pox, a work which I know you ' have long since undertaken.' There are two things remarkable in this paragraph, the first is, that in so short a time, so judicious, and so eminent a Physician as Helvetius, should embrace the practice recommended by Dr Freind, or should think proper to declare publickly on its behalf, if he had embraced it before, for in either case his book is decisive against the calumnies of those who had attacked our author and his friends. If concurrence in opinion amongst the most distinguished in any profession of different nations, is not sufficient to establish the reasonableness of any point in which they concur, there is no such thing as authority, neither can there be any criterion whatever of notions agreeing with, or being contrary to, good sense. It is true, indeed, that a wise man may be elaborate work, his celebrated HISTORY of PHYSICK, from the time of Galen to the cloſe of the XVIth century; the firſt part of which was publiſhed in 1725, and the ſecond in the year following (n). In reſpect both to uſe and elegance, it may be juſtly ſtiled a great and maſterly performance, worthy of the reputation of it's author, and capable of rendering ſingular ſervice to young Phyſicians, nothing comparable to it, either in point of judgment or accuracy, having been before publiſhed in any language. Theſe were the ſentiments of ſome of the ableſt men in the Faculty, at the time it came abroad; and the work having always kept up it's credit, and being ſtill in as much eſteem as ever, ſhews that their opinion was not ill founded [O]. There were, however, certain circumſtances that be in the wrong; but that a falſe or abſurd poſition ſhould, by a dint of argument, be impoſed upon men of the greateſt credit for wiſdom, capacity, and learning, where there is no connection of intereſt, and not the leaſt viſible motive to warp them from the love of fame and truth, is not to be comprehended. The ſecond remarkable particular, is the zeal with which he recommends that learned perſon's treatiſe to whom he writes, which has ſince appeared, tho' at a great diſtance of time, and does the ſame credit to our author's judgment, as his language here and elſewhere, to the ſincerity of his friendſhip. He hated flattery as much as he deſpiſed calumny, but he had a peculiar pleaſure in praiſing merit, and never miſſed any occaſion of paying a juſt tribute of applauſe where it was due. The laſt paragraph of his epiſtle is as remarkable as the firſt, the whole of it demonſtrates the ſoundneſs of his head, and theſe paſſages are peculiar proofs of the uprightneſs of his heart (19). 'Dear Sir, ſays 'he in the concluſion, farewel, and of this be aſſured 'that where ever I am, fortune will never have it in 'her power to efface that remembrance of your friend-'ſhip which gratitude will ever oblige me to pre-'ſerve.'

[O] Was not ill founded.] The title of this very learned and uſeful treatiſe at large, runs thus.

The Hiſtory of Phyſic from the time of Galen to the beginning of the ſixteenth Century, chiefly with regard to Practice: in a diſcourſe written to Dr Mead by J. Freind, M. D. London 1725. 8vo. The ſecond vol. 1726. 8vo.

Our author divides his Hiſtory of Phyſic into three parts, of which the firſt contains the Greek Phyſicians after Galen, the ſecond relates to the Arabian Phyſicians, and the third takes in the Moderns. To give a long account of a book at once remarkable and valuable for its brevity would be abſurd, and yet it is abſolutely neceſſary that we ſhould give the reader ſome notion of the contents of its three parts, and of the advantage ariſing to the ſtudy of medicine, from the indefatigable pains he has taken in this reſpect. In the firſt part then, he ſettles very exactly the time in which Oribaſius, Aëtius, Alexander, and Paulus, flouriſhed, which was a point ſo much the more neceſſary, as great miſtakes have been made about them, ſo that in reality nothing had been written, even with reſpect to their hiſtory, that could be depended upon, 'till it became the ſubject of our author's pen. It is acknowledged, that the chief merit of theſe authors lay in their compiling, what had been written before their time by others, and more eſpecially by Galen; yet there are ſome things in them new as well as ſome antient fragments preſerved in their collections, which are not to be met with any where elſe. He inſiſts particularly upon what they have preſerved relating to Surgery. He ſhews that ſome things which are commonly regarded as modern diſcoveries or inventions, were actually known to them; as for inſtance, the ſalival glands, the uſe of iſſues, ſetons, cauteries, and of acupuncture in caſe of dropſies. He then proceeds, to ſuch of the Greek Phyſicians as lived after theſe. He inſiſts upon the deſcription of the plague, by Procopius and Evagrius; and concludes from the accuracy of the former, that he muſt have been a Phyſician. He maintains, that the art of diſtilling liquors was actually known to the Greeks. He deſcribes from theſe writers two very ſtrange diſtempers that were not very rare in thoſe days, and which in ours however are never mentioned; the firſt a kind of worms, and the other a ſort of melancholy madneſs, when men wandered in deſolate places, and howled like wolves. He commends ſome remedies that were then in uſe, and which are ſince in a great meaſure fallen into oblivion, ſuch as ſcarification, and on ſome occaſions opening an artery, with a multitude of other uſeful obſervations and remarks, ſo much the more valuable as they are delivered with great ſimplicity and ſuccinctneſs; ſo that at the very ſame time they do juſtice to the learning and abilities of the Antients, they are the moſt pregnant proofs of his own induſtry in collecting, and that happy facility with which he has diſpoſed them in proper order.

In the ſecond part he renders the ſame juſtice to the Arabians, he mentions ſuch diſeaſes as are no where to be found but in their writings, and likewiſe ſuch as were by them firſt deſcribed. He enters largely into the hiſtory of chirurgical operations. He ſhews that ſome uſeful inſtruments were invented, deſcribed, and even depicted by Albucaſis, concerning whoſe writings he had made very particular enquiries. As the ſmall pox firſt appeared amongſt the Arabians, ſo the very beſt deſcription of the different ſorts of that diſtemper, and of the methods of cure before the time of our Sydenham was written by Rhaſes. Of the truth of this, even the Engliſh reader may now be a judge, ſince a tranſlation of that curious piece has been publiſhed in our own language (*). By theſe writers there are not only many things preſerved, that were contained in the books of the Greek Phyſicians now loſt, but they have added alſo of their own invention, many gentle and moderate purges, taught the advantages of moderate Phlebotomy, made us acquainted with Chymiſtry, and with ſeveral uſeful compoſitions that have long had a place, and are not like to be very ſoon diſcarded from our beſt Diſpenſatories.

(*) By way of Appendix to Dr Mead's book upon that ſubject.

In the third part we have the Hiſtory of Phyſic, as practiſed and improved by the Moderns; he not only mentions, but deſcribes the ſchools of Salernum, Naples, Montpellier, and Bononia. The Hiſtory of Chymiſtry more eſpecially in this kingdom, from the time of the celebrated Roger Bacon, who was perfectly ſkilled in this, and all other parts of uſeful learning, is clearly and conciſely laid down. He gives us a view of that dreadful plague, which raged about the middle of the fourteenth Century, which is ſucceeded by the deſcription of the ſweating ſickneſs, which was peculiar to the Engliſh nation, and of which there were five returns. He enters into a ſhort, but ſatisfactory, hiſtory of the venereal diſeaſe, which is thought to have taken its riſe from our firſt correſpondence with the Weſt Indies, about the end of the fifteenth Century, as the ſcurvy is believed to be produced about the ſame time, or a little earlier, from the inconveniences attending the long voyages by the Cape of Good Hope to the Eaſt. Neither is our author at all forgetful of his own country, but furniſhes us with excellent memoirs of ſuch phyſical writers as flouriſhed here, more eſpecially of the famous Linacre who lived under Henry the Seventh, and Henry the Eighth, who founded two Lectures of Phyſic at Oxford, and one at Cambridge, and who procured the original charter for incorporating the Royal College of Phyſicians, with the hiſtory of which foundation, and a very juſt encomium thereon he finiſhes his work. We may even from this ſhort and imperfect ſketch of the out lines of his performance, diſcern the great utility and real value of ſuch a hiſtory, which, tho' very ſuccinct, muſt have coſt him incredible labour, and could never have been drawn up in ſo eaſy, ſo elegant, and ſo natural a manner, but by a perſon of his great ſagacity and extenſive learning. We need not wonder therefore, that it was quickly tranſlated into French, and received in that language with as great, if not greater, applauſe than it met with here at home. The Latin tranſlation publiſhed with the reſt of his medical that attended the publication of this judicious and learned treatiſe, which raiſed the prejudices of ſome againſt it, more eſpecially in a neighbouring country, where it was thought that our author had dealt a little too ſeverely with Mr Daniel le Clerc (o), and that this uſage might juſtify repriſals, in which there was a pretty ſtrong mixture of invective, as the reader will be informed, more at large, at the bottom of the page [P]. This attack from abroad, works, has contributed to make it ſtill more generally known, and is ſo much the more valuable as it contains ſome additional corrections and explanations taken from his own notes upon the Engliſh original. We may the more boldly advance this, ſince within two years after the publication of our author's medical works at London, there came out a new edition at Paris (20), that in the title page was affirmed to be more accurate than correct; which could not have happened, if the demand for his writings had not been very great in conſequence of his credit as a Phyſician, being thoroughly eſtabliſhed in all parts of Europe, and of this ſome farther inſtances will neceſſarily occur in the ſucceeding note.

[P] At the bottom of the page.] We have obſerved in the foregoing note, that our author's Hiſtory of Phyſic had not been long publiſhed in Engliſh, before it was tranſlated into French, and this tranſlation had no ſooner ſeen the light, than the book was attacked in Holland by a famous journaliſt, who gave his cenſure the following title (21).

Réponſe à ce qu' a écrit Mr Freind concernant diverſes fautes, qu'il prétend avoir trouvées dans un petit ouvrage de Mr le Clerc, intitulé Eſſai d'un Plan, &c. That is, 'An anſwer to what Mr Freind has written 'concerning ſeveral faults that he pretends to have 'found in a little work of Mr le Clerc's,' &c.'

Theſe animadverſions were written in defence of Dr Daniel le Clerc, the three former parts of whoſe Hiſtory of Phyſic Dr Freind had highly extolled, but had ſpoken ſomewhat ſlightly of the ſupplement to that work publiſhed in the new edition of 1723, and repreſented it as not only a very imperfect and ſuperficial performance, but in many particulars inaccurate and erroneous. The author of the Memoir in the Bibliotheque obſerves, that it will be no difficult matter to ſhew that Dr Freind had not a juſt idea of the piece which he ſo raſhly condemns, but that he is miſtaken in ſeveral points. For firſt he did not underſtand what Dr le Clerc's meaning was by theſe words, Eſſay d'un Plan pour ſervir à la Continuation de l'Hiſtoire de la Medicine, which Dr Freind thought to be the ſame, as if Dr le Clerc had ſaid, that that Plan was a Continuation or a Sequel of the Hiſtory of Phyſic, whereas the author only meant it as a plan or rough draught, which might be of uſe to ſuch as would undertake to bring that hiſtory down to the time which he has mentioned. The author of the Memoir proceeds then to vindicate Dr le Clerc from the particular exceptions of Dr Freind, and concludes with obſerving, that as the plan of the former contains but ſix or ſeven ſheets, if it were true, that there are as many errors in it as the latter pretends, one might juſtly conclude, as Dr Freind has done, that it is a very imperfect, ſuperficial, inaccurate, and erroneous performance. 'But I think, ſays the writer, that I have 'ſufficiently demonſtrated that nothing could be charged 'on Dr le Clerc with leſs reaſon, not to ſay more 'lightly, ſince, if there are faults they are few and inconſiderable. However, ſuch as they are, if Dr 'Freind had contented himſelf with ſetting him right, 'he was at liberty to do it, but to endeavour, as he 'has done, to find errors where there are none, it is 'what one ſhould not have expected, and what has 'occaſioned this anſwer.'

It is a point of juſtice certainly due to the memory of Dr Freind, to examine what is here charged impartially, as in juſtice to the publick we could not omit the charge. Dr Daniel le Clerc, brother to the celebrated Mr John le Clerc, wrote, as has been ſaid, a Hiſtory of Phyſic, which was juſtly admired and applauded. This Hiſtory reached no lower than the time of Galen, but upon publiſhing a new edition in 1723, there was a little piece added to it, which in the title page of that new edition is ſtiled, un Plan pour ſervir à la Continuation de cette Hiſtoire depuis la fin du Siecle II. juſques au milieu du XVII. That is, a Plan which may ſerve as a Continuation of that Hiſtory, from the end of the ſecond age to the middle of the ſeventeenth. It was after the peruſal of this, that Dr Freind finding himſelf much diſappointed, and having a ſtrong idea in his mind of the uſefulneſs of a proper continuation of ſo good a book, determined to employ the leiſure he had in the Tower, for there it appears that he conceived the whole, and executed a part of his deſign in writing ſuch a hiſtory in compoſing ſuch a work. When he had taken this reſolution, it was neceſſary for him to expreſs it, more eſpecially as he wrote to a particular friend, the preſent Dr Mead (22), and this he does in the following manner.

'Sir, you will forgive me, that I was a little impatient to ſee a new edition of Mr le Clerc's Hiſtory 'of Phyſic, for you know very well what a great opinion I have always had of the learning and judgment 'which he has ſhewn in the three parts already publiſhed. In them he brought down the Hiſtory to 'the end of Galen's time, and having ſearched into 'his works, and into thoſe of all the writers, who 'preceded him for above ſix hundred years, he put 'together his memoirs, not only with indefatigable 'induſtry, but with exquiſite ſkill. We find there 'very amply and clearly repreſented all the philoſophy, the theory, and practice of the antient Phyſicians; ſo that there is ſcarce a notion, a diſtemper, 'a medicine, or even the name of an author to be 'met with among them, of which he has not given 'a full and exact account.

'In this edition we have a plan containing fifty 'ſix pages, which he deſigns ſhould ſerve for a continuation of the Hiſtory down to the middle of the 'ſixteenth, the title by miſtake ſays the ſeventeenth 'Century, a ſpace of twelve hundred years, and too 'large to be well explained, in ſo ſhort a ſketch, tho' 'he had not filled half of it, with relating all the obſcure jargon and nonſenſe of that illiterate Enthuſiaſt 'Paracelſus.

'You deſire that I would ſend you my thoughts of 'this piece, I muſt own I wiſh I could give it the 'ſame character which the former very juſtly deſerved. But it ſeems to me not only a very imperfect and ſuperficial performance, but in many particulars inaccurate and erroneous. I ſhall, in compliance with your commands, make a few curſory remarks touching the Hiſtory of Phyſic within this 'period, but as I have not the opportunity of having 'much recourſe to books, tho' indeed at preſent I 'have leiſure enough, you muſt not expect any thing 'which is either correct or perfect, and muſt be ſatisfied only with ſome looſe obſervations, ſuch as my 'memory chiefly can at preſent furniſh me with, and 'which a ſhort review of ſome of theſe authors can 'ſuggeſt.'

The reader ſees clearly that our author could not write without mentioning Dr le Clerc, and he ſees alſo how he has treated him. What is ſaid in the French Memoir of not underſtanding the title of Le Clerc's ſupplemental piece is weak enough; for if our author did not underſtand it, it muſt have been becauſe it is not to be underſtood, for, an Eſſay, of a Plan, of a Supplement; cannot be made ſenſe in any language. That Dr Freind did not conſider it as a Supplement is plain, for if he had he would not have wrote another, neither did he conceive it a Plan, for then he would have followed it, but he tells us plainly what he took it for, and which is not a little ſtrange, Mr John le Clerc confeſſes in his Memoir, that it was preciſely what he calls it, an imperfect and ſuperficial performance. Imperfect, as it does not come up to what it promiſes; and ſuperficial, as it is not collected from original authors. We ſhall in the next note mention Dr Baillie's defence of our author, and therefore here we will confine ourſelves to matters which he has not mentioned; in the firſt place it is obſervable, that the Memoir writer confeſſes that he never ſaw abroad, on the character of Dr Freind, met with ſome countenance here from thoſe who were piqued againſt him before, and who were in hopes, that, with the aſſiſtance of theſe auxiliaries from the Continent, they might be able to run him down; but, as in former combats, ſo in this, they were ſoon made ſenſible of their want of ſtrength (p). It was defended in a pamphlet by Dr John Baillie (q), againſt the united forces both of the Engliſh and French criticks; and the publick ſeemed to be perfectly ſatisfied with what was therein advanced, and with the contents of the author's book, which, with it's title, very plainly proved that ſome who cenſured it miſapprehended his deſign, or at leaſt wrote in ſuch a manner as that he might be ſenſible they had other cauſes of reſentment, than thoſe that were avowed in the preſent quarrel [Q]. That ſeverity which Dr Freind had met with, from thoſe who differed, our author's original work, but took the matter of his charge from the Tranſlation, which is the leſs excuſable, ſince he well underſtood Engliſh, and it might be ſhewn that our author made uſe of milder terms than his tranſlator. In the next place he ſtates the matter a little unfairly, in not taking notice that Dr Freind juſtifies and commends le Clerc's obſervations in many places, tho' he differs from him in others, which plainly ſhews he had an eſteem for that gentlemen, tho' in reſpect to the ſtudy of Phyſic, he could not commend an imperfect and ſuperficial work. Beſides, there are various objections made by our author to Dr le Clerc's Hiſtory, which are paſſed by in the Memoir without any notice at all; we may add to this, that ſometimes diſingenuity, and even falſehood, are called in to ſupport one Doctor and to refute the other. This fact requires an inſtance; that inſtance ſhall be given; Dr Freind ſays, that the celebrated Fallopius lived later than le Clerc has placed him, becauſe he publiſhed his Lectures in 1555 (23). The Memoir writer complains he does not underſtand this, for that Gabriel Fallopius died in 1562 (24). It is very true he did ſo, but the point is where Dr le Clerc placed him? He ſays poſitively that he was born in 1490, and the common complaint of all writers that mention him is, that he was cut off in the flower of his age, that is, when he wanted a year of forty. How then does his reading Lectures in 1555 agree with this date, or how was it poſſible that he ſhould read thoſe Lectures, if he died ſo young? The truth is, he was born in 1523 (25), that is, thirty three years after the time aſſigned by Dr le Clerc. What pretence therefore for calling either the meaning or the truth of Dr Freind's aſſertion in queſtion? The proper buſineſs of a Journaliſt, is to acquaint the world with the contents and characters of new works, but the author of this Journal, inſtead of inſerting an extract of a new and valuable book, inſerts a Memoir againſt it, which was treating his readers very indifferently, as well as the Engliſh Phyſician very unfairly (26). Father Niceron (27) who was a very impartial judge, decides this matter very clearly. 'John le Clerc, ſays he, complained of the diſobliging manner in which he has ſpoken of the Plan, which his brother Daniel le Clerc had given for the Continuation of his Hiſtory of Phyſic. Freind propoſed himſelf to give ſuch a Continuation which he has very learnedly executed.' No exceptions can be taken to this judgment, Father Niceron had ſeen the books, and heard the parties, with neither of whom he had any connection.

[Q] In the preſent quarrel] The title of the piece which we have mentioned in the text, and which is indeed a full anſwer to all that is ſaid in the French Memoir, in the firſt edition runs at full length thus.

A Letter to Dr ——— in anſwer to a tract in the Bibliotheque Ancienne & Moderne, relating to ſome paſſages in Dr Freind's Hiſtory of Phyſic. Lond. 1728. 8vo

Mr Baillie obſerves, that one would imagine upon viewing the number of pages in the piece abovementioned, Dr Freind had certainly been guilty of a great many miſtakes, and that Mr le Clerc had been very groſsly miſrepreſented. Yet upon looking into this critic, ſays he, we find nothing like this, and that, however vigorous in general he appears in Mr le Clerc's defence, he nevertheleſs acknowledges moſt of the errors alledged againſt him, and this not faintly, but in full as ſtrong expreſſions as the Doctor himſelf uſes. To give one inſtance of his manner of treating his antagoniſt, 'The Memoir writer, ſays he, goes on with 'his uſual evaſions in the diſpute concerning the perſon who firſt introduced Chymiſtry into Phyſic. Mr le Clerc had affirmed in his Plan, that Avicenna was the perſon. The Doctor is of opinion if this practice be, as perhaps it may be derived, from the Arabians, the honour of the invention ought rather to be reſtored to Rhaſes, becauſe he wrote firſt, and firſt mentioned medicines made by a chymical proceſs. This the anſwerer cannot avoid owning, and acknowledges that the oil of Bricks in Rhaſes is a chymical medicine, and propoſed by him as a cure in many diſtempers. This he confeſſes Mr le Clerc overlooked, when he ſaid there was no mention of any chymical remedy in the writers of Phyſic, who lived before Avicenna. One would think that after ſaying ſo much, there was no way left of evading the force of Dr Freind's arguments. For the Doctor ſays nothing more upon this head againſt the plan, than this defender of it: but obſerve his uſual way of chicane; he goes on and ſays, that altho' Mr le Clerc be miſtaken in this article, it does not from thence follow that the honour of the invention of chymical medicines belongs to Rhaſes. I fancy you could not have gueſſed at his reaſon, had you not ſeen the piece itſelf, what tho' this Arabian writer does not pretend he invented or firſt diſcovered the manner of preparing the medicines he treats of? Is that any thing to the purpoſe? The diſpute was not, who invented or who did not. The ſingle queſtion is, who is the firſt Arabick author who mentions a chymical medicine? Is there any one before Rhaſes? If not, who knows but he did introduce it firſt, and perhaps invent it, at leaſt it is a ſufficient proof that Avicenna did neither. This inſtance amongſt others may give you the reaſon, why I called this critic's piece the pretended defence of Mr le Clerc's Plan. For almoſt in every place he gives up Mr le Clerc, and ſeems fully ſatisfied if he can only cavil at the Doctor.' At the cloſe of his pamphlet he tells us, that 'the defender of Dr le Clerc ſet out with the mighty appearance of running down every thing which was objected againſt the Plan, and yet in the iſſue yields up every thing. This certainly muſt appear a very burleſque defence to the greateſt favourers of the Supplement. For what can be more ridiculous than to pretend he would defend an author, and yet in almoſt every inſtance to own he is in the wrong? To be convinced that he does this, you need do no more than call your eye back on the three principal points in diſpute. Does he not acknowledge Mr le Clerc's error in the ages of Oribaſius, Aetius, Alexander, and Paulus? And notwithſtanding his ſophiſtical ſubterfuges, doth he deny that ſome of the Greeks mention Rhubarb contrary to Mr le Clerc's aſſertion? Nay, doth he not in expreſs terms own it? After the ſame manner, doth he not confeſs that Rhaſes firſt introduced Chymiſtry into Phyſic? And as to the age of Fallopius, he ſays Mr le Clerc is deceived in it.' This gentleman however, acknowledges a miſtake in Dr Freind in the ſpelling of Aetius with Æ inſtead of an a and an e ſeparate, every one knows it is Ἀέτιος in the Greek, and yet very commonly it is writ with an Æ in Latin, as you may ſee in ſeveral books. So the iſland Aeria is very often writ Æria, though no doubt it is the Ἀερία of Stephanus. He believes the Doctor likewiſe to be miſtaken, when he ſays that Dr le Clerc ſuppoſes the Vena Medinenſis, the ſame as another diſtemper deſcribed by the Arabians, and called the Aſſa Bovina; and I dare ſay, continues he, 'the Doctor, upon conſidering the paſſage in the 'Supplement again, will own that theſe two diſeaſes differed, or ſuppoſed they differed, with him in political principles, was amply recompenced, ſoon after he obtained his liberty, by the favour he met with at the Court of the King now on the throne, then Prince of Wales, who entruſted him with the care of ſome of his Royal Family when indiſpoſed, and who under it happily recovered (r). Upon his Majeſty's acceſſion, he became Phyſician to the late Queen, who honoured him with her confidence and eſteem (s), which naturally increaſed the circle of his practice, that was of large extent before. How equal ſoever his talents might be to that prodigious weight of buſineſs which was thrown upon his ſhoulders, it quickly appeared that his conſtitution could by no means bear ſo great a fatigue; he ſtruggled againſt it as much as he was able, he concealed his weakneſs, he was ſilent as to the decay of his ſtrength; in ſhort, he preferred his duty to his ſafety, and to the preſervation of the health of others ſacrificed his own

' are there plainly diſtinguiſhed. So far is true, and ' the Doctor's expreſſions are no doubt too general in ' this caſe, and, what I believe he is not very often ' guilty of, a little unguarded. But what he intended, ' I ſuppoſe, was chiefly this, to ſhew that even the ' Affectio Bovina, deſcribed at large by the Arabians, ' and in a ſeparate article, was not a diſtemper un- ' known, as Mr le Clerc aſſerts, to the Greeks. For ' Aetius, as the Doctor remarks, mentions the little ' Dracunculi as well as the great, which latter the Ara- ' bians call the Vena Medinenſis. And what Aven ' Zoar, Alſaharavius, and Albucaſis, ſay of the for- ' mer, amounts to nothing more than what Aetius had ' in general and in ſhort ſaid before, that the worms in ' this caſe were little.' Theſe conceſſions ſhew the candour and ingenuity of Dr Baillie, and they ſhew at the ſame time how little foundation there was for the clamour raiſed againſt our author, as if he had endeavoured to raiſe his own reputation by depreſſing that of Dr Daniel le Clerc; whereas he commends him highly and frequently, and corrects him only where it was requiſite, and that too in a manner which ought not to have given any offence, more eſpecially when it is conſidered, that the far greater part of his corrections are in the juſtification of writers long ſince deceaſed, and for whoſe memories Dr Freind thought himſelf obliged to ſhew a due concern.

We have now done with this litttle treatiſe, conſidered in the light of a defence, at leaſt in regard to the French memoir; but there is a paſſage at the beginning of this performance, which, for the reader's ſatisfaction, it is neceſſary ſhould be explained. That paſſage runs thus.

' Tho' the juſtneſs and truth of all Dr Freind's writ- ' tings are ſufficient to bear them out, yet there are ' many who have an appetite for nothing but anſwers ' and replys, and who entirely form their judgment of ' the author from his antagoniſt. Theſe men very of- ' ten read the anſwer, without ever having looked into ' the original, and as confidently determine, as if they ' had, with the utmoſt care and exactneſs, read it over ' and over. Were it not for this unaccountable and ' diſingenuous turn in ſome readers, and a ſtrange ne- ' gligence and inadvertency in others, who, out of in- ' dolence or incapacity, ſeldom uſe their own judg- ' ment, but muſt have every thing minutely pointed ' out to them. I ſay, were it not for theſe two things, ' I muſt confeſs the following remarks would be entire- ' ly uſeleſs. For a careful reader, with but an ordinary ' underſtanding, by peruſing the hiſtory, and annota- ' tor's criticiſms, would quickly ſee the juſtneſs of the ' former's obſervations, and the fallacy of thoſe in the ' latter. Yet I make no doubt, as inconſiderable a ' writer as this annotator is, his having attacked an au- ' thor of reputation, will be reaſon ſufficient to tran- ' ſlate him into Engliſh, with a prolix preface, con- ' taining probably a tedious repetition of the critic's er- ' rors; for none but an author of a very low ſize would ' undertake ſuch a work. And if ſuch a notable per- ' formance ſhould come out, we ſhall find it, I dare ' ſay, writ with ſo much wit, learning, and in ſo good ' language; with ſo much perſpicuity, modeſty, and ' manners, that it will not be at all difficult to gueſs ' at it's author, however his name ſhould happen to be ' inverted.'

The firſt part of this paragraph explains very properly the cauſes which render theſe literary eclairciſſments ſo neceſſary, or at leaſt ſo acceptable. Let us proceed then to ſhew what is the true ſenſe, and genuine meaning, of theſe obſcure inſinuations. Immediately after our author's book appeared, it was attacked with the utmoſt indignation, unallay'd with the ſmalleſt regard to temper or decency, in a piece which bore the following title.

Obſervations on Dr Freind's Hiſtory of Phyſick, ſhewing ſome falſe Repreſentations of antient and modern Phyſicians; by C. W. M. D. Fellow of the Royal College of Phyſicians in Edinburgh. London 1726, 8*vo*.

The very firſt paragraph will ſufficiently ſupport what has been before hinted, as to the heat of this author's reſentment, abundantly diſcovered in the acrimony of his ſtile. ' Dr Freind's principal ſcheme in ' writing his Hiſtory of Phyſick, ſays he, was to repre- ' ſent himſelf firſt, and after him Dr Mead, as the only ' Phyſicians at this time, in London eſpecially. As for ' Hiſtory, that is made ſubſervient to the mentioned ' deſign; and indeed that part of the performance is ' very imperfect and ſuperficial, he ſeeming now to ' corrupt the hiſtory of phyſick, and to abuſe men ' by a corrupted hiſtory. Did I propoſe to examine ' the book, it might be made very manifeſt, that ' he was little acquainted with his authors, and leſs in ' what they excelled. His great unhappineſs is moſt ' commonly to propoſe their errors, or their weak- ' eſt performances, to our imitation; ſo that the ' miſtake ſhould not be great, if I affirmed that his end ' ſeems to be a banter on the antient as well as our ' own Phyſicians. All theſe his talents, will ſufficient- ' ly appear in the following examination of that part of ' the book which at preſent falls under our conſidera- ' tion.' He proceeds afterwards to refute what Dr Freind had advanced, that the antient Phyſicians never had a noſtrum, or a ſecret medicine, and that a noſtrum is the peculiar and diſtinguiſhed mark of a Quack; and affirms, that Phyſicians of every ſect, both rational and empirics, had their noſtrums, and that from antient times down to this day; and, among the moderns, he particularly inſtances in Dr Cockburn, a moſt rational Phyſician, ſays he, who has always vindicated this antient practice, and has an Arcanum. The author defends likewiſe, Dr Cockburn's book concerning the gonorrhæa, and his tables of doſes, in oppoſition to what Dr Freind had urged from Avenzoar, that it is vain and uſeleſs (28), ' to pretend to find out the proportionable ' quantity and quality of any purge, ſo as to ſquare it ' exactly to the conſtitution of the patient, and the ' nature of the humours to be diſcharged; and calcu- ' late it ſo as not to be even a hair under or over, ſince ' ſuch ſpeculations contribute very little to form a judg- ' ment about any right method of cure.' Within a very ſhort time after the publication of Dr Baillie's pamphlet, there came abroad another ſhrewd piece, under the following title.

(28) Hiſtory of Phyſick, Vol. II. P. 77.

An Anſwer to what Dr Freind has written in his Hiſtory of Phyſick, concerning ſeveral miſtakes which he pretends to have found in a ſhort work of Dr le Clerc, intituled, An Eſſay of a Plan, &c. tranſlated from the Eighth Article of the Bibliotheque ancienne & moderne. Vol. XXVII. Part ii. By Mr le Clerc. To which is added, a Preface by W. Cockburn, M. D.

Upon the whole it is manifeſt, that what Dr Baillie had in view, was to intimate to the publick, that the ſending this tranſlation into the world, was the mere effects of perſonal reſentment; and that W. C. M. D. was the ſame perſon with C. W. Fellow of the Royal College of Phyſicians at Edinburgh; which is likewiſe agreeable to what we have hinted in the text of this article.

own (t). His health having been for ſome time on the decline, a fever at length enſued, which preſently affected his head; and tho' in this, as well as in former illneſſes, he had all the aſſiſtance that the Faculty could give, yet even that aſſiſtance proved vain; and the power of medicine being far inferior to the violence of the diſeaſe, he expired July the ſixth 1728, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age (u). Their Majeſties expreſſed the greateſt concern on the news of his illneſs, and appeared very much affected with that of his death. The penſion ſettled upon his widow, ſufficiently declared how large a ſhare this worthy perſon had in the Royal eſteem (w). He was buried in the church of Hitcham in Buckinghamſhire, near which he had a ſeat; but there is a cenotaph erected, with a ſuitable inſcription to his memory, in Weſtminſter-Abbey (x) [R], a mark of filial piety in his only ſon, but of little conſequence to his fame, which his writings have rendered extenſive and immortal. Dr Wigan publiſhed his Latin works, and added to them his Hiſtory of Phyſick, tranſlated into the ſame language, with an excellent hiſtorical preface, and a grateful commemoration of his obligations to the deceaſed (y). To theſe, his medical works, a moſt elegant dedication is prefixed, to his Royal Patroneſs the late Queen, by his brother Dr Robert Freind (z); and if, after all theſe glorious monuments, this article ſhould be eſteemed

[R] To his memory in Weſtminſter-Abbey.] How little neceſſary ſoever a cenotaph, with an inſcription, might be for preſerving the memory of an author whoſe reputation extended ſo far, and was eſtabliſhed ſo well; yet it muſt be allowed, that this was no improper, or unſeaſonable, teſtimony of reſpect to this excellent perſon. He had himſelf rendered the like kind office to more than one of his freinds. The inſcription on the monument erected to the memory of the famous Mr John Phillips, by the Lord Chancellor Harcourt, was penned by our author. That copious and elegant character of the Right Reverend Dr Thomas Sprat, Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter, and his ſon the Archdeacon, appear, from what is ſaid at the foot of the tomb-ſtone, to have fallen from the pen of Dr Freind, who was peculiarly happy in this kind of compoſitions. It may however be with truth affirmed, that the following lines are not at all inferior to his own, and conſequently deſerve to be remembered. They are conceived in the following terms,

John Freind, Doctor of Phyſic.
Firſt Phyſician
To the moſt ſerene Queen Caroline.
Whom when once her penetrating judgment had approved,
His univerſal reputation in Phyſic,
Was but equal to the favour expreſſed to him by the Royal Family.
His diſpoſition was benevolent and highly liberal,
Towards his acquaintance affectionate,
Of his Friendſhips
(Even when attended with danger to himſelf)
Moſt tenacious.
None in reſpect to obligations
Was on others more ready to confer,
Or if received with a willing gratitude to remember.
While a very youth diſtinguiſhed by his writings.
And from his aſſiduous diligence as well in Latin as in his mother tongue,
His ſtile was perfectly polite.
That eloquence which he cultivated in retirement,
He had the courage as a Senator to diſplay.
The Belles Lettres at home and abroad claimed his attention,
But, as was fit, his whole abilities were bent,
To render him moſt expert in his profeſſion.
With how great ſucceſs the whole Engliſh world
Of every rank,
With what various knowledge the learned in every nation,
With what indefatigable ſtudy and induſtry
His friends not without tears ſhall declare.
Some wonder it may create,
That continually occupied,
And having ſo many avocations
He ſhould yet find time to write;
That to ſuſtain ſuch burthen he ſhould at length be unequal
Is not to be wondered at all.
He died therefore, in the flower of his age,
When only in his fifty ſecond year,
July 26. A. D. 1728.

But we muſt not imagine, that the praiſes of this great Phyſician were barely confined to his tombſtone; on the contrary, the celebrated Dr Keil acknowledging, that, at his perſwaſion, the piece he publiſhed was ſent to the preſs, makes him a compliment that can ſcarce be exceeded, and might poſſibly be regarded as a mere compliment, if the character of that worthy man did not ſet his ſincerity above ſuſpicion; his words are theſe, 'Eo editionem ſuadente, quem omnes & ſcribendi & docendi, Magiſtrum noſtræ Gentis ſi non aliarum omnium, maximum libenter agnoſcunt (29).' Theſe high high praiſes were beſtowed upon him in his life-time, from whence perhaps ſome objection might be made; but the force of that will be wholly taken away, when it is conſidered that the very ingenious and learned Dr Edward Wilmot, ſome years after his deceaſe, ſpoke of him in the higheſt terms of commendation and reſpect, repreſenting him as a deep Philoſopher, a learned Phyſician, an elegant Writer, and an ornament to Society; as being very honeſt and very humane, ever deſirous of doing good, and communicating knowledge to the utmoſt extent of his power; and a zealous defender of the rights of that learned Body before whom he ſpoke. The reader ſhall have his own words, as well as the ſenſe of them, becauſe a tranſlation could not be made, without manifeſt injury to the beauty of the expreſſion (30). 'Tanta de uno aliquo viro prædicari, magnum quidem eſt; majus autem, quod de tali viro prædicantur, qui nihil ſuum eſſe duxit, quod aliis beneficio eſſe poſſit. Si quid eximii, ſi quid reconditi habuit, (quid autem utriuſq; non habuit?) non ſolitariâ famâ contentus, in apertum liberè protulit. Scivit egregiè? ut alii itidem ſcirent, operam ſedulo dabat. Medicinæ peritus fuit? ut alii etiam eſſent, ſtudio flagrabat. Gloriam attigit? ſi aliorum accenderet, lucro apponebat, alienæ inſerviens, ſuæ profuſus. Secundum divini Senis effatum, ideo artem ſuam quamplurimum amans, quia hominum amantiſſimus. In malam rem abire jubebat, qui neſcio quod Arcanum ſuperbè venditabant; ſi non haberent falſos; ſi celarent invidos; utroque nomine aut neglectui aut odio habendos. Id nimirum patriæ, id ſuo & artis commodo inferviturum eſſe putabat, ſi alios ſui ſimiles inveniret, vel, quoad poſſet, faceret; & ut eſſent, omnia ſua cum illis communicabat, præceptis inſtituebat, exemplo præibat. Imperitiam Medico non opprobrio ſolum, ſed crimini vertere ſolabat; & mortuo nihil intereſſe, ſeu ignorantiâ ſeu fraude periret, benevole dictitabat. —— Cum legendis, condendis libris incumberet, & quotidianis muneris ſui officiis occuparetur, nec ſuæ, nec alienæ mille curæ circa caput ſalientes, impedimento erant, quo minus Rempublicam capeſſeret: auſpicato die Regni ſenatum intravit Vir ad omnia natus, & ſedem ſuam dignitate implevit, eloquentiâ ornavit. Medicinam proſperè fecerat, ſcriptis illuſtraverat, famâ auxerat; deerat in laudis cumulum, ut periclitanti opem ferret, in diſcrimen adductam eriperet. Nec in morâ res fuit; hanc etiam merenti partem oblatam avide arripuit, fortiter explevit: Collegii hujus jura, avita, ſanctiſſima, Regum dona, erant qui in jus vocabant, imminutum ibant. Accurrit, dixit, propugnavit; literarum fautor, artium patronus. Argumentis, auctoritate, gratiâ, ſuâ & artis felicitate, omnes in unam ſententiam diſcedentes habuit, & privilegia noſtra, non tantum ſarta tecta ſervavit, ſed confirmata, ampliata reddidit. Stetit reipublicæ noſtræ fortuna, illabata, integra, ſplendida, præſtigiatorum opprobrium; quod oppugnata fuerat, illuſtrior; quod inſidiis petita, munitior; quod à malevolis odia habita, bonis omnibus charior.' We have already, moved by his merit, and conducted by his reputation, carried this article to an extraordinary length, which is ſufficient to excuſe our not adding the teſtimonies of foreign writers; but, that we may not be entirely defective in this point, let us obſerve, that his writings were admired, and the notions he advanced applauded, by the greateſt men in the Profeſſion throughout Europe; ſuch as Hoffman, in Germany; Helvetius, and Hecquet, in France; and Boerhaave, in Holland (31); which abundantly demonſtrates his abilities in his profeſſion, and frees us from any apprehenſion that the praiſes given him by his countrymen and contemporaries, were tinctured with the zeal of their perſonal friendſhips. This indeed, might be in them excuſable, but not in us; for we do not cite authors as elegant panegyriſts, but for their exquiſite judgments, which, in this caſe, being corroborated by ſuch diſintereſted, as well as ſuch capable witneſſes, we may be ſatisfied, that, in theſe endeavours to do juſtice to his memory, whoſe writings have been ſo uſeful to his profeſſion, ſo honourable to his country, and ſo beneficial to mankind, we have done our duty as well as gratified our inclinations.

FROBISER, FROBISHER, FROBUSHER, or FORBISHER (Sir MARTIN) [A], a moſt excellent navigator, and ſea-officer in the XVIth century, was born near Doncaſter in Yorkſhire (a). Who were his parents, or in what year he was born, is not mentioned any where. But being brought up in his youth to Navigation, either through his own or his friends choice, he became one of the moſt eminent Sailors in his time: and was the firſt Engliſhman that attempted to find out a North-Weſt paſſage to China. For, having a thorough knowledge of the ſphere, and being extremely well ſkilled in his profeſſion, he judged, from his own experience, and many years obſervations both by ſea and land, that a Voyage that way was not only poſſible, but alſo moſt eaſily practicable. Having therefore well laid his deſign, he reſolved to go and put it himſelf in execution; But wanting ſhips and other neceſſaries for that purpoſe, which he could not procure at his ſole charge, he conſulted a long time with his private friends how to have his wants ſupplied. He made alſo many offers to ſeveral Engliſh merchants, even for a courſe of Fifteen years; but meeting at laſt with no ſufficient encouragement from them [B], he applied to Queen Elizabeth's Court, which, under her royal influence, promoted to the utmoſt the Trade and Navigation of England. And ſo, through the favour and countenance of her wiſe Miniſters, particularly of Ambroſe Dudley Earl of Warwick, he engaged a ſufficient number of Adventurers in the affair; and, by degrees, with no ſmall expence and pains, collected ſuch ſums of money as enabled him to fit himſelf out for his voyage. The ſhips he provided, were only three; namely, two ſmall Barks of about twenty-five tuns a-piece; named the Gabriel, and the Michael: the one commanded by himſelf, the other by Capt. Matthew Kinerſley; and a pinnace of ten tuns burthen (b). June 8, 1576, they ſailed from Deptford [C], and, bending their courſe Northward, came,

[A] FROBISHER, &c.] Thus variouſly is his name written, by ſuch of our own, or other authors, as mention him. But we are aſſured, that he uſed to ſubſcribe his letters, (of which ſeveral are extant in the Harleian Library of MSS.) by the name of Frobiſer.

[B] But meeting at laſt with no ſufficient encouragement from them.] The words of our author, George Beſt, as in Hakluyt (1), are, 'that hardly he was 'hearkened unto of the merchants, which never re- 'gard virtue, without ſure, certain, and preſent gains.' Too ſevere a reflexion!

(1) Ubi ſupra, p. 58.

[C] June 8. 1576, they ſailed from Deptford.] How much they were countenanced and encouraged by

came, the 24th of the ſame month, within ſight of Fara, or Faire-iſle, one of the iſlands of Shetland. Thence they caſt about to the Weſtward, in 59 degrees of latitude; and the 11th of July, being in 61 degrees, diſcovered Freeſeland bearing Weſt-North-Weſt, which ſtood high, and was all covered with ſnow [D]. Making towards it, they could not land, by reaſon of the ice, and depth of water, which, near the ſhore, was above 150 fathoms: The eaſt point of this iſland the Captain named Queen Elizabeth's Foreland. On the 28th of the ſaid month, in 62 degrees of latitude, they had ſight of Meta Incognita (c), being part of New Groenland; towards which advancing, they endeavoured to find out a harbour, and to land, but could not for the reaſons juſt now mentioned (d). Auguſt the 10th he went on a deſart iſland, three miles from the continent; but ſtay'd there only a few hours. The next day, in latitude 63 degrees 8 minutes, he entered into a Streight, which he called, and that hath ever ſince borne the name of, Forbiſher's Streight; and went as far as 60 leagues in it. On the 12th, ſailing to Gabriel's-iſland, they came to a Sound, which they named Prior's-Sound, and anchored in a ſandy bay there. The 15th they ſailed to Prior's-bay: the 17th to Thomas Williams's iſland: and the 18th came to an anchor under Burcher's iſland; where they went on ſhore, and had ſome communication with the natives [E]: but he was ſo unfortunate as to have five of his men, and a boat, taken by thoſe barbarians. Having endeavoured in vain to recover them, he ſet again ſail for England on the 26th of Auguſt; came within ſight of Freeſeland the 1ſt of September; and, notwithſtanding a terrible ſtorm on the 7th of the ſame month, he arrived ſafe at Harwich October the 2d (e). He took poſſeſſion of the country in the Queen of England's name; and, in token of ſuch poſſeſſion, ordered his men to bring him whatever they could firſt find. One, among the reſt, brought a piece of black ſtone, much like a ſea-coal, but very weighty. Having, at his return, diſtributed fragments of it among his friends, one of the adventurer's wives threw a fragment into the fire; which being taken out again, and quenched in vinegar, gliſtered like gold; and being tried by ſome refiners in London, was found to contain a rich quantity of that metal (f). From this Eſſay, the Nation dreaming of nothing but mountains of gold, great numbers earneſtly preſſed, and ſoon fitted out, Capt. Frobiſher to undertake a Second Voyage the very next Spring. The Queen lent him a ſhip of the royal navy, named the Aid, of 200 tun; and he had beſides two ſmall barks, of about 30 tuns a-piece: one named The Gabriel, and the other The Michael. His whole complement, of gentlemen, ſoldiers, and ſailors, was about 140 [F], furniſhed with victuals, and all other neceſſaries for half a year (g). May 26, 1577, they fell down to Graveſend [G], and two days after came to Harwich, where Capt. Forbiſher went on board; having been to take his leave of the Queen, who was then at the Earl of Warwick's ſeat in Eſſex. The Privy-Council having ſent him orders, not to take in more men than the number appointed him, he diſcharged ſeveral to their great grief: And ſetting ſail May 31, arrived in St Magnus Sound at the Orkney-iſlands June 7. After having taken there a few neceſſaries, they proceeded, June 8, on their voyage; and kept their courſe

Alſo that the other 'bark, named the Michael, conveyed themſelves 'away privately from him, and returned home, with 'a ſtrong report that he was caſt away.' Notwithſtanding theſe diſcouragements, and tho' his maſt was ſprung, and his top-maſt blown over board with extream foul weather, he continued his courſe (3).—— But the other relation of the ſame voyage, written by Chriſtopher Hall, Maſter of the Gabriel, mentions no ſuch thing (4).

But the women were marked in the face with blue ſtreaks, down the cheeks, and round the eyes. Their boats were made of ſeals-ſkins, with a keel of wood within the ſkins; flat at bottom, and ſharp at both ends (5). They appeared, by ſeveral circumſtances, to be a diſperſed and wandring nation, living in hords and troops, without any certain place of abode (6).

course West-North-West, for the space of 26 days, without sight of any land [H]. At length, on the 4th of July being in the latitude of 60 degrees and a half, they discovered Freeseland; along the coast of which they found islands of ice of incredible bigness [I]. Not having been able safely to land in this place, they proceeded for Forbisher's Streights, and, on the 17th of the said month, made the North-Foreland in them, otherwise named Hall's island (b); as also a smaller isle of the same name, where they had, in their last voyage, found the ore, but could not get now a piece so big as a wallnut. However, they met with good quantity of it in other adjacent islands. On the 19th they went upon Hall's greater island, to discover the country, and the nature of the inhabitants; with some of whom they traffick'd [K], and took one of them, neither in a very just nor handsome manner: And upon a Hill here, they erected a Column of Stones, which they called Mount Warwick. The 21st they discovered a Bay into which they anchored, and named it Jackman's Sound, from the Master's mate, who first lik'd the place. Upon a small island within it, called Smith's island (from one of that name who first set up his forge there), they found mines, both of silver and gold; but not sufficient, it seems, to merit their attention [L]. As they went along these streights, they landed on both sides, namely July 23d on the South side [M], and the 26th on the North side, without meeting any thing very remarkable. One of the Bays they anchored in, was named by them Beare's Sound, from James Beare Master of the Michael; and an island in it, Leicester's isle, in honour of Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester. Another bay received the appellation of Yorke's Sound, from Gilbert Yorke Captain of the Michael; under whose conduct, a party landing in an island there, had a bloody conflict with some of the natives, five or six of which they killed, and brought away a woman with her child [N]. Further up, they named

(b) He was master of the Gabriel, in the former voyage. Hakluyt, ubi supra, p. 63.

[H] Without sight of any land.] But they met great drifts of wood, and whole bodies of trees: which were either blown off the cliffs of the neareſt lands, by violent storms; or rooted up, and carried by floods into the sea. They imagined, that they were brought from some part of the Newfound-land, with the current that setteth from the West to the East (9).

(9) Hakluyt, ubi supra, p. 33, 61.

[I] Along the coast of which they found islands of ice of incredible bigness.] Some were seventy or eighty fathoms under water, besides the part that stood above water; and more than half a mile in circuit. Upon tasting the ice of which they consisted, it was found quite fresh without brackishness. From whence they concluded, that those islands were bred, in the sounds or bays adjoining, either from melted snow, or fresh rivers, and driven with the wind and tide along the coasts. For, as to their proceeding from the supposed Mare Glaciale, or frozen sea; that they looked upon as absurd (10).

(10) Ibid. p. 62.

[K] With some of whom they trafficked.] Their manner of trafficking was thus: two on each side met, without weapons, at a good distance from the rest of their company. And then laying down upon the ground what they could or chose to part withal, they retired a little. If the savages liked what the others had set down, they took it, leaving their own goods in exchange: but if they did not like what was put down, they took up again their own wares, and marched away (11).

(11) Ibid. p. 63.

[L] But not sufficient, it seems, to merit their attention.] Upon another island near, they found a Sea-Unicorn dead, about twelve foot long, and of a proportionable bigness; having a horn two yards long growing out of its snout, which they brought home, and is still kept at Windsor (12).

[M] Namely, July 23, on the South side.] What they did there, I shall relate in their own words. 'Our General commanding a trumpet to sound a call 'for every man to repair to the ensign, he declared 'to the whole company [being about seventy in number] how much the cause imported for the service 'of her Majestie, our countrey, our credits, and the 'safetie of our own lives; and therefore required 'every man to be conformable to order, and to be 'directed by those he should assigne. And he appointed for leaders, Captaine Fenton, Captaine 'Yorke, and his Lieutenant George Beste: which 'done, we cast ourselves into a ring, and all togither 'upon our knees, gave God humble thanks for that 'it had pleased him of his great goodness to preserve 'us from such imminent dangers, beseeching likewise 'the assistance of his holy spirite, so to deliver us in 'safetie into our countrey, whereby the light and 'truth of these secrets being knowen, it might redound to the more honour of his holy name, and 'consequently to the advancement of our Common-'wealth. And so, in as good sort as the place suf-'fered, we marched towards the tops of the mountaines, which were no lesse painfull in climbing then 'dangerous in descending, by reason of their steepnesse and yce. And having passed about five miles, 'by such unwieldy wayes, we returned unto our ships 'without sight of any people, or likelihood of habi-'tation (13).'

(13) Hakluyt, p. 65.

[N] Five of which they killed, and brought away a woman with her child.] It is manifest from our people's own account, that they were the aggressors, and attacked the poor savages in their boats: a strange way of endeavouring to civilize those people! It might be said, by way of excuse, that it was done as a kind of retaliation for their taking the five English, the year before: but this excuse cannot hold good, unless it had been quite certain, that the persons thus attacked were the very same that had taken those five prisoners.——The woman they took, was encumbred with a child, which prevented her escape. And, in shooting at her, they wounded the child in one arm; to cure which the English chirurgeon applied salves. But the mother, not acquainted with such kind of surgery, plucked off the plaister; and by continual licking of the wound with her tongue, healed the child's arm (14).——Having now a woman for the man they had taken before, they brought them together; and extreme was their surprise, and strange their gestures and behaviour, at their first meeting. They stared a while at each other, without speaking a word; tho' great and visible was the change in their colour and countenance all the while. At last, the woman suddenly turned away, and fell a singing as if she had minded something else, seeming to disdain or not regard the man. But being brought together again, the man broke silence first, and with a stern and stayed countenanced began a long story, which the woman attentively listened to, without interrupting him. Afterwards being grown better acquainted by conversing together, they seemed not to be easy without each other's company. But tho' she would do all kind and friendly offices for him, as a good housewife yet they never knew one another as man and wife; [having undoubtedly left some behind, in that relation to each other, when they were taken] And so extremely strict and remarkable was their bashfulness and modesty, that they could not bear to appear naked in each other's presence, or any one's else: and their continence very much surpassed that of multitudes of Christians, and others so in name, who pretend to more politeness and knowledge, but really have much less virtue and morality, than those honest heathens (15).

named another bay, with an iſland, Anne Counteſs of Warwick's Sound, and Iſland. And this was the furtheſt place they went, this year, within thoſe Streights [O]; being only about 30 leagues (i). For, the Captain's commiſſion directed him, in this voyage, only to ſearch for ore, and to leave the further diſcovery of the North-Weſt paſſage till another time (k). Having therefore, in the iſland laſt mentioned, found a good quantity of ore, he took a lading of it; intending, the firſt opportunity, to return home. But, before that, he would fain have recovered the five men he loſt the foregoing year; for which purpoſe he landed in ſeveral adjacent places [P], and uſed all poſſible and imaginable means, tho' ſtill in vain (l). So, deſpairing of ever ſeeing them again, they ſet ſail on the 23d of Auguſt; and, tho' very much toſſed and ſeparated by ſtorms, all ſafely arrived in England, about the end of September, the Aid at Milford-haven, the Gabriel at Briſtol, and the Michael at Yarmouth. In this voyage they loſt only two men; the Maſter of the Gabriel, who was waſhed over-board; and one who died at ſea, being ill when he went out (m). Capt. Frobiſher was moſt graciouſly received by the Queen, whoſe ſingular pleaſure and glory it was, to extend the Engliſh name and trade to the furtheſt parts of the habitable world. And, as the gold ore he brought had an appearance and ſhew of great riches and profit; and the hopes of a North-Weſt paſſage to China were greatly increaſed by this ſecond voyage, the Queen appointed Commiſſioners to make trial of the ore, and examine thoroughly into the whole affair. Alſo the new-diſcovered country not being known by any particular name, her Majeſty named it Meta Incognita (n). The Commiſſioners, after ſufficient proof of the ore, and examination of every circumſtance, reported, How great was the value of the undertaking; and the expediency of further carrying on the diſcovery of the North-Weſt paſſage. Whereupon ſuitable preparations were made, with all poſſible diſpatch. And, becauſe the mines newly found out were ſufficient to anſwer all Adventurers charges, it was thought neceſſary to ſend a ſelect number of ſoldiers, and other proper perſons, to ſecure the places already diſcovered, to make further diſcoveries in the inland parts, and to ſearch again for the paſſage to Cathay. As they were to be left behind, a ſtrong Fort of timber was framed to be ſet up at their landing, in order to protect them from the injuries of the weather, and defend them againſt all attacks of the natives. The adventurers which willingly offered, and were appointed, to ſtay in that cold and deſart country all the year round, were 100 in number; whereof 40 were mariners for the uſe of the ſhips, 30 miners to dig the ore, and 30 ſoldiers to guard the whole company, in which laſt number were included the gentlemen, refiners, bakers, carpenters, and other uſeful perſons. Their leaders were Capt. Edward Fenton, Lieutenant-general to Admiral Frobiſher, Capt Beſt, and Capt. Philpot. To each of theſe Captains was aſſigned one ſhip; as well for the better ſearching of the coaſt and country; as to bring them back again to England, if they ſhould be driven by neceſſity, or diſappointed of a fleet's coming the next year. Beſides theſe three ſhips, twelve others were fitted out for this voyage [Q], which were to return in the end of the Summer, with a lading of gold ore (o). They aſſembled at Harwich the 27th of May, from whence they departed the 31ſt of the ſame month, and ſailing Weſtward through the Engliſh channel, arrived, June 6, at Cape Clear in Ireland. Then they bent their courſe Northward [R], and in fourteen days came within ſight of Weſt Freeſeland, where the General went on ſhore, and taking poſſeſſion of the country in the Queen of England's name, named it Weſt England; and one high cliff therein, Charing-Croſs. June the 23d they made for Forbiſher's-ſtreights, and on the [P] For which purpoſe he landed in ſeveral adjacent places.] Upon the main land over againſt the Counteſs's iſland, they obſerved with aſtoniſhment the caves or winter-habitations of the natives. They were two fathoms under ground, round like an oven, and had a communication with each other. That the water falling from the hills above might not annoy them, there were proper trenches made deep under them, to carry off the water. And generally they were ſeated at the foot of a hill, in order to be ſecured from the piercing cold winds; for which reaſon alſo, the door or entrance into them was always towards the South. From the ground upward they were built with whales bones, for want of timber, which bending one over another, were handſomly compacted together at the top; and covered with ſeals ſkins, inſtead of tiles that are unknown in that country. Each of theſe houſes conſiſted only of one room, and half of the floor was raiſed with broad ſtones a foot higher than the reſt; upon which ſtrewing moſs, the poor inhabitants laid themſelves down to reſt (17).

[Q] Beſides theſe three ſhips, twelve others were fitted out for this voyage.] The names of all the ſhips, and of their Captains, were, the Aid, being the Admiral-ſhip, in which was the General Capt. Frobiſher; the Thomas Allen, Vice-Admiral, Capt. Yorke; the Judith, Lieutenant-general, Capt. Fenton; the Anne Francis, Capt Beſt; the Hopewell, Capt. Carew; the Beare, Capt. Philpot; the Thomas of Ipſwich, Capt. Tanfield; the Emmanuel of Exeter, Capt. Courtney; the Francis of Fowey, Capt. Moyles; the Moone, Capt. Upcot; the Emmanuel of Bridgwater, Capt. Newton; the Solomon [or Salamander] of Weymouth, Capt. Randal; the Bark Dennis, Capt. Kendal; the Gabriel, Capt. Harvey; the Michael, Capt Kineſley (18).

(18) Ibid. p. 75.

[R] Then they bent their courſe northward.] As they were ſailing towards the Northweſt parts from Ireland, they met with a great current from the Southweſt, which carried them one point to the Northeaſtward of their courſe. And it ſeemed to continue towards Norway, and other North eaſt parts of the world; which made them believe it to be the ſame, the Portugueſe had obſerved at the Cape of Good Hope. That, in their opinion, being obſtructed in its weſtern courſe by the narrowneſs of the ſtreights of Magellan, ran along into the Bay of Mexico, where alſo meeting another obſtruction from the land, it was forced to ſtrike back towards the North-eaſt (19).

the 2d of July came within the mouth of them; but being obſtructed by the ice (which ſunk the Bark Dennis) [S], and driven out to ſea by a violent ſtorm, they were ſo unfortunate as not to hit the entrance into them again. For, inſtead thereof, being deceived by a ſwift current from the North-Eaſt, which had dragged them many miles more South-Weſtward than was thought poſſible, and remaining twenty days in a continual fog, they ran above ſixty leagues into Streights hitherto unknown [T], before they were ſenſible of their miſtake. However, coming back again, the Admiral made for the real Streights that bore his name; and, on the 23d of July, at a place within them called Hatton's headland, found ſeven ſhips of his fleet, by which he was heartily welcomed. At length, on the 31ſt of the ſame month, after many difficulties, he recovered his long deſired port, and (p) Ibid. p. 84. came to anchor in the Counteſs of Warwick's ſound (p). But the ſeaſon of the year was ſo far advanced, that he could not pretend to undertake any new diſcoveries during this voyage; and part of the wooden Fort being loſt, a Council which was called, did not think it adviſeable to leave thoſe perſons behind, that were carried on purpoſe to winter in that deſolate country [U]. So all that remained to do, was to get as much ore as they poſſibly could; which they did in great quantities, particularly out of a new place, named
(q) Ibid. p. 90. by them the Counteſs of Suſſex's mine (q). Whilſt the ſhips were loading, General Forbiſher having an extreme deſire of making ſome further Diſcovery, went higher up the Streights in a pinnace; and found, that by Beare's ſound and Hall's iſland the land was not firm, as he imagined, but all broken iſlands, in form of an Archipelago. At the ſame time, the maſons were employed in building a houſe of lime and ſtone upon the Counteſs of Warwick's iſland; by way of trial, to ſee what effect the froſt and ſnow would have upon it againſt the next Seaſon, or whether the natives would take it to pieces. And to allure them to civility againſt other times of their coming, they left in the houſe, bells, knives, looking-glaſſes, pictures of men and women in lead, whiſtles, and ſuch other toys as they knew them to be delighted with. They made alſo an oven in the houſe, and left bread baked, for them to ſee and taſte. The timber of their intended fort, they buried; and ſowed peaſe, corn, and other grain, to try what the ſoil would produce againſt their coming again. On the laſt day of Auguſt, and the day following, the whole fleet ſet ſail from the Counteſs of Warwick's Sound; and, after a ſtormy and very dangerous paſſage, arrived ſafely in England, about the beginning of October. The Emmanuel of Bridgewater being left behind the reſt, in great danger of never getting out of the ice, was forced to ſeek a way Northward, beyond Beare's ſound, through an unknown channel full of rocks, into the North-Sea, upon the back of Frobiſher's Streights [W]. And, in her paſſage home, to the South-Eaſt of Freeſeland, diſcovered a great Iſland in the latitude of 57 degrees and a half, which was never found before; along the coaſt of which they ſailed for three days, the land ſeeming to be fruitful, full of woods, and a champain country. In all this voyage, there died not above forty perſons in the whole fleet: a ſmall number, conſidering the extreme hardſhips and the variety of fortunes they underwent (r)! We can find no account, how Capt. Forbiſher employed himſelf from this time till the year 1585, when he commanded the Aid, in Sir Francis Drake's Expedition to the Weſt-Indies; which was attended with the glorious ſucceſs of taking and ſacking St Domingo in Hiſpaniola, Carthagena on the continent, and Santa Juſtina in Florida, three towns of great importance (s) [X]. In 1588, he bravely exerted himſelf in the defence

(21) Ibid. p. 81. populous (21).

[U] That were carried on purpoſe to winter in that deſolate country.] The chief reaſons againſt their ſtaying, were theſe. Upon peruſing the bills of lading, it was found, that only the Eaſt and South ſides of the Fort were arrived, and thoſe not entire; for many pieces had been uſed by ſome of the ſhips when they were diſtreſſed by the ice, and broken or loſt. Then, there was not a ſufficient quantity of drink and fuel for the number of perſons that were to be left. And upon enquiring of the Carpenters and Maſons, what time it would take up to erect a houſe only for ſixty men; they replied, eight or nine weeks, if there were timber ſufficient. Whereas now there were but ſix and twenty days in all, they could ſtay in that miſerable cold country. For theſe reaſons, the deſign was abſolutely laid aſide, at leaſt for this year (22).

(22) Ibid. p. 86.

[W] Upon the back of Forbiſher's Streights.] The General himſelf had gone into this paſſage with his pinnace; and ſome of his company diſcovered therein (as they affirmed) a large foreland; from whence they imagined here was a great probability of the wideſt paſſage towards the South-Sea (23). But time has ſhewn that they were miſtaken.——For a further account of the attempts made ſince to diſcover the North-weſt paſſage, ſee what was publiſhed upon that ſubject by Arthur Dobbs, Eſq; Capt. [X] Three towns of great importance.] This fleet, (as Sir William Monſon obſerves,) was the greateſt of any nation but the Spaniards, that had been ever ſeen in thoſe ſeas from the firſt diſcovery of them (24); and if it had been as well conſidered of before their going from home, as it was happily performed by the valour of the undertakers, it had more annoyed the King of Spain than all other actions that enſued during the time of the war.—For had we kept and defended thoſe places, when in our poſſeſſion, and provided to have been relieved and ſuccoured out of England, we had diverted the war from this part of Europe;——and with more eaſe incroached upon the reſt of the Indies, than the King of Spain could have aided or ſuccoured them (25).

fence of his country againſt the Spaniſh Armada; commanding then the Triumph, one of the three largeſt ſhips in that ſervice, and which had on board the greateſt number of men of any in the whole Engliſh fleet (t). On the 26th of July, he received the honour of Knighthood, from the hand of the Lord High-Admiral, at ſea, on board his own ſhip the Ark, amongſt four others of the gallanteſt officers (u); for a reward, and encouragement, of their moſt diſtinguiſhed and unparallel'd valour (w). And when, after this ſignal victory, Queen Elizabeth thought it neceſſary to keep a fleet on the Spaniſh coaſt, as well to hinder the freſh preparations King Philip might make againſt her, as to intercept his flota's from America, Sir Martin was employed in that ſervice; particularly in 1590, when he commanded a ſquadron, as Sir John Hawkins did another: But tho' they alarmed the coaſts of Spain, and ranged as far as Tercera (x), they had not ſo good ſucceſs in making of prizes; as in 1592, when two ſhips of good value were taken by Sir Martin, and a rich carack by another part of his ſquadron (y). In 1594, he was ſent with four men of war (z) to the aſſiſtance of Henry IV, King of France, againſt a body of the Leaguers and Spaniards then in poſſeſſion of part of Bretagne, which had fortified themſelves very ſtrongly at Croyzon near Breſt. But in an aſſault upon that fort, on the 7th of November, Sir Martin unfortunately was wounded with a ball in the hip, or ſide, of which he died [Y] ſoon after he had ſafely brought back the fleet to Plymouth (a); and was buried in that town (b). Some accuſe him, of having been harſh and violent (c); but he is univerſally allowed, to have been a man of great and undaunted courage, and inferior to none of his age in Experience and Conduct, or the reputation of a brave Commander (d).

FULLER (Thomas), an eminent Divine and Hiſtorian in the reigns of King Charles the Firſt and Second; was the ſon of the Rev. Mr Thomas Fuller, Miniſter of St Peter's, in the town of Alwincle, or Oldwincle (a), near Oundel in Northamptonſhire; who being preſented to that benefice by William Cecil, Earl of Exeter, as may be gathered from our author's account in the ſame place, did, by the painful diſcharge of his paſtoral office, and peaceful evaſion of thoſe diſputes and controverſies, ſo frequent in his time between the Puritans and Papiſts, acquit himſelf there with general ſatisfaction; and was in good eſteem among the moſt eminent Literati in thoſe parts, particularly Sir Robert Cotton; who once told him, he had met with a true Plantagenet at plough (*). In that town (which is ſome five miles diſtant from) and not in Oundel, as David Lloyd miſtakes (b), his ſaid ſon, Thomas, was born in the year 1608 (c). His mother was ſiſter to Dr John Davenant, afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury; as from his own, and other writings, may be gathered [A]: and that town was many years reckoned moſt notable for being the birth-place of this Hiſtorian; as it was afterwards, for giving his firſt breath alſo to Mr Dryden, the famous Poet. His pregnant parts were ſo ripened, under his father's tuition, for the Univerſity, when he was not above twelve years of age, that he was then ſent, in 1620, to Queen's College in Cambridge (d), where his father had been, it ſeems, himſelf educated; and here, under the care and government of his uncle Dr Davenant, then Maſter of that College, and ſoon after Biſhop, as aforeſaid, he made ſuch extraordinary progreſs in his learning, that he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1624, and that of Maſter in 1628 (e), with general approbation, and at ſuch an unuſual age, that it is obſerved the like early commencement had not been within memory. About the end of thoſe firſt eight years education, which he received in this Univerſity, at that College (f) there became a Fellowſhip vacant, for which he ſtood candidate; and he had a double proſpect of ſucceeding, by merit as well as intereſt, beſides the inclinations of the whole Houſe; but all

[A] As from his own writings and others may be gathered] Sir Anthony Welden informs us, that, among the Eccleſiaſtics in King James his reign, 'ſome 'worthy men were preferred gratis, to blow up the 'fame of Buckingham, and his party; as Dr Townſon, who paid nothing in fine or penſion; and after 'him, Davenant in the ſame Biſhoprick; yet, that, 'theſe were but as muſic before every hound (1).' Whereupon our author Dr Fuller makes this reflexion: 'Tho' both theſe perſons here praiſed, were my god-'fathers, and uncles; the one marrying the ſiſter of, 'the other being brother to, my mother: yet it does 'not tempt me to accept his praiſes, upon ſuch in-'vidious terms; knowing, thoſe Biſhops, if alive, 'would condemn ſuch uncharitable commendations, 'which are, if not founded on, accompanied with, 'the diſgrace of others of their order:' and tho' he grants that, 'corruption was too common in this kind; 'yet were there, beſides them, many worthy Biſhops 'raiſed by their deſerts, without any ſimoniacal com-'pliances (2).' Now, to that notice which our author here takes of his ſaid uncles, if we join what Anthony Wood ſays of them, 'that the former, Dr Ro-'bert Townſon, dying 15 May 1621, left fifteen 'children by his wife Margaret; and that the latter, 'Dr John Davenant, who died 20 of April 1641, 'was enjoined by King James not to take a wife (3),' we may conclude that, the ſaid Margaret, whom the former married, was ſiſter to Mrs Fuller our author's mother; and that the latter, who probably never was married, was Mrs Fuller's own brother, and conſequently that the maiden name of both the ſiſters was Davenant. Of his ſaid uncle Davenant, he has more than once ſpoken elſewhere (4).

all their hopes were fruſtrated by the College ſtatutes, which, prohibiting the admittance of two Fellows from the ſaid county of Northampton, he relinquiſhed his pretenſions thereto, tho' he knew that a diſpenſation could have been procured for him; ſo unwilling to obtain that preferment was he, by ſetting others ſuch a precedent of irregularity (g). Thereupon, thro' the invitation of ſome learned friends, he tranſplanted himſelf in, or a little later than, the year laſt mentioned, to Sidney College in the ſame Univerſity (*). Here he was pupil under Dr Samuel Ward, Maſter thereof, and Margaret Profeſſor for above twenty-years (b). His private ſtudies, at this time, were chiefly Divine Poetry; and the firſt ſpecimen of it, that we find in print, was about three years after publiſhed [B]. In that College he had not been long ſettled, before he was choſen Miniſter of St Bennet's pariſh, in the town of Cambridge; in which church he offered the firſt fruits of his paſtoral office; and here, by the moſt ſublime Divinity, in the moſt raviſhing elegancies, ſays my author, he attracted the audience of the Univerſity (i), and became a very popular preacher, at thoſe years when others are ſcarce publickly known. Being now arrived to the age of twenty-three (k), his extraordinary qualifications tendered him the Prebendſhip, in Saliſbury Cathedral, of Netherbury in Eccleſia, to which he was collated upon the deceaſe of Dr John Rawlinſon, on the 18th of June 1631 (l), and at the ſame time a Fellowſhip in Sidney College; whereupon he retired from the Univerſity, and betook himſelf to his prieſtly function, being thereunto ordained by Biſhop Davenant. And that Prebend was a commodious ſtep to another preferment more profitable, in the ſame dioceſe; being ſoon after inducted to the Rectory of Broad-Winſor, in Dorſetſhire; of which he mentions himſelf to have been once Miniſter (m), and, upon his advancement to this Benefice, he ſeems to date, in one place, the diſcontinuance of his living at Cambridge, about 1634 (n). After he had here exerciſed for ſome time his miniſterial charge, he was perſuaded by ſome friends to dignify his deſert, with the degrees which his time and ſtanding in the Univerſity allowed him. Accordingly, he returned to Cambridge, was gladly received, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1635 (o); and this commencement, thro' the extenſion of

[B] The firſt ſpecimen of his DIVINE POETRY in print, was about three years after publiſhed.] The firſt performance of our author that has appeared to us in print, being a Divine Poem, very rare to be met with, and having had no deſcription given of it, the following account may not be unacceptable to the curious. It is entituled, DAVID's Hainous Sin, Heartie Repentance, and Heavie Puniſhment. By THOMAS FULLER, Maſter of Arts, of Sidney College in Cambridge. London, printed by T. Coates, &c. in a thin 8vo. 1631. 'Tis dedicated in verſe, To the Honourable Mr William and Mr Chriſtopher Montagu, ſons of the Right Honourable Edward Lord Montagu of Boughton. The whole three parts, conſiſt of 144 ſtanzas, of ſeven lines each; four alternate, and a triplet in baſe. A critical reader of poetry might find matters of remark in it; either to commend in ſome agreeable deſcriptions, natural ſimilies, and inſtructive reflections; or to cenſure in ſome few parts of the ſtyle, which were faſhionable elegancies in thoſe times: but in the whole, promiſing that, had he perſevered in the ſtudy and culture of poetry, his genius might have advanced him to ſome conſiderable rank among thoſe contemporaries, who were then favourites of the Muſes. His good ſenſe and ingenuity at that age, is diſtinguiſhable enough; his verſification is more compact or limited, and uſually flows with ſmoother cadence, than that of ſome riper wits of great name in thoſe days. Among other obſervable parts, the very propoſition and invocation are very comprehenſive, ſolemn, and regular: the perſuaſions of David by the Spirit, and the Fleſh; with the deſcription of Uriah's drunkenneſs are very natural: the obſequious offer of the Elements to deſtroy David upon his tranſgreſſion, and after his reſtitution, to relieve and cheriſh him, are ſomewhat Pictureſque, and touching upon Spenſer's imagry in miniature: his compariſon of thoſe variable Elements upon this occaſion, to temporiſing Courtiers, who will fawn upon a Miniſter, when he is reſtored to favour, as faſt as they ſlouted him in diſgrace, looks to have ſomething in it perfectly alive; and ſo does that figure, wherein we may imagine that we ſee Abſolom cringing, with ſupple neck and knees about the Court, to gather up what alms and fragments he could of popular favour and intereſt, by ſeizing upon one man's hand, to ſteal away his heart; and ſucking out the ſoul of another with deceitful kiſſes; enquiring the name of this, the buſineſs of that, and the country of t'other, to ſerve them all! proſtituting his promiſes, and enſlaving himſelf, to errant ſlaves: in whom alſo we have a further glimpſe of pride itſelf, groveling to be exalted to grandure, and exerciſing all the abject ſpirit of the moſt beggarly poor, to worm itſelf into riches: Or as our author words it,

> Proud men are baſe, to compaſs their deſire;
> They loweſt crouch, that higheſt do aſpire.

But this is a picture not near ſo agreeable as that of plain-dealing Nathan, in his ſtate of moderation; the knowing and communicative, the kind and compaſſionate Nathan; who being ſkilled in lancing a feſter'd ſoul, in ſearching and tenting the ſore, and ſtanching a bleeding-hearted ſinner; would heal his wounds with the ſovereign balſam of counſel, or bind up the disjointed members of his troubled mind. He was neither oppreſſed with that plenty which made him envied; nor diſtreſſed with that penury which made him deſpiſed: his purſuits were circumſcribed to his poſſeſſions; and as he was in no needful want, he thought wanton need moſt deſpicable; or that want in ſufficiency was the true mother of contempt: ſo, as his deſires were planted within the moſt temperate ſituation of command, they produced the ſweeteſt fruits of content: for, as our Poet ſays,

> High hills are parch'd with heat, or hid with ſnow,
> And humble dales, ſoon drown'd, that lie too low;
> Whilſt happy grain, on hanging hills doth grow.

Deſcriptions more flowery might be hither tranſplanted; ſuch as are ſo gently ſtrewed over David's child in death, and others; but as his gravity in this poem prevails above the natural gaiety of his genius, we have choſen in this hiſtorical work, to inſtance thoſe few particulars, which are rather in the edifying and profitable, than to hunt after ſuch as may run into a more pleaſing and poetical vein. At the cloſe of this performance, our author having ſubſided into the characters of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles I. and lamented the loſs of the Duke of Brunſwick, with the diſcords then in Europe, thro' the wars in the Netherlands, Denmark, &c. he very properly and piouſly concludes, that thoſe grievances may be bewailed by mankind, but till they are redreſſed by Providence, they are more befitting his prayers than his pen.

of a liberal diſpoſition, agreeable to that of his literary affluence, coſt him ſevenſcore pounds (p). It ſeems, according to his own reckoning, that he did not account himſelf totally removed, or departed from Sidney College, before 1636; becauſe he alſo gratefully acknowledges this to have been his mother, for his eight laſt years in this univerſity (q). After his return into Dorſetſhire, and during his receſs in that Rectory, he applied himſelf to compleat ſome other of the books he had begun at Cambridge: And there, about the year 1638, or not long before, he was married to a virtuous young gentlewoman; it being when the nation was alarmed with the news of the tumults then begun in Scotland (r). By her he had one ſon, named John, who was brought up a Student at the ſame Univerſity and College in which his father had been: And ſhe was delivered of him, much about the time that her huſband brought forth his Hiſtory of the Holy War, which is dated in the latter end of 1639, tho' not publiſhed, it ſeems, till the next year [C]; ſoon after which, and but a ſhort time before the eruption of the civil wars, ſhe died (s). Then, for the greater convenience of enjoying more readily, and in larger choice or variety, the works and converſation of the learned, he removed to London, where his conſpicuous talents in the pulpit were ſoon admired by the diſtinguiſhing part of his auditory; being cry'd up for one of the moſt excellent preachers of his age (t), but more eſpecially in the Inns of Court. However, he was ſoon after drawn to ſettle a little nearer the Royal Court, and choſen Lecturer of the Savoy in the Strand, by the Maſter and Brotherhood thereof, at the intreaty of ſome principal pariſhioners. Here he gave ſuch general ſatisfaction, became ſo famous, and was thronged with ſuch diſtant congregations, that thoſe of his own cure were in a manner excommunicated from their own church, if they came not early enough to fill it, which, without conforming to his own habitual temperance, they could ſeldom do: tho' he had an audience without, and another within the pale, the windows and ſextonry were ſo crowded, as if bees had ſwarmed to his melliſluous diſcourſe (u). On the thirteenth of April 1640, a Parliament was called, and then alſo a Convocation began at Weſtminſter, in King Henry the Seventh's chapel, having licence granted to make new Canons for the better government of the Church. Of this Convocation our author was a Member;

[C] His Hiſtory of the HOLY WAR, dated in 1639, &c.] It is dated at the end of his epiſtle dedicatory, from his Rectory at Broad Winſor on the ſixth of March that year: and as no other date appears in the graved frontiſpiece, it is mentioned as printed that year in ſome catalogues; but was not, it ſeems, before the next. It was well received by the publick, and has paſſed at leaſt three editions; the laſt is entituled as the former likely are—The Hiſtory of the Holy War: by Thomas Fuller, B. D. Prebendary of Sarum late of Sidney College, Cambridge, printed there by Roger Daniel, &c. the third edition, fol. 1647: to which is alſo prefixed the ſaid graved frontiſpiece, containing the portraits of Godfrey of Bulloign, and of Saladin, in ſmall ovals at top; and underneath a view of all ages, ſexes, and degrees of people, flocking to the ſaid wars, &c. with an explanation in the page before the ſame, in verſe by J. C. The Hiſtory is divided into five books, has a map before it of Paleſtine, and three tables at the end; the one chronological, another of authors cited, and the third of contents. The beginning of this war is reckoned to have been about the year 1096, and the end about 1291 (5). The author's ingenious dedication of this hiſtory is, To Edward Lord Montagu of Boughton, and John Lord Powlet of Hinton St George: to whom he recommends, 'If they fear to hurt their hands 'with thorny ſchool-queſtions, the turning over of 'Hiſtory, as a velvet ſtudy and recreation work. 'What a pity is it, ſays he, to ſee a proper gentleman have ſuch a crick in his neck, that he cannot 'look backward! yet no better is he, who cannot ſee 'behind him, the actions which long ſince were performed. Hiſtory maketh the young man old, without either wrinkles or gray hairs; privileging him 'with the experience of age, without either the infirmities or inconveniences thereof: yea, it not only 'makes things paſt, preſent; but enables one to make 'a rational conjecture of things to come. For the 'world affordeth no new accidents, but in the ſame 'ſenſe, wherein we call it a new moon; which is the 'old one in another ſhape; and yet no other than 'what hath been formerly, &c.' Then, leaſt ſome critick ſhould condemn him for an ill huſband, in lavishing two noble patrons upon one book; whereas one of them might have ſerved to patronize many volumes, he ſays, 'He did it in the weak expreſſion 'of his thankfulneſs to them; being deeply endebted 'to them both; and thought it dishoneſty to pay all 'to one creditor, and none to another; therefore 'conceived it better to ſhare his eſtate jointly between 'them, as far as it would extend: and ſecondly, conſidering the weakneſs of his work, now being to 'walk abroad in the world, I thought it muſt be led 'by both arms, and needed a double ſupporter, &c.' In his ſhort preface to the reader, he challenges nothing to himſelf but the compoſition; and as for his vouchers, 'If every where, ſays he, I have not charged 'the margin with the authors names, it is either becauſe the ſtory is author for itſelf, I mean generally received; or to avoid the often citing of the 'ſame place. Where I could not go abroad myſelf, 'there I have taken air at the window, and have 'cited authors on others citations; yet ſo, that the 'ſtream may direct to the fountain.' There are many encomiums beſtowed upon our Hiſtorian, his wit, and his ſtyle, in the ten poems prefixed to this work; written by Robert Gomerſall, Vicar of Thorncombe, in Devon. Robert Tyrling, James Duport, B. D. of Trinity College; J. Booth, B. D. of Chriſt-College, Cambridge; H. Atkins, H. Hutton, M. A. of Jeſus College; H. Vintener, Thomas Jackſon, William Johnſon, of Queen's College; and Clement Bretton, of Sidney College. Out of theſe, a ſhort ſketch of ſome ſentiments may ſhew the character for which he was chiefly diſtinguiſhable to them. One ſays his vein is ſo rich, that Taſſo could not invent ſo well as Fuller could relate (6). A ſecond, that barbariſm is more vanquiſhed by his wit, than ever it was by Godfrey's ſword (7). A third, that Jeruſalem need not envy Troy, ſince ſhe has found one to write her battles in proſe, as elegantly as Homer did thoſe of the other in verſe (8). A fourth, that as a viper was once enſhrined in the amber tears of Phaeton; ſo here, Mahomet ſhall find a tomb in his language, ſo rare and tranſparent, as will endure, when the faint loadſtone lets his own of iron fall (9). And a fifth compares the weaving of his ſtories to figures wrought in tapeſtry, and ſo enriched with embroidery, that flames, wounds, and bloodſhed, objects in their nature moſt irkſom and dreadful, are rendered agreeable by his art: the moſt horrid ſlaughters wrapped in his arras language, give more delight than diſtaſte, and that which was moſt painful in the rencounter, is quite qualified by what we meet with ſo pleaſing in the relation (10): beſides many other high commendations, which to be more particular in, by citing the verſes themſelves, might here take up too much room.

Member; and, when the Parliament was diſſolved, on the fifth of May following, the Convocation was commiſſioned to continue ſtill, by the title of a Synod, to complete the ſaid new Canons, which, on the laſt of June following, were printed, with the royal aſſent; tho' our author ſays, he was one, who, in the ſelect committee, privately diſſented in paſſing many particulars therein; and has publickly preſerved the ſeveral exceptions which were, and probably ſome of them by himſelf, then made to them. But thoſe Canons being inſufficiently confirmed, only by royal authority, enough notice was taken thereof in the Long Parliament, which in November following enſued; all which he has himſelf amply recorded (w). But now the diviſions between the King and Parliament being grown ſo great, that he had left his Court at London, on the tenth of January 1641 (x), to gather ſuch ſtrength in the countries as might oblige their Repreſentatives to obedience, rather than comply with what he and his adviſers thought unprincely conceſſions, our author, in other pulpits as well as his own, very loyally enforced the doctrine of allegiance; and ſo particularly in the Inauguration Sermon, he preached at Weſtminſter-Abbey, on the twenty-ſeventh of March 1642, upon that text, ſo directly perſuading the duties of ſubmiſſion, Yea, let him take all, ſo my Lord the King return in peace, his Majeſty then being at York, that it gave great diſguſt to thoſe who were in the oppoſition againſt him, and brought the preacher himſelf into great danger. He ſoon found that he was to expect nothing leſs than to be ſilenced and ejected, as others had been; yet deſiſted not from proceeding in the ſame courſe, till he either was, or thought himſelf unſettled, by what he ſays in the preface to his Holy State, which was that year printed [D]. And it appears more plainly the next year; when an oath, but not the Covenant, as ſome authors have miſtaken (y), was obtruded upon him; which he took not without ſuch exceptions in regard to himſelf, that the Parliament, unſatisfied therewith, and requiring him to take it in a more abſolute manner, he retired to the Court at Oxford ſome months before the Covenant was urged. Yet were there various reports relating to his ſteadineſs in refuſing even this oath. The writer of his life ſays he conveyed himſelf to the King at Oxford in April 1643, to avoid the impoſition, and preſerve his conſcience clear of it (z); and another, with the confidence that is uſually hardened by malice or error, ſays that he ſaw him take the Covenant before he went thither, more than once; but as our author has both cleared himſelf, and rectified our underſtanding in this matter, it is but juſtice on all ſides to give each of them a hearing [E]. When he arrived at Oxford, he was both joyfully received and honourably

[D] Or thought himſelf unſettled, by what he ſays in the preface to his Holy State, &c.] That is pretty viſible, from more than one part of this preface; wherein it appears, that this book was compoſed before he left Broad Winſor in Dorſetſhire, or at leaſt before the eruption of the wars; it having been committed a twelve month before to the preſs: and his characters therein are, as he ſays, conformed to the then ſtanding laws of the realm; which, as the King and State had now thought fit to alter, he expects his reader would make his alterations accordingly. And after having prayed that God would diſcloud theſe gloomy days, he ſays, 'Which if I may be ſo happy 'as to ſee, it will encourage me to count it a free-'dom to ſerve two apprenticeſhips, God ſpinning out 'the thick thread of my life ſo long, in writing the 'Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory from Chriſt's time to our days; 'if I ſhall, from remoter parts be ſo planted, as to en-'joy the benefit of walking and ſtanding libraries; 'without which advantages, the beſt vigilancy doth 'but vainly dream to undertake ſuch a taſk. Mean 'time, I will ſtop the leekage of my ſoul; and what 'heretofore hath run out in writing, ſhall hereafter, 'God willing, be employed in conſtant preaching; 'in what place ſoever God's providence and friends 'good will ſhall fix me (11).' And it elſewhere appears, that he was now or very ſoon after debarred of the profits of his Prebendſhip of Saliſbury, by the time he is mentioned to have continued ſo at the Reſtoration (12). However in the title page of this Holy State, it is ſaid to be written by Thomas Fuller, B. D. and Prebendary of Saliſbury. It was printed at Cambridge, fol. 1642. and the ſecond edition, by R. D. for J. Williams, &c. fol. 1648. The whole contained in five books; whereof the Profane State, printed alſo by Roger Daniel, is the laſt. This work is a collection of Characters, moral Eſſays, and Lives; antient, foreign and domeſtic; ſo interſperſed, as often to hold ſome analogy with the characters or eſſays which precede them. They are much enamelled with the figures or flowers of wit, and have much engaged the regard of rhetorical readers (13). But the lives are not in number equal to the eſſays; there being between ſeventy and eighty of the characters and eſſays, and not above thirty lives; among which thoſe of our own country, are, Edward the Black Prince, Sir John Markham, Lord Chief Juſtice; Cardinal Wolſey; Biſhop Ridley, Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk; Lady Jane Gray; Dr Nicholas Metcalf; Sir Francis Drake; Lord Burghley; Mr William Perkins, and Dr William Whitaker; Queen Elizabeth, and Mr William Camden. The antients and foreigners are, Abraham, Eleazar, Haman, St Auguſtine, Monica, Lady Paula, Hildigardis, Paracelſus, Scaliger, and Guſtavus King of Sweden; and in the profane ſtate there are, Jehu, the Witch of Endor, Andronicus, Joan Queen of Naples, Joan of Arc, Cæſar Borgia, and the Duke of Alva: with copper prints, engraved by W. Marſhal, &c before moſt of them. Between the publication of theſe two editions of the Holy and Profane State, came out our author's Andronicus: or the Unfortunate Politician by itſelf, in 12mo. 1646. reprinted 1649, &c. And 'tis the ſame we preſume above mentioned, which appears in the laſt edition of the Profane State, cap. 18, from fol. 448, to 502.

[E] But juſtice on all ſides, to give them each a hearing.] We do not find that our author ever looked with a malignant aſpect on any of the planetary ſchemes of Will. Lilly the famous Aſtrologer, Almanac maker, Prophet, Fortune-teller, and Conjurer; or that ever he charged any of his unaccompliſhed predictions with being retrograde, or in oppoſition to truth: we hear not that he any ways concerned himſelf with ſetting Aries and Taurus together by the ears (14); that he ever denied him to be even Lord of the Aſcendant in his own Horroſcopes, or any how promoted the leaſt ejectment of him from the twelve houſes (15): Yet has this Mr Lilly, in a certain libel, endeavoured to ſtigmatiſe him, in theſe words— 'I would be very 'ſorry to belie the dead, as Mr Fuller hath Paracelſus; 'who delivers him unto poſterity for a drunkard (16), 'though thoſe who lived with him, the Biſhop of Saltz-'burg, knew no ſuch thing of him, but report him 'virtuous. But that Mr Fuller may know, he hath 'wantonly abuſed his oratory, I let the ages to come 'know thus much of himſelf, viz. That he took 'the Covenant twice for the Parliament, before my 'face in the Savoy Church; invited others to it; 'yet, honourably diſtinguiſhed there. The King having heard of his extraordinary abilities in the pulpit, was deſirous of hearing them from it. But, as the original cauſe of his leaving London,

' yet, apoſtate-like, ran within few days to Oxford, ' and there whined to his companions, and proteſted ' the Counteſs of R——— made him take it'—— Here he turns one of our author's cudgels againſt himſelf, in behalf of Paracelſus; and quotes this precept of Fuller's, as if it were againſt his own practice; Let not thy jeſts, like mummy, be made of dead men's fleſh; abuſe not any that are departed; for to wrong their memories, is to rob their ghoſts of their winding ſheets (17): ' And yet, ſays he, this man muſt call Paracel- ' ſus a Quackſalver, and gave him, beſides, other Bil- ' linſgate language (18).' As for Paracelſus, ſince our author has ſaid nothing of him, for which he does not fairly produce his vouchers and compurgators, ſuch as Thomas Eraſtus, Beroaldus, and thoſe who had the beſt opportunities of knowing his character; Paracel- ſus ſeems not ſo much defamed or belied, if we may retort ſuch an expreſſion above, by Fuller, as Fuller is by Lilly; and that he made no mummy of Paracelſus when he was dead, whatever the wits of thoſe times might make of Lilly while alive: but if, on the credit of others, he had, it little became ſuch a ſcribbler to charge him with having belied one man, who, thro' the impoſtures of his pretended arts, made it his con- ſtant practice to belie and deceive the whole nation. Then as for Fuller's taking the Covenant, the author who beſt knew his ſtory, and ſeems leſs biaſſed by his affection, than Lilly by his acrimony, therefore moſt worthy of credit, has repreſented his conduct with re- lation thereto as follows. ' Several falſe rumours and ' cavils there are about his carriage and opinion touch- ' ing that ſacrilegious thing, by perſons who were ' diſtanced as far from the knowledge of thoſe paſ- ' ſages, as fortunately from being concerned and en- ' gaged within the reach of that ſnare. 'Twas not ' only eaſy, but prudential, for other eccleſiaſtical ' perſons to quit their livings, who were out of the ' gripe and clutches of thoſe ravenous reformiſts, in ' order to keep their conſciences inviolable; but it ' was difficulty enough of itſelf for the Doctor to ' eſcape, and get out of that place, where the next ' preferment would have been a dungeon. Some ve- ' litations, and tranſient diſcourſes, he made about that ' frequent and thumb'd ſubject of the reformation, ' the rather to ſuſpend the buſy cenſures of the Par- ' liament and their party; wherein, though he ſeemed ' to comply, but as far as the rule and example would ' allow, and indulge the miſapprehenſion of thoſe ' men; yet theſe his charitable diſguiſes could not ' obſcure him from the ſevere animadverſions of ſe- ' veral miniſters eminent in thoſe reforming times; ' particularly Mr Saltmarſh. The conteſt between ' them is ſo known in print, that it will be needleſs ' to trouble the reader with it here: only thus much ' by digreſſion, in honour of this venerable Doctor; ' Mr Saltmarſh being long ſince dead; he hath, in ' his book of the Worthies of England, given him a ' moſt honourable mention, and aſſigned him the ' place of his birth, education, and burial; regiſtring ' him for an ornament of them all; ſo reſplendent ' and durable was the Doctor's charity, &c. But to ' return to our ſubject; in the beginning of the year ' 1643, the ſaid covenant was generally preſſed; and ' a very great perſecution ſoon after followed it ' The Doctor was ſettled in the love and affection of ' his own pariſh, beſides other obligations to his nu- ' merous followers; ſo that the covenant then ten- ' dered, might ſeem like the bright ſide of that cloud, ' promiſing ſerenity and proſperity to him, as was ' inſinuated to the Doctor by many great Parliamen- ' tarians, which ſhowred down, after a little remoteneſs ' ſuch a black horrible tempeſt upon the Clergy; nay, ' the Church, and three kingdoms. But the good ' Doctor, could not bow down his knee to that Baal ' Berith; nor, for any worldly conſiderations (enough ' whereof invited him to fall down and worſhip; men ' of his great parts being infinitely acceptable to them) ' lend ſo much as an ear to their ſerpentine charms ' of religion and reformation. Since therefore, he ' could not continue with his Cure without his Con- ' ſcience, and every day threatned the impoſition of ' that illegal oath, he reſolved to betake himſelf to ' God's providence, and to put himſelf directly un- ' der it; waving all indirect means and advantages ' whatſoever towards his ſecurity. In order there- ' unto, in April 1643, he deſerted the city of Lon- ' don, and privately conveyed himſelf to Oxford, to ' the no leſs ſudden amazement of the faction here, ' who yet upon recollection quickly found their miſ- ' take, than to the unexpected content and joy of the ' loyal party there; who had every day, Job's meſ- ' ſengers of the plundering, ruin, and impriſonments ' of orthodox Divines (19).' Thus diſtinctly is his evaſion of, or eſcape from, this oath aſſerted by that author. But Fuller himſelf has beſt diſcovered the ground of Lilly's miſreport, and even more clearly than his Biographer, diſtinguiſhed how the ſaid cove- nant could not be taken by him, as well as what other oath he did take, and in what manner. For having mentioned that Scottiſh Covenant, as he calls it, being born beyond the Tweed, and projected, as a band for the ſtreighter union of the Engliſh and Scotch among themſelves, and of both, to the Parliament (20); hav- ing there alſo ſhewn very expreſsly, that it was firſt taken by the Houſe of Commons and the Aſſembly of Divines, on Sept. 25, 1643; and firſt ordered to be printed two days after: that divers Lords, Knights, Gentlemen, Officers, &c. met alſo at St Margaret's Weſtminſter, and took it; and that it was commanded to be taken the Sunday following, October the firſt, in all Churches and Chapels of London, within the lines of communication, and throughout the kingdom, in a convenient time appointed, according to the te- nor thereof; he then recites at large the ſaid cove- nant (21); not heeding whether there be exactly 666 words in the body of it (22): ſo proceeds to deliver many ſolid exceptions to the preface; the ſix articles, whereof it is conſtituted, and the concluſion. Then he goes on thus— ' So much concerning the Cove- ' nant; which ſome three months after began to be ' rigorouſly and generally urged. Nor have I ought ' elſe to obſerve thereof, ſave to add in my own de- ' fence, that I never ſaw the ſame, except at diſ- ' tance, as hung up in Churches; nor ever had any ' occaſion to read, or hear it read, till this day (23), ' in writing my hiſtory; whatever hath been reported, ' and printed to the contrary, of my taking thereof ' in London; who went away from the Savoy to the ' King's quarters, long before any mention thereof in ' England. True it is, there was an oath, which ne- ' ver exceeded the line of communication; meeting ' with ſo much oppoſition, that it expired in the in- ' fancy thereof, about the time when the plot was ' diſcovered; for which Mr Tomkins and Mr Cha- ' loner ſuffered (24). This was tendered to me and ' taken by me, in the veſtry of the Savoy Church; ' but firſt proteſting ſome limitations thereof, as to ' myſelf. This not ſatisfying, was complained of by ' ſome perſons preſent, to the Parliament; where it ' was ordained, that the next Lord's Day I ſhould ' take the ſame oath in terminis terminantibus, in the ' face of the Church; which not agreeing with my ' conſcience, I withdrew myſelf into the King's parts, ' which I hope, I may no leſs ſafely, than I do freely ' confeſs; becauſe puniſhed for the ſame with the ' loſs of my livelihood, and ſince, I ſuppoſe, par- ' doned in the Act of Oblivion (25).'

As for the controverſy between our author and Mr John Saltmarſh, it was occaſioned by the Sermon of Reformation, which Fuller had preached at the Savoy (26); againſt which, Mr Saltmarſh publiſhed ſome animadverſions, wherein he charged him with ſeveral points of Popery (27); and Fuller defended the argu- ments he had delivered upon that occaſion, in the tract he thereupon ſet forth, under the title of truth maintained, wherein he challenged Saltmarſh to a re- ply, but he appeared in the liſts no more; giving his reaſon afterwards for it, that he would not ſhoot his arrows againſt a dead mark; being informed that Fuller was dead at Exeter (28). Upon which our author obſerves, that he himſelf has no cauſe to be angry with ſame, for ſuch a favourable falſhood;

28) J. Saltmarſh, in the beginning of his book againſt Tho. Gataker,

London, after the ſermon he preached upon the new-moulding Church-Reformation, appears to have been, for the cenſure it gained him of being too hot a Royaliſt; it is now no leſs apparent, that, for preaching before the King and Court, at St Mary's in Oxford, he was cenſured for being one too lukewarm (a); which being the reverſe of flattery on both ſides, can only be accounted for, from that inflexible principle of moderation in himſelf, which he would have ſincerely inculcated in either party, as the only means of reconciling both; that each, abating their high expectations of condeſcenſion in the other, both might be brought to a happy accommodation; in which, if he could have prevailed, the beneficial effects muſt have exceeded all eſtimate; and it had been difficult to determine, what reward could have been made him equivalent to ſuch a national remedy, in that violent calenture under which the nation now laboured. But his reflection on his own narrative of the Convocation aforeſaid, may be applicable here; that, He is generally accounted an impartial arbitrator, who diſpleaſes both ſides (b). It ſeems to have been at this time that he was, as he mentions himſelf, tho' no member yet an inhabitant of Lincoln college in this Univerſity; that he was alſo then deprived of all his ſubſiſtence, or means of livelihood, and now, or not long after, rifled and plundered of his books, manuſcripts, &c. But, tho' he expreſsly denies that his loſſes were owing to his expences, or the dearneſs of the place or proviſions; yet there is a noted oppoſer of him, as of many others, who has, by the groſſeſt diſtortion of his ſenſe, and moſt uncharitable inſult under his ſufferings, endeavoured to make an affirmation of his denial [F]; and tho' he could plainly underſtand,

'May I make this true uſe, ſays he, of that falſe re'port, to die daily: ſee how Providence has croſſed
'it; the dead reported man is ſtill living; the then 'living man, dead; and ſeeing I ſurvive to go over 'his grave, I will tread the more gently on the mold
'thereof; uſing that civility on him, which I re'ceived from him.' Indeed he has further ſpoken, with that ſuperior candor and generoſity of him, which he was wont to do of the few antagoniſts he had, in the ſame place, where he has preſerved him among his learned and eminent men; and where, after informing us, that he was born in Yorkſhire, bred at Magdalen College in Cambridge, and much befriended by Sir John Hotham the elder, he gives him the character of having had a fine and active fancy, of being no contemptible Poet, and a good Preacher; but that of a zealous obſerver, he became a violent oppoſer of Biſhops and ceremonies; which our author very charitably wiſhes, imputed to the information of his judgment and conſcience (29). It may be taken alſo as a beauty in his own character, that he was not too ſtrict or over curious in remembring the place and time of this adverſary's death, tho' the cauſe and manner of it were too publickly known to be omitted; for Mr Saltmarſh being at times intellectually diſordered (30), it took him in the head latterly, after a fever, that he had commiſſions from the Lord, to deliver to the Parliament Army then at Windſor, whereof he was one of the Chaplains; and after that fit of ſickneſs, telling his wife he had been in a trance, ſeen a viſion, and received meſſages to the ſaid army, he ſtroled thither in a very erratic, if not diſtracted, manner; and did ſo much further inflame his brains, by riding to and fro among them in his ſhirt, pronouncing the menaces of the Lord, with his revelations, counſels, and rebukes, to the General Sir Thomas Fairfax, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, and other officers, in many extatic ſpeeches, and prophetic raptures, that, when he returned home, five days afterwards, to his houſe near Ilford in Eſſex, his ſpirits ſeem to have been quite exhauſted. He told his wife, that he had then done his work, finiſhed his errand, and muſt go to his father; ſo, in two days more, being taken ſpeechleſs, he quietly breathed his laſt, on the eleventh of December 1647, and not three years after, as our author has miſconjectured (31). The ſhort abſtract we have here given of his latter end, is from the account which the officers of the army aforeſaid ſuffered to be publiſhed of it (32); but thoſe who will not think it an infirmity bordering too near upon his own, either in others to be more particular, or in themſelves to be further acquainted with his inſignificant and brain-ſick extravagancies, or crazy conduct in this melancholy condition, may repair to that account itſelf, or a more copious extract of it, than we have here from that pamphlet given, leſs difficult to be conſulted (33). Among the books and tracts he had publiſhed, tho' they are now little read or known, the titles of about twenty are remembered in the author laſt quoted, and ſome of them elſewhere (34): in ſeveral parts whereof, he appears to have been of the Antinomian perſuaſion; alſo that, beſides Dr Fuller and Mr Gataker, he had made himſelf an adverſary to Dr John Baſtwick, Thomas Edwards, the author of Gangræna; and John Ley, one of the Aſſembly of Divines, &c. The very titles of ſome of thoſe pieces ſeem to have ſome tincture, or glimpſes of enthuſiaſm, if not frenzy in them.

[F] A noted oppoſer, &c. who has endeavoured to make an affirmation of his denial.] This noted oppoſer was Dr Heylin, in his Animadverſions upon our author's Church Hiſtory; both which books we ſhall hereafter more particularly ſpeak of. Our author being willing to intimate how he was totally ruined in the beginning of the civil wars, while he fled for protection to the royal party at Oxford, has gently dropt a reflection upon that melancholy event, where ſpeaking of the foundation of Lincoln College in Oxford, he informs us, he was in thoſe troubleſome times, tho' no member of, a dweller in it; and adds, 'I will not com'plain of the dearneſs of this Univerſity, where ſe-
'venteen weeks coſt me more than ſeventeen years in 'Cambridge, even all that I had; but I ſhall pray
'that the Students therein, be never after diſturbed
'upon the like occaſion (35).' Now tho' Heylin ſuffered then himſelf, and there, attending alſo the royal party in the like manner, we ſhall ſee how he could magnify that expreſſion, without the uſe of glaſſes, which then indeed could do his eyes no ſervice; or if they could, none are ſo blind, as thoſe who will not ſee: for tho' Fuller has expreſsly diſtinguiſhed that he had no objection to make againſt any extravagant exactions for his diet, or other accommodations, therefore would not complain of any dearneſs there, yet, ſays Heylin, 'The ordinary and unwary reader might collect from
'hence, that Oxford was a chargeable place, and that 'all commodities there are exceeding dear, but that
'our author lets him know, it was upon ſome occa-
'ſion of diſturbance: by which it ſeems, our author
'doth relate to the time of the war, when men from 'all parts did repair to Oxford, not as a Univerſity,
'but a place of ſafety, and the ſeat Royal of the 'King; at which time notwithſtanding, all provi-
'ſions were ſo plentiful, and at ſuch cheap rates, as
'no man had reaſon to complain of the dearneſs of 'them. No better argument of the fertility of the 'ſoil, and the richneſs of the country in which Ox'ford ſtandeth, than that the markets were not raiſed
'on the acceſſion of ſuch infinite multitudes as re-
'ſorted to it at that time, and on that occaſion.'
Here conſcious that he had wilfully perverted our author's ſenſe long enough into a wrong meaning, and conſidering that Fuller would be thought ſenſible of the cheapneſs of the place then, as well as himſelf, he goes on to let us underſtand, how unneceſſary his own miſconſtruction was, by ſhewing again how rea-

ſtand, from our author's expreſſion, that he was ſequeſterd by the parliamentary power; yet, as we ſee he has moſt prepoſterouſly upbraided him with being a Royaliſt, tho' he was an exceeding one himſelf, and moſt ambitious, in his writings, of being ſo accounted. Thus, deprived of all, and having no church to preach in, our author turned his thoughts towards the camp; for, at this tumultous juncture, having no conveniency to explain, or vindicate, thoſe tenets or ſchemes of compoſure and reconciliation, by the preſs or pulpit (c), againſt which ſome eccleſiaſtical and invidious competitors for court-favour had diligently inſinuated their miſconſtructions; he reſolved to recover the opinion of his ſtedfaſt adherance to the Royal cauſe, by openly trying his fortune, more diſtantly, under the Royal army. Therefore, being well recommended to Sir Ralph Hopton, now, after his late victory obtained at Stratton in Cornwall, May the ſixteenth 1643 (d), created Lord Hopton of Stratton, at Oxford, he was admitted by him, in the quality of his Chaplain; and he has gratefully exemplified the patent of his patron's creation, which is dated the fourth of September following (e). This attendance muſt have been moſt agreeable, being moſt fortunate to him; as that Lord's ſteady attachment to the King's intereſt was ſo well known, that it reinſtated the credit of Fuller's loyalty; and yet his Lordſhip's inclinations to an amicable and honourable cloſure of the war, were ſo correſpondent with thoſe of his Chaplain, that they no leſs confirmed his judgment; which juſtly reflecting a double honour upon both, gained him alſo a victory (f) over that attempt aforeſaid, by his circumventing enemies. And now attending his Lord, wherever the ſoldiers under him lay in camp, his Chaplain conſtantly exerciſed his duty, in exhorting them to theirs; and where, in their progreſs, they lay quartered in towns and cities, he always found ſome intervals for his beloved ſtudies, in gathering materials, eſpecially for his WORTHIES of ENGLAND. How dily he could take his right meaning. 'Our author 'therefore, ſays he, muſt be thought to relate to 'ſomewhat elſe than is here expreſſed; and poſſibly 'may be, that his being at Oxford at that time, 'brought him within the compaſs of delinquency, and 'conſequently of ſequeſtration.' But mind with what politeneſs and humanity he concludes upon this misfortune of a fellow-ſufferer in thoſe calamitous times. 'And were it ſo, ſays he, (that he was ſequeſtred) 'he hath no reaſon to complain of the Univerſity, or 'the dearneſs of it; but rather of himſelf, for coming 'to a place ſo chargeable, and deſtructive to him. 'He might have tarried where he was, for I never 'heard that he was ſent for, and then this great com- 'plaint againſt the dearneſs of that Univerſity would 'have found no place (36).' Many ſuch bitter draughts of his gall ſhould we ſwallow, if we were to run thro' this, and many others of his controverſial writings; in which, he ſurely did not always ſufficiently reflect, that if the Clergy were to make a practice of thus treating their own cloth, it would ſoon be no wonder that the laity, of whom they are the inſtructors, ſhould, in their treatment of them, follow their own example. That our author was of a contrary ſpirit, might appear in many inſtances of his anſwer to the Doctor; but in this place, let us rather obſerve, with what temper he could expreſs that moſt ſevere loſs, and more valuable to him than all his other poſſeſſions, in theſe unhappy times of anarchy and lawleſs ſpoil, his library of books and manuſcripts. In one place, for that loſs invaded his memory more than once, having ingeniouſly introduced it with a ſtory out of Plutareh's morals, of one Nicias an antient Philoſopher, who being robbed of his ſhoes, wiſhed, they might fit his feet who took them away: which may ſeem a charitable wiſh, but was a revengeful one; for being himſelf club-footed, he thereby wiſhed the thief a cripple, rather than that they might prevent his being made one, by going bareſoot. This ſtory he no leſs ingeniouſly applies thus, 'Whoſoever hath plundered me of my 'books and papers, I freely forgive him, and deſire 'that he may fully underſtand, and make good uſe there- 'of; wiſhing him more joy of them, than he hath 'right to them. Nor is there any ſnake under my 'herbs; nor have I, as Nicias, any reſervation, or 'latent ſenſe to myſelf; but from my heart do deſire, 'that to all purpoſes and intents, my books may be 'beneficial unto him. Only requeſting him, that one 'paſſage in his, lately my, bible, namely Eph. iv. 28. 'may be taken into his ſerious conſideration (37).' But it ſeems he did not loſe all his books, as he alſo elſewhere informs us in theſe words, to one of his patrons: 'Beſides deſire, to ſhelter myſelf under your 'patronage, gratitude obligeth me to tender my ſer- 'vice to your Honour. For all my books, being my 'nether and upper milſtone, and ſuch by the Levitical 'Law, might not be taken to pledge, becauſe a man's 'life (38), without which, I had been rendered un- 'able to grind any griſt, for the good of myſelf or 'others, had been taken from me in theſe civil wars, 'had not a letter from your Lady mother preſerved 'the greateſt part thereof. Good reaſon therefore, 'that the firſt handful of my fineſt meal ſhould be pre- 'ſented in thankfulneſs to your family (39).' And elſewhere we learn, that he had afterwards a conſiderable reparation made of this loſs; for which, to another of his patrons, he makes this grateful acknowledgment. 'I am ſadly ſenſible, what the loſs of a 'library, eſpecially of manuſcripts, is to a miniſter, 'whoſe books have paſſed ſuch hands, which made 'riddance of many, but havock of more. Was it not 'cruelty to torture a library, by mainning and mang- 'ling the authors therein, neither leaving nor taking 'them intire? Would they had took leſs, that ſo what 'they left, might have been uſeful to me; or left leſs, that 'ſo what they took, might have been uſeful to others. 'Whereas now, miſchievous ignorance did a prejudice 'to me, without a profit to itſelf, or any body elſe. 'But would to God all my fellow brethren, who, with 'me, bemoan the loſs of their books, with me, might 'alſo rejoice for the recovery thereof, though not the 'ſame numerical volumes. Thanks be to your Ho- 'nour, who have beſtowed upon me, the Treaſure of 'a Lord Treaſurer; what remained of your father's 'library. Your father, who was the greateſt ho- 'nourer and diſgracer of ſtudents bred in learning: 'honourer, giving due reſpect to all men of merit; 'diſgracer, who by his meer natural parts and ex- 'perience, acquired that perfection of invention, ex- 'preſſion, and judgment, to which, thoſe who make 'learning their ſole ſtudy do never arrive. It was a 'gift I confeſs, better proportioned to your dignity 'than my deſerts; too great, not for your Honour to 'beſtow, but for me to receive. And thus hath God 'by your bounty equivalently reſtored unto me, what 'the locuſts and the palmer worm, &c. have devoured: 'ſo that now, I envy not the Pope's Vatican, for the 'numerouſneſs of books, and variety of editions there- 'in; enough for uſe, being as good, as ſtore for ſtate, 'or ſuperfluity for magnificence. However, hereaf- 'ter, I ſhall behold myſelf under no other notion, 'than as your Lordſhip's Library-keeper: and con- 'ceive it my duty, not only to ſee your books dry'd 'and rubbed, to rout thoſe moths which would quar- 'ter therein, but alſo to peruſe, ſtudy, and digeſt 'them; ſo that I may preſent your Honour with ſome 'choice collections out of the ſame, as this enſuing 'hiſtory is for the main extracted thence; on which 'account, I humbly crave your acceptance thereof; 'whereby, you ſhall engage my daily prayers for 'your happineſs, and the happineſs of your moſt no- 'ble conſort, &c (40).'

[G] How

How aſſiduous he was in his reſearches, and how extenſive in his correſpondence for that purpoſe, may appear in his Memorialiſt [G]. After the battle of Cheriton Down, on March the twenty-ninth 1644, the Lord Hopton drew on his army to Baſing-Houſe, the Marquis of Worceſter's in Hampſhire, and left his Chaplain in that ſtrong garriſon, intending to conſult the King, at Oxford, before he took up his quarters; when Sir William Waller, having taken in Wincheſter, beſieged the Doctor's ſanctuary; but ſo little terrified was he with the cannon from the aſſailants leaguer, that it made him ſo vigilantly animate the defendants to ſuch continual and effectual ſallies, as conſtrained Sir William to raiſe the ſiege on the (g) ſeventeenth of November following, with the loſs of more than a thouſand men (h): However, this moſt noble ſeat in that county, ſome months after Fuller had left it, was taken by ſtorm, with the Marquis in it, and razed to the ground. After the war, which had made a lamentable ravage through the three kingdoms, was drawing to a concluſion, and part of the loyal army driven into Cornwall, under the Lord Hopton; his Chaplain, having received a diſmiſſion of his beloved patron, took timely refuge at Exeter, where he reſumed his ſtudies, and conſtantly preached with great ſatisfaction to thoſe loyal citizens. Here, the Queen having been delivered at Bedford Houſe, of her laſt iſſue the Princeſs, called after her own name Henrietta Maria, in June the year laſt mentioned, who was ſoon after her brother's reſtoration married to Philip of France Duke of Orleans, our author was made Chaplain to the Infant Lady (i), and, as the writer of his life alſo obſerves, the King ſoon after gave him a patent for his preſentation to the living of Dorcheſter in Dorſetſhire, valued at four hundred pounds per annum. But, as this would obſtruct his deſign of ſettling in London, for the more convenient attainment of hiſtorical intelligence, he modeſtly declined that gracious offer, and continued waiting on the young Princeſs during the ſiege of that city, in the latter end of 1645; when, as he tells us, it was for a while ſo wonderfully relieved with ſuch prodigious flocks of larks [H]. His converſation was here, no leſs than wherever elſe he was, much ſought and admired by the moſt noble and ingenious perſons of all ranks [I], ſeveral of whom made him advantageous

[G] How aſſiduous he was in his reſearches, and extenſive in his correſpondence for that purpoſe, may appear in his Memorialiſt.] This author informs us, that, 'While he was in progreſs with the King's army, his buſineſs and ſtudy then was a kind of errantry; having propoſed to himſelf a more exact collection of the Worthies General of England; in which others had waded before, but he reſolved to go through. In what place ſoever therefore he came, of remark eſpecially, he ſpent moſt of his time in views and reſearches of their antiquities, and Church Monuments; inſinuating himſelf into the acquaintance, which frequently ended in a laſting friendſhip, of the learned'ſt and graveſt perſons reſiding within the place, thereby to inform himſelf fully of thoſe things he thought worthy the commendation of his labours. It is an incredible thing to think what a numerous correſpondence the Doctor maintained, and enjoyed by this means. Nor did the good Doctor ever refuſe to light his candle, in inveſtigating truth, from the meaneſt perſons diſcovery. He would endure contentedly, an hour, or more impertinence, from any aged Church-officer, or other ſuperannuated people, for the gleaning of two lines to his purpoſe. And tho' his ſpirit was quick and nimble, and all the faculties of his mind, ready and anſwerable to that activity of diſpatch, yet in theſe inqueſts, he would ſtay and attend thoſe circular rambles, till they came to a point; ſo reſolute was he bent to the ſifting out of abſtruſe antiquity. Nor did he ever diſmiſs ſuch adjutators or helpers, as he pleaſed to ſtile them, without giving them money and chearful thanks beſides (41).'

(41) Life of Dr Fuller, p. 27.

[H] Wonderfully relieved with ſuch prodigious flocks of larks.] This memorable relief by the vaſt numbers of thoſe birds, being himſelf a witneſs of, he has recorded in theſe words.— 'When the city of Exeter was beſieged by the Parliament forces, ſo that only the ſouth ſide thereof towards the ſea was open to it, incredible numbers of larks were found in that open quarter, for multitude, like quails in the wilderneſs; tho', bleſſed be God, unlike them, in the cauſe and effect; as not deſired with man's deſtruction, nor ſent with God's anger; as appeared by their ſafe digeſtion into wholeſome nouriſhment. Hereof, I was an eye, and mouth-witneſs. I will ſave my credit in not conjecturing any number; knowing that herein, though I ſhould ſtoop beneath the truth, I ſhould mount above belief. They were as fat as plentiful; ſo that being ſold for two pence a dozen, and under, the poor, who could have no cheaper, and the rich, no better meat, uſed to make pottage of them, boyling them down therein. Several natural cauſes were aſſigned hereof: 1. That theſe fowl frighted with much ſhooting on the land, retreated to the ſea ſide for their refuge. 2. That it is familiar with them in cold winters as that was, to ſhelter themſelves in the moſt ſouthern parts. 3. That ſome ſorts of ſeed were ſown in thoſe parts, which invited them thither for their own repaſt: however, the cauſe of cauſes was the Divine Providence; thereby providing a feaſt for many poor people, who otherwiſe had been pinched for proviſion (42).'

[I] His converſation was much ſought and admired by the moſt noble perſons, and ingenious of all ranks.] While he reſided here, as well as in other places, his temper and humour, his learning and wit, were ſo conſpicuous and captivating to the wiſe and grave, the learned and judicious, as well as thoſe who were more jocoſe and mercurial themſelves, that old Doctor Vilvain of that city, was pleaſantly rallied by the Governor of Exeter, for inviting him ſo often, or detaining him ſo long, from the ſociety of others; as a cornholder that hoardeth up the grain to enhance the market, and make a dearth in the neighbourhood (43). But it ſeems, that Doctor had ſome uncommon manuſcripts in his library, with a Muſæum of natural curioſities beſides; and being of a generous diſpoſition, as his beneſactions in that town may teſtify, notwithſtanding his ſufferings in thoſe deſtructive times; as alſo of courteous comportment and communicative converſation, they were mutually agreeable to each other. It was in that Muſæum belike, that our author ſaw ſuch a rarity, as ſerved him to illuſtrate a reflection, he afterwards made, upon the aſſertion in one of the Oxford Antiquaries (44), that there were, or had been above two hundred halls in that Univerſity: for thereupon he obſerves, that, 'ſuch halls, like flowers, which grow double, muſt either one croud into another, or elſe be inconſiderably ſmall; like thoſe three hundred ſixty five children which Margaret Counteſs of Henneberg brought forth at a birth in Holland; one ſkull whereof, ſays he, I have ſeen, no bigger than a bead, or a bean;' ſo, in the margin adds, 'It was derived for ſome hundred of years by ſucceſſion, through authentic Phyſicians, to Dr Vilvain of Exeter, the preſent owner thereof; and avouched, by the ſkilful in anatomy, the true head of an infant once born into the world (45):' As it might geous overtures to engroſs him to themſelves, which he refuſed. Here he compoſed a little book, of pious applications and reflections upon familiar objects, examples, and events; ſo ingeniouſly, as made devotion delightful to the Princeſs, when ſhe was old enough to read and underſtand it. He dedicated it to the Lady who preferred him into the ſervice of her Highneſs, and calls it the firſt fruits of Exeter preſs, preſented to her [K]. At laſt the garriſon might more probably be, than together with ſo many brothers and ſiſters However the Doctor himſelf has in his book of Epigrams, one upon this incredible ſwarm of children, which that Belgic Counteſs is ſaid to have brought forth at one birth, upon the imprecation of a beggar woman (46) who was reviled by her, as a common proſtitute for having many herſelf. But our author was tempted with greater proſpects of advantage by perſons of higher rank, to engage him more conſtantly to themſelves. For while he lay here, the Biſhop of Briſtol, Dr Thomas Weſtfield, it ſeems, made him fair invitations to live with him; but he declined them, being cautious of ſuch a family favour: and John Digby, Earl of Briſtol, was ſo charmed with his company, while he was here Chaplain to the Princeſs, that he alſo tendered him a noble competency, both now, and after the ſiege of Exeter, if he would go over and reſide with him in France; proteſting that, while he was maſter of a loaf, our author ſhould have half of it (47): but he valued his liberty above the whole loaf. He ſeems to have conſidered the cloſe attachment to dignity in a domeſtic Retainer, but as a crippling kindneſs; and however it might for a while promiſe an air of equality, or permit the appearance of a companion, that it was a ſituation which would prove improſperous by its contiguity, and inſenſibly breed a ſubordination, that would grow contemptible by its conſtancy; more eſpecially, as the greateſt ſervices therein, ſooneſt beget the moſt envious circumventions; or ſo dwindle and degenerate into unthankful duty, that the Dependent will find it thought a reward too great, to have been the witneſs only of little foibles; that he muſt live by no direction of his own, and have no diſpoſitions that are unguided by his principal; till he who at firſt was a freeman himſelf, gradually becomes a ſlave, to the paſſions or humours, the vices or vanities, the profits or pleaſures, the avarice or ambition, of another; and often in the end, a victim to the treachery of undermining competitors. But tho' he accepted not ſuch courteſy, he has ſpoken much to the honour of thoſe who offered it (48). In ſhort, he was ſo engaging, and had ſuch a fruitful faculty of begetting wit in others, when he exerted it himſelf, that he made his aſſociates pleaſed with their own converſation as well as his: his blaze kindled ſparks in them, till they admired at their own brightneſs; and when any melancholy hours were to be filled up with merriment, it was ſaid, in the vein he could ſometimes deſcend to, that the Doctor made every one Fuller. An author before quoted informs us, 'He was ſo good company, 'that happy the perſon who could enjoy him, either 'Citizen, Gentleman, or Nobleman; the Earl of 'Carliſle, and George Lord Berkeley eſpecially; he 'removing up and down, out of an equanimous civi-'lity to his many worthy friends; ſo to diſpenſe his 'much deſired company among them, that no one 'might monopolize him to the envy of others (49).' For that Lord Berkeley's noble friendſhip to him, he has ſundry times repeated his gratitude with great zeal and affection: where he calls him, the Paramount Mæcenas of his ſtudies (*): and in another place, 'one, 'who hath been ſo ſignally bountiful in promoting 'theſe, and all other my weak endeavours, that I 'deſerve to be dumb, if ever I forget to return him 'publick thanks for them (50).' But to enumerate all the patrons or promoters of his works, and recite his ſhining characters of, and liberal acknowledgments to them, might make an article longer than this of his life.

[K] The firſt fruits of Exeter preſs preſented to her] Several little books of this kind were publiſhed by our author; ſome whereof have paſt divers editions. They are partly compoſed upon the plan of a learned and ingenious prelate's moſt celebrated writings (51): but ſeveral others have been ſince written, more directly upon our author's plan. As that, by Theophilus Wodenote, a ſequeſter'd divine, ſometime of King's-College in Cambridge (52). Another was publiſhed by Dr William Spurſtow Miniſter of Hackney (53), and afterwards there was another volume ſet forth, by an author more famous for his many publications in natural and experimental Philoſophy (54). Whatever there might be in this laſt author's performance, that could tempt a late ludicrous wit to give his ſerious manner of writing another air (55), we forbear now to enquire; but have been ſo far from meeting with any reflection upon our author, for the pieces in this kind which he ſet forth, that we find they rather gained him the character of a moſt penetrating and ſtexanimous genius; which teſtified a comprehenſive memory to recollect, and judgment to prefer, the moſt proper and agreeable incidents in poetry, hiſtory, or any other ſcience, as well as divinity; and then a moſt ſurpriſing faculty of alluſion, to apply them ſo pertinently and ſo eloquently, by inference or deduction to any preſent purpoſe or occaſion: whereby he has drawn the moſt delightful and ſalutary precepts out of the moſt ordinary and diſregarded, as well as the moſt extraordinary and obſervable examples; inſomuch that no books of thoſe times, in this manner of writing were more read than his, or more often reprinted. The firſt tract which he brought to light of this nature, if we are not miſled by ſome catalogues in its title and date, was called, Good Thoughts, 12mo. 1637. The next he publiſhed was this above referred to, while at Exeter, as is there ſaid, and entituled, Good Thoughts in bad times, &c. printed there, it ſeems in 12mo 1645, for we have not ſeen that edition; but the next we have, which was the fruit of a London preſs, printed for Andrew Crook, &c. in 12mo. 1646. And he publiſhed Good Thoughts in worſe times, that year or the next in 12mo. 1647 (†). They were reprinted in 1649, and 1650. At leaſt theſe two parts were again printed together, under the title of, Good Thoughts in bad times: together with, Good Thoughts in worſe times; conſiſting of Perſonal Meditations, Scripture Obſervations, Hiſtorical Applications, Mixt Contemplations: Meditations on the Times, Meditations on all kind of Prayers, and Occaſional Meditations. By Thomas Fuller, B. D. both parts printed for J. Williams, &c 12mo. 1652. He afterwards publiſhed a different work entituled, Mixt Contemplations in theſe times, as one author ſays in folio (56); who mentions no date to this, or any other of his works; and this if not printed in octavo, we never ſaw; but his Mixt Contemplations in better times, printed in 8vo. 1660. and dedicated from Syon College, to the Lady Monck we have ſeen. As for his Good Thoughts in bad times; which contain the firſt four heads of thoſe ſpecified in the two parts before mentioned to have been printed together; this firſt part containing an hundred meditations, is addreſſed by him in a polite dedication, to his patroneſs, the Lady Dalkieth, Governeſs to the Princeſs, as alſo her godmother, who was the planter of him in her ſervice. We have ſeen an account or deſcription of a collection of moral and divine contemplations, written ſeemingly in a woman's hand, by either the ſaid Princeſs Henrietta Maria, as it was ſaid, or for her uſe (57), having on its blue Turkey leather cover, the two firſt letters of her name in a cypher, ſurrounded with palm branches, and crowned with a coronet, in which there are ſeveral of the curious thoughts in this book, among others tranſcribed. As that pleaſant ſtory of the ſimple American, who hid or buried under a ſtone the letter his Spaniſh maſter had ſent by him, to a friend with a baſket of figs, while he eat ſome of them, becauſe a former letter had revealed his former thievery; thinking, while he was out of its ſight, he ſhould now be free from its detection; which is ingeniouſly applied by our author, to the conſcience in man, which however ſtifled and ſuppreſſed, while we are committing tranſgreſſions, will at laſt both upbraid us with, and puniſh us for them (58). Another is, that application he makes of the Shepherds on thoſe Welſh mountains garriſon there, for want of ſuccours, was forced to ſurrender, but upon ſuch favourable conditions, to the Parliament army, under Sir Thomas Fairfax, on the thirteenth of April 1646 (k), that Fuller was permitted by him to depart without any loſs or interruption to London. Here he met but cold reception among his former pariſhioners; Mr Bond, heretofore a preacher at Exeter, was Maſter of the Savoy; and ſo many other changes he ſaw, that the pariſh was ſcarcely to be found in itſelf. However, it was not long before he was choſen Lecturer at St Clements-Lane, near Lombard-ſtreet; and ſhortly after removed to St Bride's church in Fleet-ſtreet. In the title-page of a ſermon which he publiſhed in 1647, he ſtiles himſelf late Lecturer in Lombard-ſtreet; and in his dedication thereof to Sir John Danvers, it appears he was now ſilenced [L]. He publiſhed ſeveral other pieces in theſe two laſt years, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. But it ſeems to have been before the latter end of the next year, when King Charles was put to death, that he was received as Chaplain to James Hay Earl of Carliſle (*), and preſented by his Lordſhip, ſoon after, to the Rectory of Waltham-Abbey in Eſſex; becauſe in that year 1648, and in 1649, he was, not only at London, but at Waltham, employing ſome engravers, to adorn, with ſculptures, his copious Proſpect or View of the Holy Land, as from Mount Piſgah, therefore called and known by the name of his PISGAH-SIGHT of Paleſtine (l), which he publiſhed in 1650 [M]. tains, ſo high and ſuch little ways aſunder, that the men can talk together, but muſt walk ſome miles before they can meet together, to the diviſions between the King and Parliament (59). Another is, his meditations on the riſings and fallings in Saliſbury plain (60); and beſides two or three more, there is one we ſhall here recite, as a ſpecimen of our author's talent in this kind of writing, as follows: 'I have ſometimes conſidered, in what a troubleſome caſe is that 'Chamberlaine in an Inn, who being but one, is to 'give attendance to many gueſts. For, ſuppoſe them 'all in one chamber; yet, if one ſhall command him 'to come to the window, and the other to the table, 'another to the bed, another to the chimney, another to go up ſtairs, and another to go down; and 'all in the ſame inſtant; how would he be diſtracted 'to pleaſe them all? And yet, ſuch is the ſad condition of my ſoul by nature, not only a ſervant but 'a ſlave to ſin! Pride calls me to the window; glutt'ony to the table; wantonneſs to the bed; lazineſs 'to the chimney; ambition commands me to go up 'ſtairs, and covetouſneſs to come down. Vices I ſee 'are as well contrary to themſelves as to virtue. Free 'me, Lord, from this diſtracted caſe; fetch me from 'being ſin's ſervant to be thine, whoſe ſervice is perfect freedom; for thou art one and ever the ſame, 'and always enjoins commands agreeable to themſelves, thy glory, and my good (61).'

[L] In his dedication to Sir John Danvers, it appears that he was now ſilenced.] This is entituled, A Sermon of aſſurance, fourteen years ago preached in Cambridge, ſince in other places: now, by the importunity of his friends, expoſed to publick view. 4to. 1647. In his dedication to Sir John Danvers, he ſays that, 'It had been the pleaſure of the preſent authority to 'make me mute; forbidding me till further order, 'the exerciſe of my publick preaching.' And in the Preface he tells his readers that, 'if he was finally interdicted his calling, he might beſpeak their pity to 'bemoan his ſtate; but lying as yet, in the marſhes 'between hope and fear, I am, ſays he, no fit ſubject to be condoled for, or congratulated with: yet 'it is, I truſt, no piece of Popery to maintain, that 'the prayers of others may be beneficial and available for a perſon in my purgatory condition.' And a little further. 'However matters ſhall ſucceed, it is 'no ſmall comfort to my conſcience, that in reſpect 'to my miniſterial function, I do not die, felo de ſe; 'not ſtabbing my profeſſion by mine own lazineſs, 'who hitherto have, and hereafter ſhall improve my 'utmoſt endeavours, by any lawful means to procure 'my reſtitution.' And tho' ſome might perſuade him to hold a private congregation, and carry the pulpit to his lodgings; yet he refrains from giving any offence, in hopes of being brought back to his pulpit. Of that Sir John Danvers, to whom he dedicates this ſermon, who was of a noble family, and had been a Royaliſt, tho' now an Oliverian, and next year one of the King's Judges, but died before the Reſtoration, we have met with the following paſſage, relating both to him and our author, in a little book that gives us ſome account of Sir John's life; the writer whereof, ſays that, tho' he lived ſome years in his diſloyalty without repentance, 'Yet drawing near the time of 'his death, I have, ſays the ſaid writer, cauſe to be'lieve that he repented of the wickedneſs of his life; 'for that, then, Mr Thomas, now Dr Fuller, was 'converſant in his family, and preached ſeveral times 'at Sir John Danvers his deſire, in Chelſea Church; 'where, I am ſure, all that frequented that congregation, will ſay, he was inſtructed to repent of his 'miſguided and wicked conſultations, in having to do 'with the murder of that juſt man, the King (62).'

[M] His Piſgah Sight of Paleſtine, he publiſhed in 1650.] The title is, A Piſgah Sight of Paleſtine, and the confines thereof; with the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament acted thereon. By T. Fuller, B D. 'Tis an handſome folio, embelliſhed with a frontiſpiece deſigned by Francis Cleyn, with many other copper plates, and divided into five books. The dedication, to Eſme Stuart Earl of March and Darneley, &c. is dated from Waltham-Abbey, 7th July 1650, and after the preface, in which he excuſes his delay of the Church Hiſtory, and renews our hopes of receiving it, follow ſome verſes in Greek, by John Ridley. Then we have a table of the arms in ſculpture of ſeveral encouragers of this work, graved by J. Goddard; and after that, a map of Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, dedicated to John Lord Cranfield, Sir William Paſton, and Robert Condel, Eſq; The firſt book contains the general deſcription of Judea in fifteen chapters; with a map of old Canaan, inſcribed to Edward Bendloes, Eſq; The ſecond book, is dedicated to Henry Lord Beauchamp, as we before mentioned. Then follow the hiſtories of the Twelve Tribes, &c. in as many chapters, with a map before each, containing alſo, in a little compartment, a ſhort Latin inſcription, in proſe or verſe, to ſome patron, with his arms over it: the firſt, which is the map of Reuben, is inſcribed to Sir Paul Pindar; the next of Gad, to Sir Hugh Windham, Bart. and ſo on: that of Benjamin to James Earl of Carliſle; and that of Judah, to another ſpecial patron, William Lord Maynard, &c. of whom, he elſewhere gratefully ſpeaks (63). The third book, dedicated to John Lord Roſs, Son of John Earl of Rutland, gives us a deſcription of the city of Jeruſalem in thirteen chapters, with a plan of it in ſculpture, inſcribed to the Honourable Edward Montagu, Eſq; alſo an account of Solomon's Temple in ſeven chapters, and his Courts, with the utenſils of the Temple in twelve chapters; and prints of them inſcribed to other promoters of the work. We have next a deſcription and hiſtory of Zerobabel's Temple in twelve chapters, and a plate inſcribed alſo of that, like the reſt. The fourth book is dedicated to Francis Lord Ruſſel, ſon of William Earl of Bedford, and dated from Waltham-Abbey, July 16, 1650. Here we have a map and deſcription of Mount Libanus, with the adjacent country, inſcribed to Simeon Bonnel, Merchant of London, a great encourager of his works. Alſo of Median, and other eaſtern confines of Paleſtine, with the like proſpect and account of the wilderneſs of

King, did now, for a while, quite ſtagnate and diſhearten his continuance of that Work, as if the proceedings of the Parliament had proved a contradiction to the title of it: For what ſhall I write, ſaid he, of the Worthies of England, when this horrid act will bring ſuch an infamy upon the whole nation, as will ever cloud and darken all its former, and ſuppreſs its future, riſing glories (m). Therefore he was buſy till the year laſt mentioned, in getting out that book and others; and the next year, he rather employed himſelf in publiſhing ſome particular lives, in a volume, of religious Reformers, Martyrs, Confeſſors, Biſhops, Doctors, and other learned Divines, foreign and domeſtick, than in augmenting his ſaid book of Engliſh Worthies in general; and to this collection he gave the title of ABEL REDEVIVUS, which he publiſhed at London, in quarto, 1651 [N]. In the two or three following years, he printed alſo ſeveral ſermons and tracts upon eccleſiaſtical ſubjects. And now having lived above twelve years a widower, and being recommended to an advantageous match by his noble friends, he married one of the ſiſters of the Lord Viſcount Baltinglaſs (n), in or not long before the year 1654. The next year ſhe brought him forth a ſon, who, with the other before mentioned, ſurvived their father. In 1655, notwithſtanding Cromwell's prohibition of all perſons from performing any miniſterial ſervice, or teaching any ſchool, who had been adherents to the late King, he continued preaching, and exerting his charitable diſpoſition towards thoſe Miniſters who were ejected; whom he not only relieved with what he could ſpare out of his own ſlender eſtate, but procured many contributions for them of his auditories. Nor was his charity confined to the Clergy, but, among the Laity whom he likewiſe befriended, one Captain of the royal army, who was of Paran, through which the children of Iſrael travelled forty years: likewiſe a draught of the tabernacle, inſcribed to James Bovey, Merchant of London, and a map of Egypt, with hiſtorical obſervations, founded upon the authorities of the holy writings, and thoſe of travellers, topographers, &c. as the other parts are. We have next a deſcription of the Jewiſh habits in eight chapters, with a table of them engraved (*), and inſcribed to his friend Mat. Gilly, Elq; alſo a print of the Jewiſh Pantheon, or Idols, with an inſcription to Dr Hamey as we mentioned before, and philological obſervations upon them, partly, as he acknowledges, from the labours of Mr Selden (64). The fifth book is dedicated to John Lord Burghley, ſon of John Earl of Exeter; and contains his anſwers to objections, concerning this treatiſe, and the repreſentation of the Tribes, &c. in the maps aforeſaid, in twenty two chapters. In one of them, to an objection, that the faces of the men who bear the great bunch of grapes (65), are ſet the wrong way: for being to go ſouth-eaſt, to Kadeſh-barnea, they look full weſt, to the Mediterranean ſea, he anſwers: 'You put me in mind of a 'man, who being ſent for, to paſs his verdict on a 'picture, how like it was, to the perſon whom it was 'to reſemble, fell a finding fault with the frame there-'of, not the Limner's, but the Joyner's work; that 'the fame was not handſomely faſhioned. Inſtead of 'giving your judgment on the map, how truly it is 'drawn to repreſent the Tribe, you cavil at the hi-'ſtory-properties therein; the art of the Graver, not 'the Geographer. Yet know, Sir, when I checkt 'the Graver, Robert Vaughan, for the ſame, he an-'ſwered me, that it was proper for the Spies, like 'Watermen, and Rope-makers, to look one way, and 'row another (66).' After theſe anſwers, there are ſix chapters more. 1. Of Ezekiel's viſionary land of Canaan. 2. An account of the Ten Tribes ſince their Captivity, &c. 3. Of the Jews repoſſeſſing their native country. 4. Of the general calling of the Jews. 5. The preſent obſtructions of their calling. 6. How Chriſtians ſhould behave in order to the Jews converſion.—Then follows a ſculpture of ſacred fragments, dedicated to John and Edward Ruſſel, youngeſt ſons of Francis late Earl of Bedford: and the whole cloſes with an elaborate table or index, of all the places; as cities, towns, mountains, vallies, rivers, &c. mentioned in this hiſtory of Paleſtine out of the Scriptures, in their proper Hebrew names, alſo their ſignifications in Engliſh, paralleld with many Engliſh towns, &c. as ſynonymas, and the texts referred to, in which thoſe places are mentioned; as alſo their longitudes and latitudes: laſtly, the book, page, and paragraph, in this hiſtory, where ſuch places are treated of, or mentioned; and all in diſtinct columns. If we may depend upon the judgment of ſome writers who have given our author's character, this Piſgah Sight is the moſt exact of all his writings (67).

[N] His Abel Redevivus he publiſhed at London in Quarto 1651.] The title of it is, Abel Redevivus: Or the Dead yet ſpeaking. The lives and deaths of the modern Divines; written by ſeveral able and learned men, whoſe names ye ſhall find in the epiſtle to the reader; and now digeſted into one volume, for the benefit and ſatisfaction of all thoſe that deſire to be acquainted with the paths of piety and virtue. Printed by Thomas Brudnell, &c. Lond. Quarto 1651. The epiſtle written by our author, is ſubſcribed from Waltham-Abbey. There are about one hundred and twelve lives, foreign and domeſtic in this volume, whereof thirty eight are Engliſh, except two or three Scots; beginning with Berengarius and Wicliffe, and ending with Robert Bolton and W. Wheatley. About forty three of the lives are embelliſhed with little copper prints of their heads before them, and in the prefatory epiſtle, our author, after having briefly touched upon the honours, uſes, and benefits of BIOGRAPHY, proceeds to diſtinguiſh the compilers of this collection, in theſe words— 'As for the makers thereof, they 'are many. Some done by Doctor Featly, now at 'reſt with God: viz. the lives of Jewel, Reynolds, 'Abbot, and divers others: ſome by that reverend 'and learned Divine, Mr Gataker: viz. the lives of 'Peter Martyr, Bale, Whitgift, Ridley, Whitaker, 'Parker, and others: Doctor Willet's life, by Doctor 'Smith, his ſon in law. Eraſmus his life, by the 'Reverend Biſhop of Kilmore (68): the life of Biſhop 'Andrews, by the judicious and induſtrious, my wor-'thy friend, Maſter Iſaackſon: and my meanneſs wrote 'all the lives of Beringarius, Hus, Hierom of Prague, 'Archbiſhop Cranmer, Maſter Fox, Perkins, Junius, '&c. ſave, the moſt part of the poetry at the end of 'every life was done by Maſter Quarles, father and 'ſon, ſufficiently known for their abilities therein. 'The reſt, the Stationer got tranſcribed out of Mr 'Holland, and other authors (69).' Before a little book of the Daily Devotions of Dr John Colet, Dean of St Paul's, and Founder of the Grammar School there, we ſee, a ſhort account of that Dean's life written by our author, T. Fuller; but it is a different work from that in this collection, and not near ſo long (70). It may be obſerved in this collection of lives, that the plan our author followed in compoſing his ſhare of it, is that which was then, among the moſt judicious writers in uſe; too modeſt to be juſtly charged with oſtentation: for the other compilers, who were alſo learned and ingenious men, have as little diſplayed the directions they had in chronology, or thoſe their readers might covet to their authorities, as himſelf; except one of them, who has bravely embroidered his margins, with above fourſcore references to the old Philoſophers, Fathers, Poets, &c. in the life of a modern Divine, within the compaſs of ſix leaves, and not five quotations in the whole that are directly perſonal, or do hiſtorically concern his ſubject (71).

was quite deſtitute, he wholly maintained, with lodging, diet, and ten pounds a year for other neceſſaries, till he died (o). In that year, his Hiſtory of the UNIVERSITY of CAMBRIDGE, and his Hiſtory of WALTHAM-ABBEY, were printed; and they are uſually annexed, as an appendix, to his volume intituled, The Church-Hiſtory of GREAT BRITAIN, which, after many interruptions, he brought out in a large folio, printed the ſame year, and then publiſhed, ſome few copies, it ſeems, with the date thereof in the title page; and the reſt with another title, dated the next year 1656, &c. and having then chambers in Sion College, London, for the benefit of the library there, he from thence publiſhed the ſaid volume (p). [O] It was commended by ſeveral, and cenſured by ſome.] This book, for which our author has been ſo variouſly characterized, bears the title of, The Church-Hiſtory of Great-Britain, from the Birth of Chriſt, until the year 1648. endeavoured by Thomas Fuller. London, printed for John Williams, &c. fol. 1656. It is divided into eleven books, whereof the ſixth is the hiſtory of Abbies; alſo into ſeventeen centuries, and moſt of them after the earlier times into ſeveral ſections; with a dedication before each, to ſome noble or eminent friend who was an encourager of his works, with their arms often printed from wooden cuts, in the initial letters; which particular publications of, and acknowledgments to his patrons, ſubſcribers, &c. begot him ſome particular envy, as the hiſtory itſelf did, ſome cenſure, for his moderation to all parties therein; without a great regard to which, by the moſt diſcreet conduct, he muſt in the latter part of this hiſtory, have brought himſelf when it was publiſhed into inextricable danger. Indeed he brought this hiſtory down too far within his own time, contrary to a good rule of his own (*): but he could no longer reſiſt the importunity of his friends, who had ſo long expected it, at this time, when truth could not be done right with ſafety, nor wrong with honour, to bring it out, as appears by the firſt words of his preface; which inform us, that an ingenious gentleman ſome months before it appeared, in jeſt-earneſt, adviſed him to make haſte with his Hiſtory of the Church of England, for fear, ſaid he, leaſt the Church of England be ended before the Hiſtory of it. It muſt be provoking enough in envious minds, to ſee the noble Duke of Richmond in the very firſt dedication of this book (72), had ſuch a ſingular regard to our author's judgment in the expoſition of the Scriptures, that his Grace would give him ſome favourite text to compoſe a ſermon upon; and the zealots of a party could deduce enough matter of reproach from his ſaying that, 'The three firſt books were chiefly 'written in the reign of the late King, as appears by 'the paſſages then proper for the government; and 'the other nine, ſince Monarchy was turned into a 'State (73).' As for the gentleman aforeſaid, who haſtened the publication, we have learnt it was Edward Waterhouſe, Eſq; the author of ſome learned books, which were well received; in one whereof, ſpeaking of our Church-Hiſtorian he calls him, 'Ingenious Dr Fuller; who will be more valued in 'after ages as moſt are, than in their own (74).' Another contemporary writer, in a tract publiſhed before the laſt quoted, having occaſion to conſult that part of this Church Hiſtory, treating of the foundation which was firſt begun at Chelſea, for a College of Controverſial Divinity againſt the Papiſts, but is now an Hoſpital for diſabled and ſuperannuated ſoldiers, has theſe words— 'But yet further, for the 'eſtabliſhing your judgments, and the attracting of 'your affections, let us produce the venerable rela'tion and judgment of one, who may be well called 'a Chryſoſtom; that is, Doctor Fuller, &c (75):' and further again, in another part of the ſame treatiſe; 'Let us hercupon ſtill hear, and heed what 'Doctor Fuller ſays; and he is ever moſt worthy to 'be heard, &c (76).' But ſomewhat earlier ſtill, there was another author of thoſe times, Mr Thomas Forde; a man of good genius, who was eſteemed no inconſiderable Poet and Orator; a volume of whoſe writings in proſe and verſe, has been elſewhere ſpoken of among our dramatic writers (77); in one part of which book, there is a very reſpectful letter, in commendation of this hiſtory, addreſſed, tho' by the initial letters of his name only, yet evidently, as may appear by the ſubſtance thereof, as follows,

'To Mr THOMAS FULLER.

'SIR,

'HAVING lately, not without pleaſure and 'profit read your Church-Hiſtory; by which 'you have not only indebted our Church in particular, 'but the whole commonwealth of learning in general; 'my memory continually upbraided me with ingratitude, till I found out this way to convey my reſentments. For though our returns of thanks ought to 'be large and univerſal as your merit, yet your goodneſs, I hope, will not refuſe the ſingle gratitude of 'private perſons. In that number, though the laſt, 'and the leaſt, I am bold to tender my mite. A taſk 'indeed better befitting a more equal pen, ſince none 'is able to do it but your own. But I know your 'modeſty is as great as your merit, the higheſt worths 'being always accompanied with the loweſt humility. 'May your name ever live, who have raiſed ſo many 'to life, and reſcued their memories from the tyranny 'of oblivion. Among many others, I am particularly obliged to your courteſy, in the remembrance 'of that good man Mr Udal, to whom, by kindred, 'I am ſomething related. One, of whom we have 'this tradition, that he was the firſt man King James 'aſked for when he came into England, and being 'anſwered, that he was dead, the King, whoſe judgment was an exact ſtandard of learning and learned 'men, replied, By my ſal, then the greateſt ſcholar 'in Europe's dead. And certainly, by his own party, 'if they may be admitted for competent judges, it is 'not yet reſolved, whether his learning or his zeal 'were greateſt; and they think, they juſtly boaſt him 'a Confeſſor, if not a Martyr, for that cauſe which 'ſince hath paid thoſe ſcores with intereſt. Now, 'though I am not heir to his opinions, yet a ſmall 'affinity to his perſon, makes me embrace the opportunity of proffering you that intelligence you com'plain to want, the rather, becauſe perhaps, no man 'can now do it but myſelf; and I have a relation of 'all his trials, cenſures, and ſentence, written by 'himſelf, which I doubt not may give you a ſatisfactory account in what you deſire. If you pleaſe to 'command it, I ſhall be ambitious to ſerve you and 'the truth therewith. But I could wiſh you would 'review that paſſage in the 31 Sect. after the execution of Udal, &c (78), for he died at the White 'Lyon, juſt as his pardon was procured, and was buried at St George's Southwark. And ſo I leave him 'to his reſt, wiſhing his good name and doctrines may 'ſurvive his diſcipline. Sir, you have not only engaged learning, but religion, to perpetuate your la'bours. Fame is much in arrears to your deſert, and 'therefore cannot in juſtice, but continue that vene'ration in length to your memory, which it yet wants 'in breadth. Thoſe religious houſes, erected by a 'better devotion than that which deſtroyed them, are 'more beholding to your pen, than to their founders, 'or materials; you having made them a taſk for the 'remembrance and admiration of future ages, ſo long 'as time ſhall hold a ſcythe, or fame a trumpet. I 'would ſay more, if the univerſal applauſe of all 'knowing men had not ſaved me a labour; and to 'pay you in ſome of your own coin, it is no flattery 'to affirm, what envy cannot deny. Did I not fore'ſee that the relation would ſwell my diſcourſe be'yond the limits of a letter, or the length of your 'patience, was invited to another living in Eſſex, which, for ſome reſpects to the patron, he undertook, and piouſly continued his labours there till his ſettlement at London (q). He ſeems to have had two great deliverances from death while he was in this county; for where he is ſpeaking of the ſaffron in it, which grows ſo plentifully about the town of Walden, he calls it an admirable cordial; adding, that, 'under God, I owe my life, when ſick of 'the ſmall-pox, to the efficacy thereof;' and Dr Baldwin Hamey, afterwards knighted, ſeems to have been his Phyſician in this illneſs (r). The other deliverance we have alſo in his own words, where he ſays, 'It is queſtionable, whether the making of gunpowder be 'more profitable or more dangerous, the mills in my pariſh having been five times blown up 'within ſeven years; but bleſſed be God without the loſs of any one man's life (s).' Before he left Eſſex he made, as we are told, his laſt Will; which, after his death, was repoſited in the Prerogative-office of Canterbury, at Doctor's-Commons in London; where, with others made by ſome of the ſame name, it is to be ſeen (t). But now another noble patron, George Lord Berkeley, having made him his Chaplain, he took his leave of that county, to the great reluctance of his pariſhioners, and was preſented by his Lordſhip to the living of Cranford in Middleſex, where he was no leſs generally beloved and reſpected, than at his other livings he had been (u). Ever ſince the Church Hiſtory aforeſaid was publiſhed, Dr Heylin had been hatching his Animadverſions upon it and ſome others, which he printed in 1659. This invidious taſk, as he owns it himſelf to have been (w), diverted our author from his other ſtudies to return an anſwer to it, which he publiſhed with no leſs ſpeed than ſucceſs within the ſame year; of both which we ſhall ſay ſomething more in a note apart [P]: And when Dr Heylin's own Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, only of the Reformation,

(78) Church Hiſt. lib. IX. ſect. viii. but that this was only a little ſlip, or inadvertency, may be ſeen in ſect. or paragr. 4. where he ſays that Udal died peaceably in his bed.

And if we may judge of Hercules 'by his foot, of the whole piece by the remnant, and 'of them by their remains, I ſhould ſuppoſe them not 'behind many in England. [P] Of both which we ſhall ſay ſomething more in a note apart.] We have ſeen in the letter, recited in the laſt note, a little miſtake of our author's, in a generous and genteel manner rectified by Mr Forde. We have alſo met with ſome agreeable converſation, which is ſaid to have paſſed between our author and his ever-chearful and friendly acquaintance, Mr Iſaac Walton, upon the general character of this Church-Hiſtory, when it firſt came abroad. For Walton, taking occaſion, upon reading ſomething in it, relating to one of the lives, he was collecting materials for writing, I think, that of Mr Richard Hooker, to viſit him with other company; and our author knowing how intimate he was with ſeveral of the Biſhops and antient Clergy, firſt aſked him what he thought of the Hiſtory himſelf, and was then curious to know, what reception it had met with among them: Walton anſwered, that he thought it ſhould be acceptable to all tempers, becauſe there were ſhades in it for the warm, and ſunſhine for thoſe of a cold conſtitution; that with youthful readers, the facetious parts would be profitable, to make the ſerious more palatable; while ſome reverend old readers might fancy themſelves, in his Hiſtory of the Church, as in a flower-garden, or one full of ever-greens: and why not, ſaid Fuller, the Church Hiſtory ſo decked, as well as the Church itſelf, at a moſt Holy Seaſon; or the Tabernacle of old, at the Feaſt of Boughs? That was, but for a ſeaſon, ſaid Walton; in your Feaſt of Boughs, they may conceive, we are ſo overſhadowed throughout, that the parſon is more ſeen than his congregation, and this, ſometimes inviſible to its own acquaintance; who may wander in the ſearch, till they are loſt in the labyrinth: oh, ſaid Fuller, the very Children of our Iſrael may find their way out of this wilderneſs: true, returned Walton; as indeed they have here ſuch a Moſes to conduct them (81). Theſe were Laymen; how ſome of the Clergy have treated this hiſtory, we are now to relate; and particularly the author of animadverſions on it This was Dr Peter Heylin, a man whoſe learning had been well employed, if it could have reduced his unhappy temper; which obſtructing his own preferment, moved his diſcontented ſpirit to oppoſe that of others; and liſting his hand againſt every body, raiſed theirs againſt him. This Doctor having written the Hiſtory of our Champion of England (82), took a pique, it ſeems, partly from the ſlight grounds of our author's making a little parallel of Perſeus and Andromeda, with St George and the King of Lybia's daughter (83); and taking ſome further diſtaſte, that himſelf was leſs mentioned, or with leſs homage than he expected, in ſome other parts of his writings, eſpecially for his reflection on the Doctor's reflecting ſtory on the antiquity of the Univerſity of Cambridge (84), kept feeding his rancour upon this Church Hiſtory till it broke out, however he would have us believe it a taſk impoſed upon him, in theſe Animadverſions (85), before which he has written an Introduction, and given therein, the anatomy of the ſaid Hiſtory; diſſecting it into many parts, and then reading lectures upon the unſoundneſs of all: beginning, I. At the title: of the Church Hiſtory from Chriſt; by which, expecting an allowance of a Chriſtian Church in Britain, in the time of Chriſt; he betrays his diſappointment, in our author's refuting the popiſh pretenſions of St Peter's planting the goſpel here, or any other of the Apoſtles, &c. ſo early from Rome; and ſo, Mother-Church in that age, is defeated of the duty of a daughter! II Church-Hiſtory of Britain, is mighty exceptionable with him; becauſe there is little ſaid of the Churches of mation, appeared, it gave leſs ſatisfaction, and was by others no leſs animadverted on. They had no further controverſy after the ſaid anſwer, but were both thereupon, as we have of Scotland and Ireland. III. 'Tis not properly called a Church-Hiſtory, becauſe 'tis an aggregation of heterogeneous bodies. There is too much variety; and, a Church Rhapſody, or Fuller's Miſcellanies, had been a fitter title: ſo picks us out theſe impertinent parts; IV. Such as, Title pages a dozen; Dedications as many; and about threeſcore more, to other patrons, before the ſubdivided ſections. This number of Patrons was an intolerable felicity, eſpecially as our author has, more than once, let us into his good huſbandry, of raiſing a Nurſery of them (*). V. His Heraldry, Blazon of Arms, Deſcents of Noble Families, Rolls of Battle-Abbey, Arms and Names of the Conqueror's Knights billeted with the Monks of Ely: catalogue of Adventurers with Richard I. to Paleſtine; which he thinks might have better ſerved his Hiſtory of the Holy Wars; but being alſo what would engage the young Nobility and Gentry, for whom he ſo much deſigned this book, is very diſpleaſing. VI. Then alſo, his Epitaphs, and Tranſlations of other pieces of Poetry, ſprinkled up and down, as another attraction of his younger readers to the graver parts, and for the enlivening or illuſtration of his characters, are wholly diſallowed; becauſe, among the other antient Hiſtorians, he ſays, Plutarch and Suetonius yield him no example; and therefore it looks rather like a Church Romance. VII. His raking into Popiſh Legends was unneceſſary; that is, he ſhould not have expoſed ſo much, and armed his readers ſo well againſt the eccleſiaſtical impoſtures and miracles therein, deviſed to promote the admiration and bigotry of the people, and augment the profits of the Monks and Prieſts. VIII. Above all, ſays the Doctor, recommend me to his merry tales, and ſcraps of trencher jeſts, frequently interlaced in all parts of the Hiſtory; which, extracted into a book by themſelves (*), might be ſerved up, he thinks, for a ſecond courſe to the banquet of jeſts; or wits, fits, and fancies; or the old hundred merry tales. But would one think his own ſeverity could fall into the ſame levities he cenſures, in theſe animadverſions? Yes, when they will gratify his ſpleen; tho' it be with a trencher-jeſt, out of any common jeſt-book in Grub-Street; as where, being inflamed at a ſtory our author recites of a Lady, who told Archbiſhop Laud of her going over betimes to Rome, becauſe, ſhe perceived his Lordſhip and many others haſtning thither, and ſhe did not love to go in a crowd (†); he thereupon returns a ſtory of another Lady; at whoſe table one Mr Fuller was a welcome, tho' frequent gueſt; and being offered by her the wing of a Woodcock, he was ſo very importunate to know, how ſhe could tell a woodcock from a woodhen, that the Lady at laſt anſwered, a Woodcock was fuller headed, fuller breaſted, fuller thigh'd; and, in a word, every way, Fuller (86); ſo hard it is to halt before a cripple! But this is not the only time the Doctor went aſtray, in the path he had given ſuch expectations he could direct others. For our author might have retorted this jeſt, in a ſtory of one Dr Heylin, who travelling not far from home to Oxford, was earneſtly intreated by the man who was with him, to lead the way thro' the foreſt of Whichwood; but the Doctor loſt his way, and wanted a leader himſelf. Strange! ſaid the fellow, that you, who made a book of the whole world (†), can't find your way out of this wood (87). But he has not done with our author yet; for the next objection is, IX. His manifold excurſions about the Antiquity of Cambridge; in which tho' this animadverter pretends to forbare awakening a uſeleſs controverſy, that had ſo long lain aſleep, yet he refers his reader to his animadverſions, for what he could oppoſe our author therein; but might poſſibly have teſtified more diſcretion, in recommending to both Univerſities, ſuch a friendly and laudable emulation in their ſtudies, as ſhould make it more difficult to determine, which of them were of greater ſervice and honour to their country, by their inſtructions of mankind, than which of them is of greater antiquity. X. That there is too little of the Church and too much of the State Hiſtory in his book; which, tho' ſufficiently implied in other articles before, yet muſt more diſtinctly appear, to increaſe the reckoning. For our author has not, it ſeems, frequently enough to pleaſe this candid and humane critic, diſplayed the calling of national and provincial Synods, and made their influence, or authority, ſufficiently glaring and aſcendant over the civil power; he wanted more ſuch notable Convocations, as threw about their firebrands of Sequeſtration, Deprivation, Suſpenſion, Excommunication, and other Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, without any confirmation of Acts of Parliament. More of the Heterodoxies and Superſtitions of the Church of Rome; and the whole Reformation ſettled upon the Doctrine of the Apoſtles: More of the Aſſaults and Batteries of the Puritan faction; and juſtification of Rites and Ceremonies. X. He diſcerns a continual vein of Puritaniſm running thro' the book; which thro' the facetiouſneſs of his ſtile, may work upon unwary readers. As if he allowed the ſword to be put into the common peoples hands, when the reforming humour ſhall grow ſtrong enough: that the opinions of Wicliffe and Calvin are too much favoured; the Hierarchy of Biſhops too coldly pleaded for; Nonconformiſts followed with Plaudites; Fathers of the Church often ſent off in ſilence. But makes a heavy clutter about the Ceremonies, and that diſpute of the Communion-Table ſtanding Altar-wiſe; alſo of a chapel built north and ſouth; tho' King James could ſay, it was no matter how the chapel ſtood, ſo the heart was right; and another unconſecrated; with more, about hoods, gowns, caſſocks, ſurplices, and ſuch like. And laſt of all, our critic chews over what we mentioned before, from the preface of this Church Hiſtory; in which our author diſtinguiſhes what part was written in the reign of the King, and what ſince Monarchy was turned to a State; by which, as 'tis conſtrued, he only meant to temper it to the palate of the preſent Government, whatever it was, &c. Theſe are the general heads of objection in the Doctor's Introduction. Then he attempts to make them good by above three hundred particulars, in the Animadverſions themſelves. To theſe is annexed An Appendix, containing the Apology of Dr John Coſin's, Dean of Peterborough: in anſwer to ſome paſſages in the Church Hiſtory of Britain, in which he finds himſelf concerned. This letter, in anſwer to our author's charge (88), in relation to Dr Coſin's impriſonment of Mr Smart a Prebendary of Durham, for his ſermon againſt certain ſuperſtitious innovations, imputed to the Doctor; for which ſuffering the Parliament had voted Mr Smart damages, is dated from Paris, April 6th 1658; and therein, the Doctor thinks, that he inſerted that paſſage upon the falſe reports and informations of others, who were loth to let an old malicious accuſation die, as it might have done, if he had not kept it ſtill alive, and recorded it to poſterity. But it appears alſo therein, that our author wrote him a letter of apology for publiſhing the ſaid miſinformation, which the Dean ſhould have had printed here with his own letter; eſpecially ſince our author therein offered to make him amends, in the next book he publiſhed; which he has very ingenuouſly done (89). As for Heylin's Animadverſions, tho' 'tis allowed they contain many uſeful remarks, and corrections of ſeveral involuntary miſtakes in this Church Hiſtory, as to ſome circumſtances of time, diſtinction of families, forms and ceremonies, &c. and might have been proper, in ſome reaſonable degree, to amend the errors therein; yet they appear nothing ſo enormous as in his repreſentations; being thereby ſo much aggravated and magnified. For if the Doctor does not frequently explain a truth into what is erroneous, he often will, an inſignificant error into one that is material, where an unprejudiced reader would conceive none at all; or diſcern no fault in the hiſtory, till it is made one in the animadverſion. Even the reflexions of others upon the Hierarchy, he turns upon the Hiſtorian, tho' he mentions, but to refute them, only that this eternal caveller may add ſome further ſuperfluous refutation of his own; and many times wilfully miſconſtrues his apparent meaning. But the great burden of his cavils, is the allowance of any miſmanagements in the Monarchical Goverment, and ſpeaking with any candour or lenity of ſome who were afterwards favoured have obſerved, well reconciled, eſpecially when the Doctor's turbulent and acrimonious ſpirit was calmed and moderated by ſome of the many antagoniſts he had raiſed againſt himſelf;

voured under the adminiſtration of the commonwealth; which could not be avoided at the unlucky juncture when his hiſtory was publiſhed, without his inevitable ruin, as was before obſerved. If that inceſſant wrangler may not be flatly accuſed with Popiſh tenets, in the diſcipline he beſtows on this hiſtory; yet what our author has related on another occaſion, may be here applied; that, as that Driver at the Olympic games of old was held the conqueror, who could run his chariot wheels moſt near the mark, and yet not touch the mark, to hamper himſelf or impede his carreer: So that Divine was reckoned the hero of Laud's party, who could border, or drive up neareſt the Papiſts, and not intangle himſelf in the charge of Popery; which yet Dr Heylin had not the dexterity to keep himſelf clear of, as may be read, when his own Hiſtory of the Reformation appeared (90), in the Animadverſions that were made upon that; the author, or authors whereof, having informed him therein, from many inſtances, that, 'we 'ſhould rather judge you to be the pupil of Dr Harding, whom you would be thought to oppoſe; than of 'Biſhop Jewel, whom you ſeem to reverence, &c. (91).' But others ſince, have treated it no better than as a libel upon the Princes, Prelates, and all, who, ſo much at their own peril, purged our Church of its corruptions, and eſtabliſhed the ſaid Reformation. It may be ſeen in Biſhop Burnet, how he ſeems to have been ſet on by the Church of Rome, in thoſe violent prejudices he has exerted againſt this of England, without the ſupport of any authorities for the ſame (92). And alſo in Biſhop Barlow, beſides others of great knowledge and credit, who might be named, how juſtly, for repreſenting our ſaid Reformers as a pack of Fanatics, he is reproached with being guilty of ſcandalous injuries, both to Truth and the Church (93). The ſame year that Heylin publiſhed thoſe animadverſions upon our author's hiſtory, Fuller ſet forth his reply to them, intituled, The Appeal of injured Innocence to the learned and impartial Reader, in anſwer to ſome Animadverſions of Dr Heylin's on his Church Hiſtory. Printed in a thin folio 1659, being, as one author terms it, 'a very modeſt, but 'moſt rational and polite defence, to the aforeſaid 'exceptions againſt that elaborate piece (94).' Some have ſpoken of it, as if, he was not only to be pardoned but praiſed, for tripping in his ſteps, who could make ſuch graceful recovery of them. And others have obſerved, that the errrors in his hiſtory are ſo ingeniouſly excuſed or confeſſed in his appeal, that he is even pleaſing to his readers in thoſe faults for which he has ſo wittily apologized (95). But his unquiet antagoniſt, to a book of his diſputations with ſeveral other perſons, publiſhed the ſame year (96), has added in the Appendix, An Exchange of Letters between Mr Thomas Fuller of Waltham, and Dr Peter Heylin of Abington, with an examination alſo of ſome paſſages in the ſaid appeal. In this appendix, Dr Heylin allows that Mr Fuller's appeal is a well-ſtudied anſwer, compoſed with ingenuity and judgment (97). And that he does not ſtand wilfully in any error whereof he finds conviction, however traverſing ſome points; which the Doctor thinks might have been with more honour to truth, declined. It appears here alſo, that our author, when his appeal was publiſhed, ſent it to the Doctor; likewiſe ſuch a letter with it, as very much mollified his cenſor's harſh opinions, and promoted their ſucceeding reconciliation. It alſo probably conduced to the abridgement of his reply to ſo long an anſwer; tho' the motives which the Doctor here publiſhes thereto, are, that three parts in five of the appeal are the words of the animadverſions; that, in the two other parts, our author confeſſes miſtakes, and promiſes corrections in the next edition of his hiſtory; and that other traverſes or evaſions in the appellant, are tantamount to acknowledgments, not to be qualified with the name of ſatisfactory anſwers; and therefore, he thinks no ſpecial replication neceſſary to them (98). But it is manifeſt, that letter before mentioned, and perhaps others which our author ſent him, did allay his indignation; wherein he aſſures the Doctor, that, 'he was cordial to the 'cauſe of the Engliſh Church, and that his hoary hairs 'would go down with ſorrow for her ſufferings;' becauſe the Doctor ſays thereof, that, 'It tended eſpe-'cially to the begetting ſuch a friendly correſpondence 'betwixt us, as might conduce to the eſtabliſhment of 'a future peace:' And ſo it did, after our author had been more explicit in ſome ſerious conferences with him at Abington. For the writer, who well knew the concluſion of theſe altercations between them, aſſerts that the diſpute in relation to this Church Hiſtory was ſoon ended; 'for the oil our author had beſtowed upon 'that labour, being poured into the freſh wound of 'this quarrel, did ſo aſſuage the heat of their conteſt, 'that it was ſoon healed into a perfect amicable clo-'ſure, and mutual endearment (99).' And what expectations the Papiſts had from this controverſy, if they had no hand in it, for that more hands than Dr Heylin's contributed to thoſe animadverſions is evident enough (100), may alſo appear in another part of his Biographer aforeſaid, where he informs us, that, 'It 'much rejoiced the Roman party, when this miſunder-'ſtanding happened between Dr Heylin and himſelf, 'about his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, tho' they caught no 'fiſh in thoſe troubled waters; while they toſſed their 'proud billows forward and backward, the Prote-'ſtant cauſe was ſafely anchored and moored between 'them (101).' And thus his orthodox principles, as a true ſon of the Church of England, were no more called in queſtion.

As to thoſe more obvious qualities in our author, which inclined him ſo much to illuminate the obſcure, and enliven the languid parts of this Hiſtory, as might render them more engaging to the generality of his readers; it has been objected, that he was too witty, too lepid, and indulgent therein of his own fancy and conceits; which, tho' often very ingeniouſly applied, it is thought he would have much reſtrained, if he had ſubmitted to the advice of his good and worthy friend, as he ſtiles him (102), Mr William Somner, the Antiquary of Canterbury (103), and not lightned ſome weighty matters ſo frequently with jeſts and tales; however, he might deſign only to enlighten them, or think them diſperſed in his materials, like ſome allay in metals, which may temper and diſpoſe even gold itſelf, to be more binding and work the better. But that objection alſo, it ſeems, has ſince been accumulated upon him, with too much violence and exceſs. For ſome late Examiners of his works, in a few remarks left upon them, as well as other writers on ſerious ſubjects, would be for reducing this cenſure to its juſt bounds or degrees; and therefore obſerve, that much of his manner was the mode of the reign wherein he laid the foundation of his ſtudies, and not to be particularly charged upon any new obtruſion of his; further obſerving, that much of what has been diſparaged with the ſlighting title of jeſts and tales, are indeed apophthegms, and parallel events; ſo intended by the author, and ſo received and revived by unprejudiced readers, as inſtructive and corroborating ornaments; like what may be ſeen in many ſolemn diſcourſes of great antiquity, being an imitation of the Philology therein. They have thought alſo, that an author may make even Church hiſtory in ſome parts diverting, without making a diverſion of the Church; and therefore, that he may redicule ſome monſtrous and miſchievous impoſitions on it, without making it ridiculous; as we daily behold in Civil, and even Eccleſiaſtical life, the moſt ſerious and ſober negociations carried on by men of volatile and humorous diſpoſitions, who may ſurely ſometimes ſmile, or even laugh over their buſineſs, and not laugh at it; there being great difference between a man's ſhewing a little jocularity now and then, in the faithful diſcharge of a truſt he has taken upon him, and betraying it into contempt, by making jokes of the truſt itſelf. Therefore it has been queſtioned, when an author, who has the uncommon talents to render himſelf moſt pleaſing and agreeable, ſhall, by an uncommon induſtry to exert them, render himſelf leaſt ſo, whether there is not a ſiniſter and ungrateful reception made of his labours? And whether any faults or failings, in the government either of Church or State, may not be ſometimes corrected, with as much ſucceſs, and more humanity, in a good humour, than a ſour and moroſe one?

one? But if, in a copious work, wherein there muſt be a great diverſity or diſparity of actors, their actions and arguments, which muſt ſometimes appear ridiculous even to one another, all confirmation of the good, or chaſtiſement of the bad, by the illuſtration of any ſimilar ſtory, or witty ſaying, muſt be rejected, as altogether unſeaſonable, in reſpect to the grave title of it, what will become of the graveſt Hiſtorians, Philoſophers, and Fathers of old; who in the ſame manner derided the impoſtures in the Pagan, as our modern Divines have done in the Popiſh, and other Chriſtian ſyſtems of worſhip; or the Prophets and Apoſtles themſelves, who have ſo agreeably embelliſhed and enforced their doctrines, with fables and parables? And if theſe illuſtrations are eſtabliſhed by ſuch unerring authorities, in the moſt inſpired and divine, the moſt ſublime and ſpiritual writings, ſure they may be ſafely practiſed in thoſe that are of temporal, or human concern and inſtitution. If then, ſay they, notwithſtanding ſuch great examples, ſome men can ſtill be ſo ſaturnine, as to reliſh nothing mercurial; no facetious or other delectable repreſentation, naturally ariſing, in the miſcellaneous occurrence of hiſtorical matter; if wit and humour are ſuch diſaſters, bleſſed are the dolts and dizzards! Or, as Falſtaff phraſes it; If ſack and ſugar be a ſin, the Lord help the wicked! But if our Hiſtorian has treated us too plentifully therewith, and, like a prodigal ſon, been ſo laviſh of his treaſure, as to be ungeneroufly reduced to huſks, with thoſe who prefer them to pearls, his motives for ſuch liberty are yet thought to be miſinterpreted; and this argument is not relinquiſhed without ſome indications, as we ſhall ſee, at the grounds and ſources of thoſe rigorous and aggravated conſtructions, which have been made of the uſe of wit and humour, in ſuch parts of a grave and ſerious work, which give birth to them; or any ſuch hiſtory, as contains matters no leſs prophane than ſacred in it; eſpecially in reſpect to our author, and what has been written on him, by a late hiſtorical critic; who may yet have wronged more characters without wit, than Fuller did with it; or traduced them undeſervedly in earneſt, more than ever he did by a deſerved jeſt; and with that gravity he required in our Hiſtorian, may have done him, and many others, more injuſtice than if he had reprehended them with levity; as where he charges him with not having taken care enough of his ſtile; when, as it is obſerved, there is no writing in his ſtile, without being more careful and delicate than we generally think it needful now to be: He adds, that if a pretty ſtory comes in our author's way, affording ſcope of clinch and droll, off it goes, with all the gaity of the ſtage; and that the moſt ſerious parts of his hiſtory, are ſo interlaced with pun and quibble, as if he deſigned to ridicule the annals of our Church into a fable or romance; of which, if proper diſtinction has not been made above, it may, by reading the hiſtory itſelf. As for puns, quibbles, and clinches, which are but the ſhadows of Wit, 'tis no wonder they are at preſent ſo much out of requeſt, as to be almoſt out of ſight, ſince the ſubſtance itſelf is ſo little ſeen, in the many volumes that are daily publiſhed; but they were not always in ſuch low ebb of eſteem as they are now; for ſome of the graveſt Antients ſo loved the goddeſs, that they would embrace the very clouds which appeared in her ſhape; and they were favourably enough thought of even in Fuller's time, or elſe ſuch as may occur in him, would not have eſcaped the cenſure, much leſs engaged the imitation, even of his captious opponents. Indeed that critick alſo adds, that if this Church Hiſtory could be refined, it would be of good uſe; ſince there are in it ſome things of moment, hardly to be had elſewhere, which may often illuſtrate dark paſſages in more ſerious writers, &c. (104). Theſe things of moment, are ſeveral letters, records, inſtruments of Church and State, and other authentic evidences unprinted in other hiſtories, thro' the friendly communications of Sir Thomas Cotton, Sir Simonds d'Ewes, Sir Simon Archer, and other treaſurers of antiquities. He has alſo erected, as ſo many beautiful ſtatues, abundance of characters of eminent men throughout this hiſtory; many of them latterly, drawn from the life, and alſo ſcarcely elſewhere to be ſeen; out of ſuch circumſtances therein, which occurred from his own obſervations, or the intelligence of friends, as would yield the moſt remarkable connections or contraſts, &c. and he could beſt animate or adorn, with alluſions or reflections, political, moral, and divine. Which embelliſhment is always deſirable, unleſs where the chippings are more valuable than the little jewels that are reduced and ſhaped out of them, or many ſubſtantial matters of fact have been dropt, or excluded, for ſome more capable of ſuch decorations; which indeed, in ſome hiſtories, may be a little like filling of houſes with ſo much carving and painting, as to leave them unfurniſhed with neceſſary utenſils for every ordinary occaſion. If his gay ſparkling tales are ſuch eye-ſores, they may be overlooked by his gloomy or tender-ſighted readers; and as for the arrows of his jeſts, they are uſually ſo fledged with the feathers of his ingenuity, that, by a well-tempered and countervailing moderation, they break the force of their own flight, and defeat the danger of the points they are tipp'd with: ſo that we may ſmile more at the innocent effects of his wit, than frown at any rankling wounds that are made by it. But ſuch is the hard fate of an author, eſpecially if he happen to be a man of uncommon abilities, and ſo prone are his readers to calumny, thro' the conceit, or pretence of a ſuperior taſte or diſtinction, that if there be but one exceptionable quality in him, it ſhall be ever uppermoſt, and fix ſuch a diſreliſh as many excellencies cannot qualify. Had he violated the decorum required by good manners and morals; had he profaned, or defiled his pen, with the impiety, or ribaldry of low, licentious, and abandoned writers, he might not have been treated with greater ſeverity, tho' he had then deſerved it. However, ſince ſome varieties he deſigned in the entertainment of his readers, agreed not with the weak or dainty appetites of all, ſome reaſons for it have been aſſigned, as the grounds and ſources of that diſtaſte, in the remarks here extracted; from whence we further collect, that this mixture of wit in hiſtory, was thought to treat irreverently that of the Church, however decently, conciſely, and pertinently, interwoven or adapted; becauſe it might be apt to make it too familiarly read, ſo be hurtful to that awe and veneration which muſt be kept up therein; as nothing but ſincerity and ſanctity ſhould be thought to have any footing there: But his frequent application of the divine texts of ſcripture, ſo wittily, how adaptly or reſpectfully ſoever alſo, in it, to human or ſecular affairs, might be as reproveable, for the ſame reaſon as his pleaſant ſtories or ſayings; ſince the very tranſlation of thoſe ſcriptures into our own tongue, was once even ſentenced to the flames, as what might alſo bring the religion itſelf they contain, into a familiarity too great with the vulgar. Then his rhetorical ſtile, his quaint conformities, contradiſtinctions, and other elaborate niceties of an elegant and ſententious diction; thoſe who have the capacity, either want the forms and rules, or will not ſpare the time and pains to imitate; therefore ſuch precedents muſt be rejected, as may tend to exact or revive an obſolete and troubleſome compliance. Beſides, bright and witty authors on any ſubject, muſt be diſcountenanced by dull and heavy ones, as riches and honours are by thoſe in a poor and abject condition; who, to ſuggeſt in themſelves more excellent properties, will rail at what they cannot reach: For if ſuch inconvenient examples were to predominate; if florid and pithy writings were to prevail, or wit and eloquence become in vogue, it would make a dearth at the preſs; the majority of voices would be ſilenced by a few, and the generality of authors, being out of the faſhion, might as well be out of the world. But, after all, it is not expected to eſtabliſh a common practice of writing books, by any recommendation of ſuch patterns, in theſe apologetical remarks, as our Hiſtorian has left us. For the author of them pronounces him more liable to robbery than rivalry; and, which is worſe, many who have made him firſt ſtand and deliver, have afterwards abuſed him and defaced his credit, to prevent their own detection: ſo that there is no great danger of his corrupting thoſe readily to an ill taſte of imitation, who are humbly reſtrained from aſcending higher than repetition, saw his efforts so ineffectual to weaken our author's interest after the Restoration, that Fuller then grew in greater favour at Court, than ever he had been before. It was his noble patron aforesaid it seems (x), the Lord Berkeley, who, at that grand revolution, took Fuller over with him to the Hague (y), that King Charles the Second might also hear his singular excellencies in the pulpit, and his grateful salutations, upon the prevailing resolution of his subjects to receive and obey him in his own kingdoms; but the croud and hurry being too great there, he had soon after better opportunities of expressing his cordial and dutiful satisfaction upon that topic at Whitehall (z); and, among the many loyal congratulations which were made to his Majesty upon his joyful and magnificent entry, our author revived his acquaintance with the Muses, to address him poetically also upon that occasion (a). He was, a short while before, re-admitted to his Lecture in the Savoy, and now restored to his Prebend of Salisbury, after being twenty-years, as the writer of his life says, deprived of it's profits. He was chosen Chaplain in Extraordinary to his Majesty, created Doctor of Divinity by the King's letters of recommendation to the University of Cambridge, dated August the Second 1660 (b); and so well grounded was his expectation of higher advancement, that, had he lived about a twelvemonth longer, 'twas thought he would have been made, upon the translation of Dr Gauden from Exeter to Worcester, or his death soon after, Bishop of one of those Sees (c), thro' the Berkeleys interest with the Queen-Mother, and Princess Henrietta, soon after Duchess of Orleans, at their late being in England. Now being commodiously enabled to prosecute his studies, he closely applied himself to set a finishing hand to his WORTHIES of ENGLAND [Q]. This work was the petition, unless the art was as perfectly attained of making, by bidding writers go and be witty, as the Alchemist implied his was, who bid his believer go forth and be rich.

Thus we have given the sense and substance of some Reasons which were drawn up for the toleration of wit in due proportion, and in the proper parts of serious subjects, with respect to our author; and found, among some critical papers, of a late gentleman who had a hand in the original Spectator (105), with others he also wrote of a political nature, in opposition to the late Earl of Orford. And tho' we have likewise seen some notes which a late Prelate (106) left, in the margins of Bishop Nicholson's Historical Library, correcting some errors therein; yet they distinguish his to be a different hand from that which wrote these Remarks on our Historian; and we have been informed (107), they were most probably written by the author of a treatise published entirely in favour of this subject (108), as an addition he might design to incorporate in the next impression of it; in which treatise, the said author has quoted a Divine, named Mr Gilbert Rule, who says, he knows of none that blame the excellent writings of Mr Fuller, for the pleasantry in them; and has given us, throughout the said tract, abundance of authorities and examples, of writing in the same manner; especially out of Ecclesiastical authors, in all ages, and of all ranks and persuasions.

[Q] To set a finishing hand to his Worthies of England.] This work, which was part of it printed before the author died, seems not, in the lives or characters in some of the counties, especially of Wales, so finished as it would probably have been, if he had lived to see it compleatly published. It is intituled, The HISTORY of the WORTHIES of ENGLAND: Endeavoured by THOMAS FULLER, D. D. folio. 1662. With a sculpture of his effigies prefixed, engraved by David Loggan, having this inscription round it, Thomas Fuller, S. T. D. Ætat. 53. 1661; this motto at top, Methodus Mater Memoriæ; and these verses at bottom,

The Graver here, hath well thy face design'd,
But no hand, FULLER, can express thy mind;
For that, a resurrection gives to those,
Whom silent monuments did long enclose.

Being a posthumous publication, it is dedicated to King Charles the Second, by the author's son, Mr John Fuller, a young Divine of Cambridge. In the said editor's preface, we are assured that the unprinted counties were faithfully set forth from the author's copy, without any additions; and that the volume was printed for expedition at several presses, which may account for the several errors in the numbers of the pages, and thereby, the want of an index or two to the whole, which might have directed to the local commodities and personal characters therein: However, there has lately been published an index of the personal part, sometimes to be met with at the end of such copies as have been new bound to receive it. This book, tho' never wholly reprinted, has been partly revived in epitomies of the whole (109), or dividedly, in a work, geographical, historical, and political, whereof the second part is abstracted from these lives (110). The subject matter of the book, is distributed under the several counties of England and Wales; each division beginning first, with the commodities, products, and other particulars most eminent and remarkable in each county; whether waters, minerals, plants, animals, manufactures, buildings, battles, proverbs, &c. then the worthies born or residing therein, marshalled under their respective ranks or professions; the whole contents of each county, ending with tables of the gentry that were therein in the reign of King Henry the Sixth; and a list of the Sheriffs, for several Kings reigns, down to King James or King Charles the First, with their arms described, and places of abode. Prefixed to the whole, is a copious introduction, in near twenty sheets, divided into many chapters; distinctly treating of this grand and comprehensive plan, the matter, order, and stile, &c. shewing how methodical and uniform he has been throughout; also apologizing for any defects that may have escaped his pen, and answering many objections which might be made to any part thereof: But as the heads of those preliminary discourses will best explain the contents of the book, and display as well the variety, as the grandeur of the undertaking; and as a recital of them will give the most ready command of the whole scheme, to those who would only be informed, or reminded thereof; or such as may be inclined to revive the author in a more correct edition; give us a continuation, or any other improvement of his model; the said heads are therefore here offered to their consideration, as follow.

(111) Vide note [G].

Tho' our author was very diligent, as hath been atteſted in a note before (111), in collecting his materials for this work; yet when ſeveral parts of it were written, he had the diſadvantage of being unſettled, remote from proper libraries, and intelligent converſation, being as it were a travelling writer, and forced to leave blank ſpaces, eſpecially for Dates; wherein he has ſometimes modeſtly left his reader rather uninformed than miſinformed; and ſometimes again filled them up conjecturally, and without any ſuppoſed need of nice recollection, as he deſigned to be more exact upon better opportunities of examination; in ſeveral whereof he was prevented by death. But tho' he looked upon dates as ſo many little ſparkling gems in hiſtory, that would reflect the cleareſt and moſt ſudden light, a great way's off, he ſtill found or thought them very ſlippery ware, liable, by the ſmalleſt and moſt imperceptible variations, to lead us greatly aſtray from truth; and ſpeaks of Chronology in one of his books, as of a little ſurly animal, that was apt to bite the fingers of thoſe who handled it with greater familiarity than was abſolutely neceſſary; yet he knew, there was no giving any ſatisfactory intelligence without it, eſpecially in the writing of lives. But indeed, an accurate regard to the directions thereof, was little in uſe with any writers in this particular branch of hiſtory at thoſe times; as, among many others, may be obſerved, to go no further, in the author of his own life, whoſe deficiencies we have here been at much trouble to ſupply; one inſtance only whereof we ſhall now repeat, having touched upon it before, in that author, which is, that tho' he gives us the titles of almoſt all Fuller's books, and their ſizes, he has not given us the date of one. But it was a general or faſhionable neglect, eſpecially in the more polite and ornate writers, as if they thought that arithmetical figures would look like ſo many ſcars in the ſleek face of their rhetorical phraſe. But what our author, in apology for himſelf, has ingeniouſly obſerved further on this topic, we refer to his own words, in one or two of the chapters, whereof we have before given the heads (112). As to the hiſtorical particulars of theſe lives, no man could pretend to be very circumſtantial, in a work that propoſed to revive the famous men in a whole nation; ſuch an undertaking can, or ſhould give but a general and compendious view of them. Suppoſe here are eighteen or twenty hundred eminent perſons characteriſed, much after the manner of thoſe in his Church Hiſtory; to have given a general ſatisfaction in all parts of the lives, actions, and works, of one or two only in every hundred, might have required more eyes, hands, and years, than nature allowed this author, and perhaps more abilities, knowledge, or information, than could be juſtly pretended to, by any of his ungrateful cavellers. Then for the errors that muſt unavoidably occur, in the revival of ſuch multitudes in all ages, our author's own apology, as it will be equally needful to any other compiler of a numerous collection of lives, is here produced from his own words, upon ſome objections made to Mr Fox the Martyrologiſt, as follow. 'It is impoſſible for an author of a voluminous book, 'conſiſting of ſeveral perſons and circumſtances, reader, in pleading for Maſter Fox, I plead for myſelf, 'to have ſuch ubiquitary intelligence, as to apply the 'ſame infallibly to every particular (113).' But there is no winning the favour of thoſe who think they have a licence for detraction, and may ſpoil an author with impunity, when he is incapable of ſelf-defence, both of his reputation and his labours. Thus we may ſee ſome very raſh cenſurers, ſuperficially read, who have often pronounced their anathemas upon many other Hiſtorians, from the titles only of their writings, and ſometimes without having ever ſeen ſo much as them, treating him alſo, like thoſe who cannot be content with ſheering the inoffenſive prey that is free-yielding of his wool, but they muſt butcher him too: for ſurely, few have been ſo much pillaged, who have been ſo much diſparag'd; he has been reproached for his ingenuity, by thoſe who have no wit; and robb'd of his knowledge, by thoſe who have no gratitude. Biſhop Nicholſon, who was too cenſorious, as we have ſeen, upon his laſt hiſtory, will alſo run the hazard of recrimination upon this. Our author begun his Worthies of England when he was Chaplain to the Lord Hopton, and it was his chief ſtudy, or moſtly under his conſideration by intervals, for near ſeventeen years, as it may be from this account computed; but the Biſhop ſays it was huddled up in haſte. Our author mentions, as we have quoted in this note, five reaſons for publiſhing this book; but as if he had nothing more than a mercenary motive therein, the Biſhop has ſunk four of them, and quoting but the laſt induced you to believe, it was only for the procurement of ſome moderate profit to the author: and yet not quoted this honeſtly. The Biſhop ſays, it corrects many miſtakes in his Church Hiſtory; but our author was acquainted with few miſtakes, till a little time before he died, and then had little leiſure or room to correct many, when the greateſt part of his Worthies was printed off. The Biſhop ſays, that Fuller's chief author is Bale, for the lives of his eminent writers; and he muſt have been his alſo, if he had wrote in Fuller's time, of the writers Bale has given account of, when Leland was not publiſhed; unleſs he would rather have followed Bale's Popiſh Plagiary; but a great part of the writers in Fuller, lived and wrote ſince Bale, therefore he had many other authorities for his writers, as may be ſufficiently ſeen in his work. And whether our author has given more miſhapen ſcraps, or lies, as they are called (114), of his Heroes, than the Biſhop of his Hiſtorians, thoſe may beſt judge who have read the one and the other; but if the Biſhop would have undertaken to reform or rectify both, it might have been more acceptable, as well as more diſcreet, than to revile an author ſo extravagantly, as to vilify himſelf. In ſhort, notwithſtanding theſe haſty and immoderate aſperſions, the characters or memorials here aſſembled, of ſo many great men, will always make the book neceſſary to be conſulted; eſpecially, as there are preſerved therein, abundance of lives, ly occaſional, or offered from time to time, as ſo many little whets, or ſtays, to the keen appetites of his curious readers; while his larger, and more ſplendid entertainments for them, were getting ready. And thoſe ſhorter refreſhments were ſo numerous, that, collected together, they only, without his more plentiful proviſions, would appear a conſiderable lives, then firſt or newly written, and no where elſe to be had; which have been of good ſervice to many grave writers of ſubſtantial credit, even in Hiſtory, Antiquities, and Heraldry; who, wanting neither the judgment nor juſtice in themſelves, which they might covet in their own readers, knew how to make proper uſes of his work, and acknowledgments for what they drew from it, without turning executioners upon every trivial overſight, or expreſſing any grievance at his humour, or his wit. But ſince his character has been ſo much degraded by ſome, it will be but equitable, to ſhew that it has been no leſs exalted by others; and as he has beſtowed a grateful remembrance upon many Poets, we have met with a retribution that has been attempted by one; in a Panegyric upon Biography in general, and this Biographer in particular. It was freely communicated from the author's original, in the poſſeſſion of a late Nobleman, who was a ſignal Patron to ſome of the greateſt Poets, and other ingenious men in his time: and ſince it has never been publiſhed; ſince it is entirely ſuitable in this, as it may be partly ſerviceable in any other Collection of illuſtrious men; or may in ſome part be no leſs applicable to any other Compiler, than to every Peruſer of ſuch collections, we ſhall here preſent it as follows, faithfully in its own language, without any apology for its length.

of
Written in FULLER's WORTHIES.

HERE, from FAME's Wardrobe, you may dreſs to pleaſe,
In Suits adorn'd, and ſhap'd to all degrees:
Each genius hence, may graceful Habits take;
No mind ſo warp'd, ſome mould won't ſtraighter make.
Patterns that beſt become you, ſtill prefer,
Without ſome wearing, they to ruin wear;
Some patterns yet, like tarniſh'd lace, are worn,
And now diſguiſe, what once they did adorn:
Then be not, ſervilely a ſlave to thoſe;
Reform their Faſhions, but refrain their Cloaths.
BY the beſt chemic ſkill, their gifts combin'd,
May ſo concocted be, and ſo refin'd;
May, through your works, ſo undiſtinguiſh'd wreathe,
As Incenſe rich, from Holy Altars breathe;
Till, ſo the blended Aromatics riſe,
In grateful gales, to greet the deities,
That we perceive no Franckincenſe exhale,
No Caſſia here, or Storax there prevail;
Nor this, can Myrrh, that, Ambergriſe can call;
But one ſtrong, curling odour, ſpires from all:
So when, ſuch Sweets, you from theſe Flow'rs have hiv'd,
From each they differ, as from all deriv'd.
CHUSE then with prudence, in your choice proceed,
Till thoſe you follow, you're improv'd to lead.
The object equal to the human mind,
And moſt inſtructive, muſt be human-kind.
Read manly books then, books of men, and ſo,
That you proceed to do the beſt you know.
Peruſe ſuch lives, or parts, as you can live;
It is the practice muſt perfection give.
Souls, in which ſamples great, no ſemblance breed,
Like cold and hungry Soils, but rot the ſeed:
Or like weak ſtomachs, with ſtrong food oppreſs'd,
By that ne'er nouriſh'd, which they ne'er digeſt.
For, as your meals ſhould ſuit, to thrive aright,
Your conſtitution, and your appetite;
So your examples ſhou'd proportion'd be,
Both to your power, and your capacity.
SOME ſeek their minds with marvels to repleat,
And taſte no objects they ſhou'd emulate:
Of things incredible, experience ſaith,
The feebleſt judgments have the firmeſt faith:
Such, in admiring, ſtill thoſe hours deſtroy,
They in excelling, only ſhould employ.
SOME think, diſtemper'd times leſs heal'd may be,
By wiſe mens woes, than fools felicity:
Think not, that fortitude grows more unſound,
By vice's balſam, than by virtue's wound:
That without deeds, words hold no laſting height,
Unbodied feathers wanting nerves for flight:
While airy ſounds ſoon loſe their empty name,
Surviving record is ſubſtantial fame.
To boundleſs forms, ſome, crude collections breed,
And write a life, wou'd waſte a life to read!
With griping hands, ſome ſhrink up life's ſhort ſpan,
And to a mite, epitomize a man!
Others add ſtreams, to rivers ſwoln too high,
While drowned paſtures unrecover'd lie;
Prop thoſe, who boaſt ſuperfluous aids to ſtand,
While crowds deſerted, moſt their aid demand!
The aim's more lofty, th' art, in more eſteem,
To ſave the ſinking, than ſink thoſe who ſwim.
Thus, upon others lives, their own are loſt,
Or leaſt devoted, where deſerved moſt.
But worſe, deſert in others, there is known,
Where none from others, or themſelves, is ſhown;
Whoſe mem'ry of the GOOD, the LEARN'D, the BRAVE,
Shou'd be their monument, and is their grave.
BUT victories o'er Death, muſt be renown'd;
Triumphs like thoſe, muſt thro' fame's clarion ſound:
His victors ſhou'd her richeſt trophies wear,
To fame who reſcue, what the fates won't ſpare.
Garlands ſhall crown their works, that cannot fade;
The lights they lend, with luſtre be repaid.
Who nobleſt do, moſt nobly muſt deſerve;
Great, who perform, but greater who preſerve:
If virtue moſt directs, which moſt dilates,
The draught excels, that moſt communicates;
Such copy ſpread, thus durably to all,
Begets more virtue, than th' original:
'Tis an original; its own outvy'd;
Where life leſs copied is, than multiply'd;
And they are deathleſs made, who long ſince dy'd.
Thus, when a Heroe is compar'd to you,
Th' Hiſtorian is the Heroe of the two;
The BRAVE, LEARN'D, GOOD, more efficacious grown,
In your immortal lives, than in their own.
YOUR merit is, who labour'd hath ſo much,
Such to revive, to be reviv'd as ſuch:
Our ſhame is, in your WORTHIES to be read,
Till one at leaſt, each to their number add:
Till we, your Worthies reading, ſuch ſhall turn,
As ſacred Reliques ſanctify the Urn:
Till they, thro' you, dart influential worth,
As Stars, tho' fixt in Heav'n, ſhine down on Earth.
PHOEBUS, the fire of your reſplendent wit,
Who blinds all brightneſs, muſt to your's ſubmit:
HE, only in th' Horizon, gilds our day,
YOU here, tho' ſet, your glory ſtill diſplay.

ſiderable feaſt. Of theſe leſſer tracts, now difficult to recover, we ſhall here only preſerve the titles [R]; and proceed to obſerve, that, having been at Saliſbury to ſettle his revenue, as Prebend of that Deanery, in his return about the tenth of Auguſt 1661, he brought home an aguiſh diſorder, which turned to a malignant fever, whereof Dr Matthew Nicholas, Dean of St Paul's, after his return about the ſame time from the ſame place, died but two days before him (d). On Sunday the twelfth of that month he was taken with a dizzineſs in his head; upon which his eldeſt ſon, John, adviſed him to lie down, urging how dangerous ſuch ſymptoms were; but he would go to Church, becauſe he had promiſed a relation to preach his wedding ſermon, declaring that he had often gone up into the pulpit ſick, but always came down well (e); and ſaid to his audience, I will preach this ſermon, though it be my laſt. In the middle of it he faultered, and after it, was ſo weak that he was led down the pulpit-ſtairs, carried in a ſedan to his lodgings in Covent-Garden, and put to bed. When Dr Walter Charlton, the Phyſician, came, he ſoon found him in a raging fever; which diſtemper he long before conſidered, and often diſcribed in his writings; but always ſuſpiciouſly, if not prophetically, as what might be moſt fatal to, or was moſt feared by, him (f), and which was then ſo rife, and unuſually violent, that it was called the new diſeaſe. Though he loſt twenty ounces of blood, the paroxyſms continued, and ſet the Phyſician's ſkill at defiance. It ſeized upon his intellects; but, in all his words, he would moſt frequently call out for, the pen and ink, ——— and, he would write it out. ——— On Wedneſday the diſeaſe, like a flame which has nearly burnt up the ſpirits that fed it, abated, as his ſtrength decayed. At laſt, his enfeebled ſenſes were a while reſtored, but wholly alienated from all worldly thoughts; and the next morning, being the ſixteenth of that month, the light of his life went gently out, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. A while after his death, an effuſion of blood burſt forth at his temples, which was thought to have been ſettled there by his ſedate and intenſe application to his ſtudies. The ſolemnity of his funeral was performed by the direction, and at the expence, of his noble friend the Lord Berkeley; and he was moſt reverendly attended, by at leaſt two hundred of the Clergy, to his grave; where his corps was depoſited, in the chancel of Cranford church (g). Dr Thomas Hardy, the Dean of Rocheſter, preached his funeral ſermon, in which he pathetically deplored ſo great a loſs; to which learned diſcourſe, we are further referred for his juſt commendation, when it had paſſed the preſs, as was then ſoon expected and deſired; but we cannot find that it was ever printed. His Biographer, whom we have here been ſo much obliged to follow, has alſo given a copious character of him (*), an extract from which, of the moſt obſervable particulars, is hereunder added [S], as in this work

[R] We ſhall here only preſerve the titles.] Theſe detached pieces, hitherto in this article unſpoken of, are ſo many, that he might paſs for a very induſtrious author, if he had never publiſhed the much larger quantity of his works which we have before mentioned; as may be ſeen by the following titles of them.

I. Joſeph's party-coloured coat, and Sermons on the Corinths; which we take to be the ſame with A Coment on part of the eleventh chapter of the firſt Epiſtle of the Corinths; with other Tracts, by T. Fuller, B. D. and Prebendary of Sarum, 4to. 1640. The ſecond edition enlarged, Cambridge 1648. II. Sermon on the Revelations, ii. 5. 4to. 1646. III. The Times anatomized, by T. F. 12mo. 1647. From thoſe initial letters, we conceive, it has been ranged, with other books that were written by our author, under his name, in ſome catalogues: but as the writer of his life has left it out of his liſt, and A. Wood ſays, there was a little thing printed in 12mo. under the name of Thomas Forde, perhaps the ſame with him of that name beforementioned, entituled, The Anatomy of the Times, tho' Wood had never ſeen it (†), we think it moſt likely that the ſaid Forde was the author. IV. Sermon on the 2d of Peter, i. 10. 4to. 1647. V. The Cauſe and Cure of a wounded Conſcience. 8vo. 1647, 1649. VI. Sermons on Matthew, upon Temptations (or his Comment on the 11 firſt verſes of the 4th chapter of St Matthew) 8vo. 1652. VII. The Infants Advocate; of Circumciſion and Baptiſm, on Jewiſh Chriſtian Children. 8vo. 1653. VIII. The Tripple Reconciler: ſtating the controverſies, whether, 1. Miniſters have a power of excluding Communicants. 2. Whether unordained perſons may preach. 3. Whether the Lord's Prayer ought not to be uſed by Chriſtians. 8vo. 1654. IX. A Faſt Sermon preached on Innocents Day, 4to.— X. Sermon of Life and Death, 8vo.—— XI. A Comment on Ruth, with two Sermons, 8vo. 1654. XII. Three Sermons, London, 8vo. 1655. XIII. Four Sermons, and notes upon Jonah. 8vo. 1656. XIV. The leſt name on earth, with other Sermons; and a copper print, in a 4to ſize, doubled in before it, of Thomas Fuller, B. D. and Hiſtorian; having paper, pen and ink beſide him, 8vo. 1657. XV. The ſpeech of birds, alſo of flowers, partly moral, partly myſtical. 8vo. 1660. XVI. A Latin Tract on the Church in a MS. left imperfect; mentioned in the catalogue at the end of his life. XVII. The Library of Britiſh Hiſtorians MS —— This is referred to by our author himſelf, in the beginning of his Church Hiſtory (115): But as it was never printed, we take it to be a work only then intended ſeparate, and that he afterwards incorporated thoſe Hiſtorians among his Worthies. XVIII. T. Fuller's Triana: or Threefold Romanza, of Mariana, Paduana, and Sabina: 12mo. 1662. This, if written by our author, is a poſthumous publication, which we have ſeveral times met with aſcribed to him in ſome catalogues, but never ſaw the book (‖). XIX. Several Letters to his Friends at Cambridge, and other places; which, as he had ſo many patrons, and ſo many occaſions of intelligence, from his correſpondents in relation to their own knowledge, or the particulars in many books concerning the eminent and learned perſons, he ſo much enquired after, muſt have been ſo numerous, that a good volume might doubtleſs have been collected out of them, eſpecially if the anſwers he received, had been added thereunto.

[S] An extract from his character is hereunto added.] This we muſt chiefly gather from the author of his life; who beginning with his perſon, informs us what a convenient habitation, learning and virtue had choſen (116); in which nothing could be complained of but that they were tenants for ſo ſhort a term. He was of a ſtature rather tall, or exceeding the middle ſize, and of a becoming bigneſs, not inclined to corpulency; exactly ſtrait, and proportionable, of a florid or ſanguine complexion; his hair ſhort, light coloured, and naturally curling; in his gait ſomewhat ſtately or majeſtical; in his garb the leſs careful externally, as he was ſo curious in that of his mind. As he had ſuch an honourable and numerous acquaintance, he was no ways undiſciplined in the arts and forms of courtly it may be expected. Mr James Heath, who wrote a Chronicle of the Civil Wars, alſo publiſhed an Elegy upon Dr Thomas Fuller, that moſt incomparable Writer, &c. and it was printed on a ſheet, in broad-ſide, the ſame year he died (b). But here to conclude; as our author beſtowed ſo much time and pains in illuſtrating ſo many lives and characters of others; thus much, at leaſt, we hope cannot be here thought redundant, by candid and grateful readers, in commemoration of himſelf.

courtly civility, but they were circumſcribed by his ſincerity, to an eaſy and ſuccinct compaſs. He was a walking library, but ſometimes required turning over to attain the contents; and when he was unbent from his ſtudies, no man could better promote civilized and well tempered mirth. In diet, he was very temperate, eſpecially as to liquor, which greatly contributed to his little need of ſleep, and his great ſhare of health, till his firſt ſickneſs, and his laſt. All his recreation was intellectual; even riding he little indulged, but on his neceſſary occaſions. He was a kind huſband to both his wives, a tender parent to both his children, ſparing no coſt in the education of them, and ſerviceable to his neighbours; who found it the greateſt prudence to rely on his advice. He never indulged his correction or ſeverity ſo much, as on the offspring of his brain; and tho' he might not entirely clear all the cockle from his corn, any more than his adverſaries from theirs, yet they have plough'd with his heifers, and been beholden to the direction of his authorities for many exceptions they made againſt him. He had a memory ſo vaſtly comprehenſive (117), that he is deſervedly known for the firſt inventor of that noble art (*), whereof he left no rules behind him, but many extraordinary proofs; as, after a walk from Temple-Bar to the furtheſt conduit in Cheapſide, his repeating all the ſigns on both ſides of the way, orderly without miſſing or miſplacing one; and ſo he would do by the words of different languages to any number; to the great aſtoniſhment of his hearers. Yet he would ſay, as we are told by David Lloyd, that the art of memory was apt to corrupt the nature of it. Which may be, as others have explained, that ſome men, thro' an infatiable monopoly of knowledge, ſo much truſt to the numerous notifications of what they would not forget, till they loſe all recollection of what they preſerved, and cannot remember what is become of their memorandums. But what was moſt ſtrange and rare, was his way of writing; ſomewhat like that of the Chineſe, from the top to the bottom of the page. He would write next the margin, the firſt words that ſhould make every line, down to the foot of the paper; then beginning at the head again, would ſo perfectly fill up every one of the lines, as, without ſpaces, interlineations or contractions, would ſo connect the ends and beginnings, that the ſenſe would appear as complete, and as much to his mind, he would ſay, as if he had writ it after the ordinary manner, in a continued ſeries (118); which ſeems to denote a great command of the language, and is ſomewhat like the practice that has been among ſome Poets, eſpecially in France, who would ſet one another taſks of difficult rhymes, as incoherent as they could in ſenſe, to be filled up with words, that would make them complete verſes. Our author, ſpeaking of a leidger-book collected by Robert Fuller, the laſt Abbot of Waltham, gives a character of him as a happy penman, for his fair and faſt writing therein; and adds, that others of his ſurname were no leſs defective in thoſe qualities (119). The treaſury of this happy memory, with his great reading, ready faculties of invention, diſtinction, application, and graceful elocution, completed him for the pulpit: and even upon very obſcure texts of Scripture, of which ſome noble friends would deſire his explanation, he would, only upon two hours warning, acquit himſelf with great applauſe. 'Twas ſufficiently known how well grounded he was in the Proteſtant Religion, againſt the innovations of the Preſbytery, and the ſchiſm of Independency; but his zeal againſt theſe, was allay'd with greater compaſſion, than towards the Papiſts; diſtinguiſhing between the ſeducers and the ſeduced. He avoided polemical controverſies with one and the other, as endleſs or needleſs; and looked upon the new invented arguments againſt Epiſcopacy, but as inſects of a day. While the Clergy were widening the diviſions by their warm debates, he both preached and practiſed moderation; growing, in the promotion thereof, more diligent, as the dawning Reſtoration grew more viſible; when he moſt plainly ſaw, how neceſſary the condeſcenſion of all parties would be, to remove all cauſe or remembrance of their former contentions, and combine in the eſtabliſhment of a general concord (†). As he choſe not to ſtruggle thro' or make his way foremoſt in the crowd at Court; had he lived till the tide of ſolicitations was abated, 'tis not doubted but his advancement in the Church would have been no leſs eminent than his merits; eſpecially ſince he had ſo many noble and honourable friends; who, thro' their affection to his virtuous and agreeable qualities, would have been as liberal of their intereſt in the preferment of his perſon, as they had been of their contributions, in the publication of his works.

G.

GALE (THEOPHILUS), a very pious Divine, as well as a very learned and elegant writer, among the Nonconformiſts, in the XVIIth century (a). He was deſcended from a very good family in the Weſt of England; and his father was Dr Theophilus Gale, Prebendary of Exeter, and Vicar of King's-Teignton in Devonſhire (b), where this ſon of his was born ſome time in 1628 (c). He received the rudiments of polite learning in his father's vicaridge-houſe, which having cultivated in a neighbouring grammar-ſchool, he was, when about nineteen, ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, where he became a Commoner of Magdalen college ſome time in 1647, that is, after the ſurrender of that place, as one of the King's garriſons, to the forces of the Parliament (d). He was much diſtinguiſhed, ſoon after his coming thither, by Dr John Wilkinſon, who was then Preſident. In 1648, he was appointed a Demy of that college, by the Parliament Viſitors (e). In 1649, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, December the ſeventeenth, and had this character from the Commiſſioners (f) before mentioned, that he was Vir provectioris ætatis, & uberioris Spei Juvenis, ſomewhat advanced in age (as to the uſual time of taking that degree), and a youth of pregnant hopes. In 1650, he was choſen Fellow of his College, when many of his ſeniors were ſet by (g). He was no leſs countenanced by Dr Goodwin, than by the former Preſident (h); and having, June the eighteenth 1652, compleated his degree of Maſter of Arts, he became an eminent Tutor, and a diſtinguiſhed Preacher (i). Among other pupils under his care at that time, was Mr Ezechiel Hopkins, afterwards Lord Biſhop of Rhaphoe in the kingdom of Ireland, and one of the moſt pathetick preachers of that age; who was but five years younger than Mr Gale his tutor (k). In 1657, he went to Winchеſter, and became there a ſtated preacher, where, as well for his exemplary life and converſation, as for his excellent ſermons, he was generally eſteemed and admired (l). Upon the Reſtoration of King Charles the Second, not being able to conform to the terms preſcribed by-law, he was excluded from the publick exerciſe of his function, and loſt likewiſe his Fellowſhip (m). In this ſituation of his affairs, he was taken into the family of Philip Lord Wharton, who put his two ſons, Thomas, afterwards the famous Marquis of Wharton, father of the late Duke, and Godwin, under his care; with whom he travelled in the month of September 1662, and reſided with them for ſome time at Caen in Normandy, then a celebrated ſeminary for learning, under the direction of ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Profeſſors of the Reformed Religion in France (n). This excurſion into foreign parts was of very great ſervice to Mr Gale, as well in the enlarging his mind and affording him an opportunity of acquiring the French language, as in procuring him the acquaintance of the famous Mr Bochart, and other great men who then reſided there; and, by a communication of ſtudies, improving thoſe extraordinary talents nature had beſtowed (o). In 1665, he returned with his pupils into England; and being now releaſed from that employment, he became an aſſiſtant to Mr John Rowe, his countryman (p), who had then a private congregation in Holborn. Some time after this, his papers, which were his greateſt treaſure, and which, at his going over to France, he confided to the care of a friend in London, narrowly, but luckily, eſcaped (q) that dreadful fire which will be ever remembered, for the devaſtation it made in this metropolis [A]. As Mr Gale had now ſome leiſure, he reſolved to proſecute a great

[A] For the devaſtation it made in this metropolis.] It is to be regretted, that we have not a more diſtinct account of this accident. Upon Mr Gale's coming from France, he carried his pupils to the Seat of the Lord Wharton their father, and in his return from thence to London in the beginning of September 1666, he was ſtruck with the dreadful ſight of the city in flames (1). His concern for his friend, as well as the effects which he had depoſited with him, naturally prompted him to enquire of almoſt all he met, whether ſuch a ſtreet, naming the place where his friend lived, was in danger; to which they very uniformly anſwered, that great work, which he had for many years in his mind; for compleating of which he had made vaſt collections, and on the principal points of which he had conſulted the moſt learned amongſt his friends. The care he had of his reputation, as well as the vaſt extent of his plan, and the great pains it required to digeſt his large ſtock of materials into a clear and conciſe method, took up a great deal of time, and obliged him to add ſeveral things to his original draught (r), that it might the more effectually anſwer the important ends himſelf propoſed, and the high expectations of thoſe he had occaſionally conſulted about it [B]. At length, when it was entirely finiſhed, he grew apprehenſive that the bulk of it that it was wholly burnt to the ground. This was very bitter news at the firſt hearing, and he could not help regretting the loſs of ſo many years reading, and the large collections which had coſt him ſo much time and pains, and which he had little ſpirit left to think of going through a ſecond time. By degrees, however, he quieted his thoughts, and as his learning, his paſſions, and his deſires, were always ſubſervient to his religion, he did not diſquiet himſelf in vain, but ſubmitted patiently to an evil, which he thought paſt remedy. It was not long before he met with his friend, and having received from him a detail of this dreadful calamity, with this alleviating circumſtance, however, that by timely and vigorous precautions he had happily ſaved a good part of his effects, Mr Gale could not help interjecting this ſhort queſtion, and what is become of my deſk? 'Why truly, replied his 'friend, that is ſaved too, and by a very ſingular acci-'dent. It ſtood in my compting houſe, the contents 'of which being thrown into a cart, I thought there 'was ſtill ſomething wanting to make up a load, and 'in that inſtant caſting my eyes upon your deſk, in it 'went among the reſt, and you may have it returned 'when you pleaſe.' This, as it may be imagined, filled the mind of Mr Gale with joy, and as it was a very acceptable thing to him, ſo it was no inconſiderable benefit to the learned world, for if that deſk had periſhed, the Court of the Gentiles had never appeared.

[B] He had occaſionally conſulted about it.] It was about the time he began his ſtudies at Oxford, that our author obſerving what Grotius had remarked in his excellent book of the truth of the Chriſtian Religion, began to be perſuaded that it might be made appear, 'the wiſeſt and moſt eſteemed of the Pagan 'Philoſophers, borrowed the moſt rational of their 'ſentiments, and were indebted for their moſt ſublime 'contemplations, as well natural and moral, as divine, 'from the Scriptures; ſo that how different ſoever 'they might be in their appearance, not only their 'Theology, but their Philoſophy, and Philology were 'derived from the ſacred oracles.' The more he conſidered and reflected upon this propoſition, it ſeemed to him of ſo much the more importance, and his conviction was the ſtronger when he manifeſtly perceived that the moſt able and judicious critics in all ages had expreſſed their approbation of this opinion. As for inſtance, Joſephus in his book againſt Appion; Origen in his defence of Chriſtianity againſt Celſus; that learned Chriſtian Father, Clement of Alexandria, in the firſt book of his Miſcellanies; Euſebius, in his Evangelical Preparation; Tertullian, in many of his writings; Auguſtin, in his book of the city of God; John the Grammarian, in his treatiſe of the creation of the world. Steuchus Eugubinus, Ludovicus Vives, with other learned Papiſts of the former age; as alſo Julius and Joſeph Scaliger, Serranus, Voſſius, Sandford, Heinſius, Bochart, Selden, Jackſon, Hammond, Uſher, Preſton, Owen, Stillingfleet, with others among the Proteſtants. He thought that ſo many great men could not be deceived, and he was fully ſatisfied, that if, upon a cloſe and ſtrict examination, this propoſition could be made out to the ſatisfaction of reaſonable and learned men, it would be attended with many very high advantages to the Chriſtian Religion. Upon this principle he undertook ſo arduous and ſo painful a work, which however he went through chearfully for the courſe of twelve or fourteen years, being continually ſtimulated from the hopes he entertained of its good effects, which were chiefly theſe. Firſt, he thought that this would greatly confirm the authority and demonſtrate the perfection of the ſacred Scriptures, in which he was not led by his own ſentiment only, but by the example of ſeveral modern Divines, and particularly of the moſt learned Stillingfleet. His ſecond motive muſt be expreſſed in his own words (2), becauſe they ſhew the reaſon upon which the title of his book is founded. 'Another great end I have in this diſ-'courſe, is to demonſtrate what great marks of divine 'favour and rich tokens of his Grace, Chriſt the Me-'diator has been pleaſed to vouchſafe to his poor af-'flicted Church. And indeed is it not a great mark 'of honour that his poor infant Church, ſo much de-'ſpiſed and perſecuted by the Gentile world, ſhould 'be not only the ſeat of his own preſence and wor-'ſhip, but alſo as the moon to reflect ſome broken 'rays, or imperfect traditions of that glorious light 'ſhe received from the ſun of righteouſneſs to the 'Pagan world, which lay wrapt up in midnight darkneſs? 'What, that the proud Sophiſts of Greece, eſteemed 'the eye of the world for human wiſdom, ſhould be 'fain to come and light their candles at this ſacred 'fire, which was lodged in the Jewiſh Church! That 'the poor Temple of Jeruſalem ſhould have a COURT 'for the GENTILES, to which they muſt be all be-'holding for their choiceſt wiſdom, how great an ho-'nour is this for Mount Zion the Church of God!' His third motive was to exterminate a falſe notion, that the rational divinity, and found morality ſcattered through the writings of Pagan Philoſophers, were deductions made by the pure light of nature; whereas in truth, they are at beſt but broken traditions derived from the ſacred Scriptures, and the Doctrines of the Jewiſh Church. The fourth great view that he had, was to diſabuſe the minds of many young ſtudents prepoſſeſſed with groſs, yea in ſome degree blaſphemous, ideas and notions touching God, his names, attributes, nature, operations, &c. ſuckt in together with thoſe poiſonous infuſions they derived from ethnic Poets and Mythologiſts. The ſad experience hereof made many of the primitive Chriſtians, as well learned as others, greatly decry and declame againſt the reading of Pagan books, ſpecially Poets (3). 'Yea, Plato him-'ſelf, ſays he, in his diſcourſe of Mimetic Poeſie, is 'very invective againſt it, demonſtrating how the 'minds of young ſtudents, by reading ſuch romantic 'or fabulous ſtories of the gods, and things divine, 'are firſt abuſed with falſe images, and then adulte-'rated and corrupted with falſe principles which draw 'on corrupt practices. Wherefore, in the idea of his 'commonwealth, he gives order that ſuch mimetic 'or fable-coining Poets be baniſhed, tho' with reſpect, 'from his commonwealth. For the preventing or 'removing of ſuch corruptions, I have endeavoured 'to decipher or unriddle the whole Pagan Θεογονία, 'or the genealogie of the Pagan Gods; as alſo 'other parts of hiſtory, Mythology touching the firſt 'chaos, the golden age, the ſeveral floods under 'Deucalion, &c. the Giants war, with other pieces of 'Mythology, and Pagan Theology, ſo common among 'the antient Poets and Hiſtoriographers. Hereby we 'ſhall come to underſtand the original ideas of thoſe 'monſtrous fables, as alſo diſabuſe our minds from 'thoſe falſe images of things divine and human, which 'are ſo pleaſing to corrupt nature, and too often 'prove a foundation of atheiſm. If thou ſhalt, reader, 'continues our author, farther inquire into the mo-'tives and reaſons which have induced me to ſuffer 'this diſcourſe to come under public view, then be 'pleaſed to take notice, that I am not ſo much mine 'own flatterer, as not to be ſenſible of many imperfec-'tions, both as to matter and form, which may ren-'der it unfit for any curious eye or palate. Indeed, 'I have neither time nor capacity, no, nor yet a will, 'to poliſh and flouriſh it, ſo as to render it acceptable 'to every curious critic. I have always affected, with 'that great maſter of wiſdom, Padre Paulo, the Vene-'tian, it might prejudice it with ſome; that many might eſteem ſome portions, tho' they might diſapprove others; and that it would be prudent to ſee how it might be reliſhed, before the whole was committed to the preſs; which determined him to publiſh it in parts. After this wiſe reſolution, the preſs being then ſubject to reſtraint, he applied himſelf, as a member of the Univerſity, to Dr John Fell, then Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, for his licence, who, as he was a zealous friend to the Church of England, was alſo a true patron and encourager of learning, and therefore granted, with much readineſs, that mark of his approbation of the work (s). Thus all obſtacles being now removed, the firſt part of THE COURT OF THE GENTILES appeared, and was received with great applauſe (t). In proceſs of time, encouraged by this candour and kind treatment, the author adventured to publiſh likewiſe the three following parts, of that truly learned work [C]. The love of privacy, the deſire he had to purſue his ſtudies, and the conveniency of inſtructing a few young perſons under his own roof, of which none was more capable, induced him to make choice of Newington for his retreat (u), where he was often viſited by perſons of diſtinction, and ſome not of his own communion, who were deſirous, by their reſpect for him, to teſtify their eſteem for unaffected piety and extenſive learning. Upon the demiſe of Mr Thomas Tregoſſe, a zealous Nonconformiſt miniſter, but a very loyal, peaceable, and worthy perſon, it was reſolved to put ſome little remains of his to the

'tian, to ſuit my form to my matter, as nature does, 'and not my matter to my form, as the ſchools are 'wont to do. This with other moving conſiderations, 'detained me ſome while from publiſhing this diſ'courſe, which was, in the firſt draught thereof, in'tended for the private inſtruction of ſome perſons of 'noble condition committed to my tuition: But that 'which prevailed upon me to let it paſs a more com'mon view and cenſure, beſides my general ends above 'ſpecified, is the perſuaſion of ſeveral judicious, learn'ed, and pious friends, who conceive it may be ſome 'way uſeful at leaſt, for the inſtructing of young ſtu'dents, which is a main conſideration I had in mine 'eye, when I firſt undertook the compoſition there'of.'

[C] Of that truly learned work.] In this note we ſhall give the reader an account of the different times in which the ſeveral parts of this very learned performance came abroad. The Title of which was,

Part the firſt, Of Philology, was printed Oxon. 1669, and there again, 1672, in 4to. The ſecond part, which is of Philoſophy, was printed Oxon. 1671, and at London, 1676, in 4to. Of theſe two parts, there is a laudable account in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (4). The third part, of the vanity of Pagan Philoſophy, was printed Lond. 1677; and the fourth part, of Reformed Philoſophy, was printed there the ſame year, both in 4to. Theſe four parts, ſays Wood, ſhew the author to have been well read in, and converſant with, the writings of the Fathers, the old Philoſophers, and thoſe that have given any account of them or their works. As alſo to have been a good Metaphyſician and School Divine. But to give the reader a clearer idea of this large and learned work, it may not be amiſs to ſpeak particularly of the aim and intention of each of theſe parts.

(4) Vol. VI. No. lxxiv. p. 2231.

In the firſt he endeavours to prove, that all languages have their origin and riſe from the Hebrew, inſtancing particularly in the Oriental tongues, as the Phœnician, Copthic, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Perſian, Samaritan, and Ethiopic; and then in the European, eſpecially the Greek, Latin, the old Gallic, and Britannic. To which he adds a deduction, importing, that the Pagan Theology, Phyſic, Politics, Poeſie, Hiſtory, Rhetoric, are traduced from ſacred names, perſons, rites, and records, and ſhewing withal, how the Jewiſh traditions came to be corrupted and miſtaken by Pagans.

In the ſecond part, he maketh it his buſineſs to evince, that Philoſophy alſo hath it's original from the Jewiſh Church; beginning to ſhew this of the Barbaric Philoſophy, under which he comprehends the Egyptian, Phœnician, Chaldean, Perſian, Indian, Ethiopic, Scythian, and Britannic; and thence, proceeding to the Grecian, and chiefly to the Ionic and Italic, or Pythagorean, where he ſhews great reading and learning, whilſt he deduceth this doctrine of Judaic origin, from the teſtimonies of Heathen, Jewiſh, and Chriſtian, both ancient and modern, authors, paſſing through all the particular ſects of Philoſophers, with great ſollicitation and induſtry; and promiſing at the end of this work, that he is willing to undertake another treatiſe, to ſhew both the miſchief of vain, and the uſefulneſs of ſound, Philoſophy, to Chriſtian religion.

In the third, the vanity of Pagan Philoſophy is demonſtrated from it's cauſes, parts, proprieties, and effects; namely, Pagan idolatry, Judaic apoſtacy, Gnoſtic infuſions, errors among the Greek Fathers, ſpecially Origen, Arianiſme, Pelagianiſme, and the whole ſyſtem of Papiſme, or Antichriſtianiſme, diſtributed into three parts, Myſtic, Scholaſtic, and Canonic Theology.

In the fourth part he treats of Reformed Philoſophy, wherein Plato's moral and metaphyſic, or prime Philoſophy, is reduced to an uſeful form and method. He divides this, which is larger than any of the former parts, into three books, diſcourſing in the firſt, of Moral Philoſophy, in the ſecond, of Metaphyſics, and in the third, of Divine Predetermination. This laſt ſeems to have been a diſtinct piece, and to have been publiſhed after the fourth part of the Court of the Gentiles, to which it ſerves as an appendix, having a diſtinct preface and table of contents, which is not the method purſued through the reſt of the work. The judicious Morhoff (5) gives a very advantageous character of our author and his work, and acknowledges, that, with much patience and application, as well as with great parts and learning, he had run through the whole circle of Jewiſh, Chriſtian, and Hebrew learning; and with great diligence, and no leſs candour, had digeſted whatever was worth reading and conſideration, in an accurate and perſpicuous manner. We may plainly perceive in thoſe parts of Biſhop Huet's famous work, which relate to the ſame ſubject, that he was not unacquainted with Mr Gale's performance, or with another piece of his, of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Indeed, the author beforementioned aſſures us, that there was a Latin tranſlation of the Court of the Gentiles, before the ſecond edition of the original appeared in England, by which the reputation of the author was ſpread into all parts of Europe, but more eſpecially in Germany, where his labours met with great applauſe. Here at home the learned uſhered in both the editions of the firſt parts, according to the mode of that time, with Latin and Engliſh poems, of theſe the Engliſh pindaric before the firſt part, contains ſome fine ſtrophes. Before the ſecond part, there is a long Latin poem, ſubſcribed Thomas Gilbert, and a ſhorter by Owen Price, M. A. a long Pindaric poem, probably by the ſame perſon, who wrote that prefixed to the firſt part, and a ſhorter complement in heroics, both without any name ſubſcribed.

the preſs; and the better to preſerve his memory, it was wiſhed that ſome particulars of his life ſhould be prefixed (w). Our author undertook and performed it with ſpirit and eloquence, for it was a ſubject very well ſuited to his temper, and he was perfectly ſatisfied as to the veracity of the facts which he reported, and which were very much enlivened by the manner in which he ſet them forth; and yet he ſo carefully concealed his being the author, that we do not find it mentioned in any catalogue of his writings (x) [D]. In the diſcharge of his miniſtry, and the improvement of his faculties, he ſpent his years in ſolitude and quiet; and yet in a way highly uſeful to his contemporaries, and to poſterity (y). He compoſed, amongſt other uſeful and learned treatiſes, a compendious view of the antient Philoſophy in general (z), with an immediate regard to the ſervice of his pupils, but in ſuch a manner as that it might be very advantageous to the publick; and therefore, at the requeſt of ſeveral eminent and worthy perſons, he printed it in Latin, which is one reaſon perhaps why it is leſs known than ſo judicious a treatiſe deſerves [E]. We mention theſe works

[D] In any catalogue of his writings.] The title of this book, which is properly our author's, for the letters and other papers, are only annexed to it, bore this title.

The Life and Death of Thomas Tregoſſe, late Miniſter of the Goſpel, at Milar and Mabe in Cornwall, with his Character. Lond. 1671, 8vo.

This Mr Thomas Tregoſſe was of an ancient and worthy family, ſeated at St Ives in Cornwall, and educated in Exeter college at Oxford; he was a zealous nonconformiſt miniſter, and ſuffered for preaching privately very much. Amongſt his other misfortunes he was once ſent to the Marſhal of Bodmyn, to be kept in cuſtody as a dangerous and ſeditious perſon, of which King Charles II, being informed, and being alſo acquainted, that notwithſtanding what was ſet forth in his commitment, he was ſo far from meddling with ſtate affairs, that he did not ſo much as touch the controverſies between the Church and the Diſſenters, in any of his ſermons; but, on the contrary, exhorted his hearers to live peaceably, and to manifeſt their faith by their works; his Majeſty directed a ſpecial order to the Marſhal to ſet him at liberty. Yet this did not hinder his being fined and impriſoned afterwards; and much notice was taken of misfortunes that befel thoſe who were inſtrumental in his troubles; and it was currently reported, that he had prophecied the death of one of his great perſecutors. Mr Gale mentions this matter, but not in ſuch terms as will juſtify that report; for he tells us (6), 'that after Mr Tregoſſe had been committed by Mr Robinſon, to Lanceſton Jail for three Months, and had been four days returned home, Mr Robinſon, who was indefatigable, gave out, that he would ſpeedily ſend him back again to the place from whence he came. In order whereto, providing to ride to market, to procure another juſtice to join with him in a warrant, for a ſecond conviction of Mr Tregoſſe, for a conventicler, and to proſecute ſome other; whilſt he was at a tenement of his, his own bull, which was never known to hurt any before, followed him in a field with much fury, and gave him deadly wounds, whereof he ſhortly died.' This ſhews that Mr Gale was very cautious in his expreſſions; and tho' he might be of opinion himſelf, as indeed it is clear enough he was, that there was ſomewhat providential in this caſe, yet he would not take upon him to declare it a judgment, as many had before, and ſome very deliberately, have ſince done.

[E] Than ſo judicious a treatiſe deſerves.] The title of this book runs thus:

Philoſophia Generalis in duas partes diſterminata, una de Ortu & Progreſſu Philoſophiæ, &c. Altera, 1. De Minorum Gentium Philoſophiâ 2. De 9 Habitibus intellectualibus. 3. De Philoſophiæ Objecto. London 1676, 8vo. That is, A General View of the Riſe and Progreſs of Philoſophy; to which are added, ſome particular Treatiſes.

In this book, which is very learned, and where, in a very narrow compaſs, the ſentiments of the Ancients may be found, upon almoſt every ſubject of importance, the chief deſign of the author is the very ſame with that, in his Court of the Gentiles, only here he writes more conciſely, and fitter for the peruſal of ſuch, as were engaged in a regular courſe of ſtudy, to whoſe uſe it was eſpecially deſigned. What is ſaid in the text, of it's being leſs known from it's being written in Latin, relates to our own iſland only, where this piece of Mr Gale's is in a great meaſure neglected, while a great many books, that might be named, that have been picked out of it, are in great eſteem. It is quite otherwiſe abroad, where it is the beſt known of any of his works, much read, and highly commended. Morhoff particularly gives it a very good character, and repreſents it as highly uſeful in affording a conſiderate perſon the ſenſe of antiquity at a ſingle view, upon any point whatever. It muſt not however be diſſembled, that in one thing he paſſes a cenſure upon our author, but with great decency and moderation (7). He ſays, that when learned men have addicted themſelves to any particular hypotheſis, they bend every ſubject that way, from which failing he thinks our author not entirely free, in his endeavouring to deduce all the arts of Philoſophy and fabulous Divinity of the ancient Pagans, from the law and doctrine of the Jews. His poſition, generally ſpeaking, is, without doubt, true enough; for we may very eaſily perceive, that the friends of an hypotheſis, and much more the author of one, will bend things any way, rather than ſuffer the repugnancy of them to their own ſentiments from becoming apparent. In this caſe, however, it is to be conſidered, that ſome very learned men have been in a direct oppoſite way of thinking, and have laboured to prove, that the Pagan notions were ſo far from being borrowed from the Jewiſh Church, that there was a viſible conformity between the rites and ceremonies of the Moſaic Inſtitution, and the religious cuſtoms of certain idolatrous nations, and more eſpecially the Egyptians. Now we can hardly believe, that perſons ſo oppoſite in their judgments, ſhould agree in a falſhood; and if this be right reaſoning, then there muſt be certainly a ſtrong likeneſs between the facts in the Jewiſh Hiſtory, and the fables in the Heathen Mythology; and granting this, we cannot certainly be at a loſs to diſtinguiſh the original from the copy. There is in the Sacred Writings, a majeſtic ſimplicity that has been admired, even by the Heathens themſelves; there was a certain childiſhneſs in the Ethnick Theology, which the wiſer Pagans deſpiſed. We have no reaſon then to doubt of the foundation, or to ſuſpect that our learned author, and all who went before him in his opinion, were miſtaken, or that the French Prelate Huet, or our moſt learned Biſhop Cumberland, were miſled by their authorities; notwithſtanding which, we are at liberty to doubt, and we may preſume, that this is all that the judicious Morhoff means, whether in every particular theſe authors have been right in their conjectures; for it is one thing to lay down, and prove the truth of a general propoſition, and quite another, to make a long train of deductions with equal truth and certainty. The greateſt maſter in figures may miſtake in a particular calculation, but it would be very unfair to infer from thence, the falſity of the rule by which he wrought. Theſe reflections relate equally to this treatiſe of Philoſophy, and to the Court of the Gentiles, and are intended purely for the reader's ſatisfaction, and to do juſtice to the ſkill and diligence of our learned and worthy author; not to repreſent him as infallible, or incapable of making miſtakes, upon ſubjects ſo perplexed and embarraſſed as thoſe were, and ever will be, which he undertook to handle. His deſign in both books was good, and he purſued it with indefatigable labour, which is more than ſufficient to juſtify the little pains we have taken works of his particularly, becauſe in thoſe days they gained him univerſal eſteem; but his other performances deſerve alſo to be remembered, as breathing the ſame ſpirit of kindneſs and charity, tho' ſome of them written on leſs ſtriking ſubjects; and therefore the reader will find an exact catalogue of them in the notes (a), with ſome neceſſary remarks [F]. Upon the death of Mr John Rowe, to whom, as we have ſaid, he was for many years aſſiſtant, October the twelfth 1677, he, together with Mr Samuel Lee, was choſen Paſtor of his congregation (b). He continued, as long as his ſtrength would permit, to labour for the ſervice of the Church of CHRIST, and in promoting, as it's ſupport, ſound literature. A very ſhort ſpace before his death, he publiſhed propoſals for printing by ſubſcription a very large and uſeful work, which he had long under his hands, and which was very far advanced (c). This, with ſome pieces he left behind him, ſerved to prove how well he had ſpent his time, and how great a loſs the world had, in ſo learned, ſo ingenious, ſo communicative, ſo indefatigable, and, in all reſpects, ſo pious and worthy a perſon [G]. He breathed his laſt, either at the cloſe of the month of February, or in the beginning of the month of March 1678, when he was in his fiftieth year (d). He was decently interred in the burying-ground near Bunhill-Fields, and his death univerſally regretted (e). He was a man whoſe learning made him admired and eſteemed, by all who were judges of it; his piety was ſo evident and unaffected, his courſe of life ſo innocent and uniform, that his example went as far as his ſermons; he was ſtedfaſt in his opinions, and warm in the defence of them; but had charity for thoſe who differed from him, whom he would labour to convince, but not to compel; he was as much an enemy to ſedition as to perſecution; and the known averſion he had to the former, defended him from the latter, when many of his brethren were expoſed. In a word, he maintained to the laſt the character which he had early acquired, of having, in a very high degree, thoſe qualities that moſt adorn a Miniſter of CHRIST, which ſecured him the love and veneration of men ſincere and devout of all parties (f). His concern for learning and piety, reached beyond the times in which he lived; not in his writings only, but in the manner in which he diſpoſed of the temporal goods, which either came to him by deſcent, or were the product of his œconomy in managing his ſmall income. He beſtowed all his eſtate, real and perſonal, on young ſtudents of his own principles, and appointed truſtees to manage it for their ſupport (g). All his well choſen library he gave towards promoting uſeful learning in New England, where, at that time, ſuch a numerous collection was a publick benefit. Out of this, he excepted only ſuch books of Philoſophy as might be judged more proper for young ſtudents here; and thus having ſpent his whole life in doing good, he provided at his death that there might be a continuance of perſons of the ſame frame of mind, and of like qualifications with himſelf, or at leaſt he did towards ſuch a proviſion all that was in his power.

to ſet his character, and that of his writings, in their true light; and ſo far as in our power lies, to revive the credit of both, as is certainly our duty.

The treatiſes known to be his are theſe:

There is another book uſually put into the catalogues of his works, which bears this title.

Ars Sciendi; ſive Logica novo Methodo diſpoſita, & novis præceptis aucta, Lond. 1682, 8vo. This is John Clauberg's Logic, and Ars Cogitandi, called the Janſeniſts Logic, digeſted into one volume, with ſome alterations and enlargements; but we are aſſured by Dr Calamy (8), that this was unjuſtly aſcribed to Mr Theophilus Gale.

[G] So pious and worthy a perſon] The title of this work, of which he gave a large account in his printed propoſals for publiſhing it, ran thus:

Lexicon Græci Teſtamenti Etymologicum Synonymum ſive Gloſſarium & Homonymum.

This Lexicon of the Greek Teſtament was finiſhed as far as the letter Iota; and the moſt conſiderable words were alſo placed under the other letters. It would have made when printed, a large folio volume, and have been much more compleat in every reſpect, than any thing of the kind yet extant, the author intending that it ſhould ſerve for a Concordance as well as a Lexicon, and with that view, had taken great pains in ſettling the different ſenſes of the ſame word, ſhewing whence they aroſe, and how they might be with certainty diſtinguiſhed. It was a great loſs to the world, that he did not live to compleat it; and ſtill a greater, that we have not ſo much as the titles of the other manuſcripts which he left behind him. It is very remarkable, that in Anthony Wood's account of Mr Gale, there is not the leaſt abatement or reſtriction in his commendations; and it is no leſs remarkable, that the Reverend Mr Echard (9), joining his accounts of Dr Thomas Manton, and Mr Theophilus Gale, ſays, the latter ſeemed to have more learning and leſs faction than the former; he adds, that he ſhewed himſelf to be a man of vaſt reading and induſtry, an exact Philologiſt and Philoſopher, as his Court of the Gentiles, and other learned works, ſufficiently teſtify; and that in the midſt of his great deſigns, he was ſnatched away in the prime of his years. Theſe teſtimonies do as much honour to thoſe who gave, as to the memory of him to whom they are given.

GALE (THOMAS), a moſt excellent ſcholar in the laſt century, was born at Scruton in Yorkſhire, in the year 1635, or 1636 [A], and educated in Weſtminſter-ſchool. Thence he was elected a ſcholar of Trinity-college Cambridge, of which he became Fellow (a). He took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1658, that of Maſter in 1662; and accumulated the Degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity in 1675 (b). At the opening of the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, July 12, 1669, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts in that Univerſity (c). Among other branches of learning, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf moſt particularly by his curious, critical, and exact knowledge of the Greek tongue; of which he was Regius Profeſſor at Cambridge: And he publiſhed new and accurate editions of ſeveral ancient writers in that language; whereof an account is given below. In 1672, he was choſen Head-maſter of St Paul's-School in London, in the room of Mr Samuel Cromleholme; and had the Honour of being employed by that city, to write the elegant inſcriptions on the Monument, erected in memory of the dreadful conflagration in 1666; for which he was preſented with a piece of plate (d). June 7, 1676, he was collated to a Prebend in the Cathedral church of St Paul's (e). He was alſo a Fellow of the Royal Society, to which he gave a Roman urn with its aſhes. About the year 1697, he preſented the new Library at Trinity-college in Cambridge, with a great number of curious Arabic manuſcripts (f). This moſt learned and induſtrious perſon, tho' encumbered with the care of ſo large a ſchool, found means to publiſh new Editions of ſeveral ancient valuable Greek authors: Namely, A collection of the Mythologiſts, and other writers of moral and natural Philoſophy [B]: A collection of authors on the Poetical Hiſtory [C]: The ſelect Rhetors, or Orators [D]: Jamblichus of Myſteries [E]: An Edition of the Greek Pſalter, from the Alexandrine MS. [F]: and Herodotus [G]. He alſo reviſed Cicero's Works, printed in 1684 [H]; and publiſhed two volumes in folio of our antient Engliſh Hiſtorians [I]. After having continued about twenty-five years Head-Maſter of St Paul's-ſchool, school, he was, as a just reward for his merit and pains, promoted to the Deanery of York, into which he was admitted Sept. 16, 1697 (g). Here he kept an hospitable table, and was particularly remarkable for his care and good government, and the repairing and beautifying the fabric of the Cathedral (b); besides an especial service he did to his Deanery [K]. But, after having enjoyed that Dignity little more than four years and a half, this worthy person, to the universal loss of learning, died at York April 8, 1702, in the 68th year of his age (i). He was buried in the Cathedral there, with an Inscription on his Grave-stone, as below [L]. As to his Character; he was a learned Divine, a great Historian and Antiquary, and one of the best Grecians of his age. He was not only known and esteemed at home, but also by the most learned of his contemporaries abroad; and kept a particular correspondence with Father Mabillon, Monsieur Baluze, Peter Allix, James Cappel, Sebastian gliæ. Ab anno Domini. 1066. ad annum 1300. i. e. The Chronicle of Walter Hemingford, Canon of Giseburne [in Yorkshire] from the year 1066, to 1300. But the learned editor hath published it here only as far as the year 1273, reserving the rest for another volume of our English Historians, beginning at King Edward I. which he intended to oblige the world with, but never did. It was published entire by T. Hearne in 1731, in 2 vols. 8vo.

The second volume of our English Historians published by Dr Gale, was intituled, Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ, Scriptores XV. Ex vetustis Codd. MSS. editi opera Thomæ Gale Th. Pr. Oxon. 1691. fol. This volume comprehends. I. Gildæ sapientis de Excidio Britanniæ liber querulus. Ex antiquissimo MS. Cod. Cantabrigiensi i. e. An History, and a Letter, concerning the destruction of Britain by the Saxons; written by Gildas, a Monk of Banchor in the 6th century. II. Vita S. Wilfridi Episcopi Eboracensis. Auctore Eddio Stephano. i. e. The life of St Wilfrid the third Archbishop of York, [who died in 711.] written by Eddius, or Heddius, surnamed Stephen, that flourished about the year 720. III. Historia Britonum, auctore Nennio. i. e. The History of the Britons, by Nennius; a Monk of Banchor, who flourished in the beginning of the 7th century. With notes at the end. IV. Annales Joan. Asserii. i e. The Annals of J. Asser, Bishop of Sherbourn, who died anno 909. These Annals begin at Julius Cæsar, and end at the year 904. V. Polychronicon Ranulphi Higdeni Monachi Cestrensis. i. e. The Polychronicon of Ralph Higden Monk of Chester: divided into six books. It begins at the earliest times, and was brought down by the author to the year 1343: but Dr Gale has published it here only as far as the year 1066, and hath retrenched from it every thing that did not relate to the English History. VI. Willielmus Malmesburiensis de Antiquitate Glastonienſis Ecclesiæ. i. e. William [Somerset, Monk] of Malmesbury, of the Antiquity of Glaston-bury-church. VII. Wil. Malmesburiensis Liber V. de Pontificibus. i. e. The same William's fifth book of the English Bishops: being the life of Aldelm, first Bishop of Sherborn (3); and a supplement to his IV. books De Pontificibus, published by Sir Henry Savile, with the rest of that author's historical works. He had promised this life, at the beginning of his account of the Bishops of Sherborn. VIII. Historia Ramesiensis, sive Liber de Fundatione & Benefactoribus Coenobii Ramesiensis. i. e. The History of the foundation of Ramesey-monastery, in Huntingdonshire; and of the benefactors to the same. IX. and X Historia Ecclesiæ Elienſis. Lib. II. i. e. The History of the Church, or Monastery of Ely, in two books. XI. Chronica Joannis Wallingford. i. e. The Chronicle of John Wallingford, twenty first Abbot of St Albans. It begins at the year of Christ 449, and ends at 1035. XII. Historia Compendiosa de Regibus Britonum, auctore Radulpho de Diceto. i. e. A compendious [and indeed an imperfect] History of the British Kings, from [the pretended] Brutus to Cadwalader, anno Ch. 689. By Ralph de Diceto, Dean of St Paul's in the 13th century. XIII. De Partitione Provinciæ in Schiras, & Episcopatus, & Regna. i. e. Of the Division of England into Shires, Bishopricks, and Kingdoms. By an author unknown. He reckons 32 counties in England; exclusive of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Cumberland, Cornwal, and Wales; and two Archbishopricks, and twenty Bishopricks. XIV. Joannis Fordun Scoti-Chronicon, sive Scotorum Historia. i. e. The History of the Scots, by John Fordun, Chaplain of the Church of Aberdeen. [Published in a more compleat manner by Thomas Hearne Oxon. 1722. 5 vols. 8vo] XV. De Pontificibus & Sanctis Ecclesiæ Eboracensis Poema, auctore Flacco Alcwino. i. e. A poetical account of the Archbishops and Saints of the Church of York, by Flaccus Alcwinus, or Albinus (4). To this collection the learned editor hath added an Appendix, of what several ancient authors have written concerning Britain: namely, 1. The 2d and 3d chapters of the viiith book of Ptolemy's Geography, in Greek and Latin 2. Extracts, from Antoninus's Itinerary; the Notitia Dignitatum Imperii Romani; & Geograph. Anonymus Ravennas. 3. The number of hides in several counties south of the Humber. 4. An abstract of Doomesday-book, which he intitles, Consuetudines & Jura Anglicana, ex libro censuali, dicto Doomesday. 5. The ancient names of the people, places, &c. in Britain; from Camden, in alphabetical order. 6. Chap. 16. of book iv. of Pliny's Natural History, relating to Britain. 7. Genealogies of the several Saxon Kings in this island; from the Textus Roffensis, and Alured of Beverley. Interspersed with learned notes, and emendations. This very particular account of the contents of these two volumes I thought necessary to give, for the sake of all lovers of English History, to whom such notices are very useful, and save them a great deal of time.

Our learned author left also several pieces in manuscript, namely, 1. Jamblichus de vita Pythagoræ. 2. Origenis Philocalia, variis MSS. collecta, emendata, & nova versione donata. 3. Antonini Itinerarium. This last was published by his learned son Roger Gale, Esq; under this title, Antonini Iter Britannicum, commentariis illustratum Thomæ Gale S. T. P. nuper Decani Eboracensis. Opus posthumum revisit, auxit, edidit R. G. Accessit Anonymi Ravennatis Britanniæ Chorographia cum Autographo Regis Galliæ MS. & Codice Vaticano collata. Adjiciuntur conjecturæ plurimæ, cum nominibus locorum Anglicis, quotquot iis assignari potuerint. Lond. 1709. 4to. But this is the most exceptionable of Dr Gale's works: for, out of an affectation of saying something new, he hath displaced most of the ancient stations, without sufficient authority; and hath indulged himself a great deal too much in fancy and conjectures.——There were likewise published in 1704, 'Sermons preached 'upon several holy days observed in the Church of 'England, by Thomas Gale Dean of York.' Lond. 8vo.

[K] Besides an especial service he did to his Deanery.] It was this: at his admission to his Deanery, finding the Dean's title to be a Canon-Residentiary called in question; in order to put it out of all dispute, he generously procured letters patent, in 1699, to fix it to himself, and successors (5).

GALE (Dr JOHN), a learned Divine, an eminent Preacher, and the moſt applauded Champion of the Engliſh Anabaptiſts (as they are called) in the XVIIIth century. He was born May the twenty-ſixth 1680, at London, his father being a worthy and well eſteemed citizen, one who had great natural abilities, and a very high reputation for integrity (a). The natural gravity, and unuſual compoſure, of his ſon's temper thro' the courſe of his childhood, induced him to ſpare no pains or expence in his education, as having an early view to thoſe labours for the inſtruction of mankind, which were to be the principal buſineſs of his riper years (b). He correſponded preciſely with his father's intentions thro' his primary ſtudies, which were his ſole occupation, as well at thoſe hours when his ſchool-fellows were employed in amuſements ſuitable to their age, as when, according to the ordinary courſe of education, a ſtrict attention was expected from him (c). By this indefatigable purſuit of learning, he ſoon outſtripp'd thoſe of his ſtanding, and qualified himſelf for more important inquiries than thoſe which relate to grammar and languages. The good old man, deſirous of giving all imaginable advantages to ſo great a genius, and ſo uncommon an application to literature, ſent him over to Leyden, in order to finiſh perfectly what he had ſo happily begun (d). He was there engaged in the moſt ſerious enquiries; when at the age of ſeventeen, he received the unexpected, as well as unwelcome, news of his mother's death, whom he had many other reaſons to regret beſides thoſe of tenderneſs and affection ſpringing from ſo near a relation (e). He well expreſſed the motives to his own conſtancy, in a letter of conſolation he wrote his afflicted father on that melancholy occaſion. Yet he was well apprized, that this breach in the family would make his return to England neceſſary, earlier than otherwiſe it would have been, which made him very induſtrious in improving all the time which he ſtill had to ſtay; and in this he was not only ſo diligent, but ſo ſucceſsful, that, in the ſpace of two years, a ſhort time indeed for ſo great a work! he conquered all the difficulties of his favourite ſtudy, and, with univerſal applauſe, received, when little more than nineteen years old, the academical degrees of Maſter of Arts, and Doctor in Philoſophy (f) [A]. In attaining theſe honours, at a time of life when moſt others begin only to aſpire to them, he not only raiſed his own reputation very high, but reflected glory on his country; the rather becauſe at his coming to that ſeat of the Muſes, he was completely maſter of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, which, beſides being unuſual in a youth of ſixteen, muſt have greatly facilitated his other ſtudies (g), and contributed thereby to ſo ſurprizing a progreſs as that before mentioned. [A] Of Maſter of Arts and Doctor in Philoſophy.] To be ſatisfied that there is no exaggeration in what we have advanced in the text, the reader need only caſt an eye on what his Profeſſor teſtified to his father upon this ſubject, and which is much ſtronger than any thing in our account, and yet conſidering the reputation of the perſon ſubſcribing it, no doubt need be conceived of its veracity. 'It has happened to no 'body ſays he, that I know of, to gain ſuch a know-'ledge of things, which are to be traced out by na-'tural reaſon within the ſpace of fifteen months and 'no more, which is all the time your ſon has applied 'himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, and that 'before the expiration of the nineteenth year of his 'age, as to be judged worthy to be adorned with the 'higheſt honours in a ſolemn ceremony. God grant 'he may go on in the ſame pace he has begun, and 'continue the ſame aſſiduity and diligence to the end, 'that ſo he may become a moſt fit inſtrument to ad-'vance the glory of the name of the Lord, the fur-'thering his own ſalvation, and the publick good of 'his neighbours.'

Surprizing, one has a right to call it, ſince it appeared ſuch even in the eyes of the beſt judges, as is manifeſted not only from the pieces preſerved in the former note, but from the moſt eloquent oration pronounced by the learned Volder, expreſsly upon this occaſion, July the third 1699, and publiſhed after his death by the celebrated Profeſſor Boerhaave (b), of which a few periods will be found at the bottom of the page [B]. After he left the Univerſity of Leyden, he made a tour to Amſterdam, which afforded him ſeveral opportunities of viſiting the famous Mr John le Clerc, with whom he then fix'd a correſpondence, and of whoſe character we find him, in his writings, a very zealous as well as very able defender (i). Upon his return to his native country, he purſued, with the ſame vivacity and diligence as at School or the Univerſity, the acquiſition of all uſeful knowledge in regard to the concerns of this life, and with ſtill more attention and vigilance that ſacred ſcience which affords the means of obtaining a ſure title to a better. With a view to this, he perfected his ſkill in the oriental languages; and, having carefully ſought all the previous helps neceſſary to the thorough underſtanding of them, began, with moſt ſerious application, to ſtudy aſſiduouſly the ſacred Scriptures in their originals, and to conſider what lights might be obtained towards reaching their true ſenſe, not only from commentaries, but antient verſions (k). [B] At the bottom of the page.] It will certainly be ſome entertainment to the reader, and can ſcarce be conſidered as a digreſſion from our ſubject, if in this note we give ſome account of Mr de Volder, whoſe harangue does our author ſo much honour; he was Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Mathematics in the Univerſity of Leyden, and had therefore the faireſt opportunity of knowing Mr Gale thoroughly, which adds not a little credit to what he ſays. This learned man was brought up, and in his youth embraced the ſect of the Mennonites, or Minniſts, or as they are with greater propriety called Baptiſts, but before he entred upon the functions of his Profeſſorſhip, he became a member of the reformed Church in Holland. He was a zealous Carteſian, and had high notions as a Republican, which being maliciouſly repreſented to King William then Prince of Orange, he ſuperſeded his own nomination of this gentleman to be Rector of the Univerſity, the very night before it was to have taken place. But in 1697, which was eleven years afterwards, his Majeſty of his own accord conferred upon him that honour (2). In 1699, he preſided in that publick Act, in which our young Student had his degrees conferred upon him, and in his oration he ſhews how unreaſonable it is to oppoſe notions, merely upon account of their novelty, and from thence he takes occaſion to make it appear, that it is highly imprudent for Princes or States to interfere at all about ſpeculative opinions, by encouraging one ſide or depreſſing the other; he remarks, that truth and falſehood are not at all ſubject to authority, and that where a Government leaves an entire freedom to Theologians and Philoſophers in their debates, it is impoſſible it ſhould be hurt by them; whereas by a contrary conduct, factions are excited that frequently become dangerous, whereas when there is no ſuch interpoſition, how loud or how warm ſoever thoſe diſputes may be for a time, truth is ſure to prevail at laſt. This is the general ſcope of his diſcourſe, and from the facts before related, the reader will ſee the true motive to it. The whole oration in Latin is very judiciouſly prefixed to the poſthumous works of our author, and very well deſerves reading, but for what more particularly concerns him, who is the ſubject of our diſcourſe, it follows tranſlated with the form of creation, (which is curious) as ſpoken in Latin (3). ‘ If that be new, ſaid ‘ he, which has not been done for many years, which no ‘ one of the Profeſſors in this Univerſity hath ſeen in ‘ his time, then 'tis new to declare a Doctor of Phi- ‘ loſophy from this place, tho' if you conſider the ce- ‘ remonies with which this ſolemnity is performed it ‘ appears antient. But I wiſh the noble and very lau- ‘ dable deſign of this candidate in proſecuting his ſtu- ‘ dies was a thing cuſtomary, who after he had ap- ‘ plied his mind to them, thought it his buſineſs, not ‘ according to the new, but very bad, method to reſt ‘ ſatisfied with a ſlight and ſuperficial knowledge of ‘ the liberal arts, but to look into their inmoſt re- ‘ ceſſes, and to acquaint himſelf with what lay moſt ‘ concealed in thoſe of them which he converſed with. ‘ Wherefore in the firſt place, with great labour he ‘ gained the knowledge of the tongues, that he might ‘ afterward with more eaſe and advantage apply him- ‘ ſelf to the ſciences themſelves. For this purpoſe he ‘ not only carefully ſtudied the Latin Tongue, but ‘ what in this age is very rare and unuſual the Greek ‘ and Hebrew. I ſay nothing of the Latin in which ‘ he has often ſpoke publickly at London, that famous ‘ city, for you have heard with what elegance, pro- ‘ priety, and force of perſuaſion, he commended the ‘ ſtudy of wiſdom. But I can by no means omit to ‘ obſerve, that he ſo applied himſelf to the Greek ‘ Language, as not only to underſtand it, but be able ‘ to declaim in it publickly. To theſe he added like- ‘ wiſe the Hebrew, thinking the knowledge of the ‘ Greek inſufficient without this, and that he muſt ‘ depend upon the credit of others for the interpre- ‘ tation of the ſacred writings. Furniſhed with theſe ‘ helps he entered upon the ſtudy of Philoſophy be- ‘ ing induced to it partly by the pleaſure which ariſes ‘ from enquiries into things obſcure, and partly by ‘ the advantage which thoſe ſtudies afford both in life ‘ and other ſciences, and partly likewiſe as thinking ‘ it the beſt method to cultivate his mind, and diſpoſe ‘ it more readily and clearly to diſtinguiſh truth from ‘ falſehood in every ſubject. And before he had pur- ‘ ſued theſe ſtudies full two years, ſee, I beſeech you, ‘ what penetration of mind, joined with incredible ‘ diligence, is capable of performing, he was willing ‘ to give ſome publick proof of his proficiency in ‘ them. Nor has he failed in the attempt, for both ‘ in his private and publick examinations he diſco- ‘ vered ſo acute a genius, and ſuch knowledge of ‘ things natural, divine, and moral, that, agreeable to ‘ his great merit, the higheſt honours in Philoſophy ‘ have been decreed to be conferred on him in a ſo- ‘ lemn manner, and according to antient cuſtom.’ Having ſaid this he added. ‘ Quare quod felix fau- ‘ ſtumque ſit tibi, tuiſque honorificum, ex auctoritate ‘ ampliſſimi Senatus Academici ego te Johannem ‘ Gale, Londinenſem Anglum L. A. M. & Philoſo- ‘ phiæ Doctorem creo, dico, renuncio: do tibi facul- ‘ tatem Cathedram hanc Doctoralem conſcendendi, & ‘ ex ea Philoſophiam docendi: confero denique in te ‘ omnia privilegia, immunitates, quæ L. A. M. & ‘ Philoſophiæ Doctoribus vel legibus vel moribus de- ‘ bentur.’ It was rude therefore in his antagoniſt to uſe ſo coarſe a phraſe as being dubb'd a Doctor (4).

of learning, about four years, he was offered by the Univerſity of Leyden (willing to preſerve an intereſt in him) the degree of Doctor in Divinity (l), provided he would give his aſſent to the articles eſtabliſhed by the Synod of Dort. But this, tho' highly ſenſible of the honour, he very prudently refuſing, preſerved the freedom of his judgment, tho' at the expence of a title (m). It is certain, that, in conferring this degree, the Dutch Univerſity would have loſt no credit, ſince of his age there were few in Europe deſerved it better. For, by this time, he had not only gone through, in the laborious way of a critical examination, both the Old Teſtament and the New, with the moſt celebrated commentaries on both, as well antient as modern; but the moſt eminent amongſt the Fathers, with equal diligence and impartiality, by which he acquired (as his learned writings ſhewed) a thorough acquaintance with, and due regard for, without imbibing an implicit faith in, or a dangerous reliance on, the authority of antiquity (n). All this time, his worth was in a great meaſure hid; and there were but a very few, and thoſe of his moſt intimate acquaintance, that knew the real merit of this excellent young man. It was not, however, many years before an occaſion offered which called his very high qualifications into a much more conſpicuous point of view. The Reverend Mr Wall, Vicar of Shoreham in Kent, wrote a celebrated treatiſe, which he intituled, The Hiſtory of Infant Baptiſm; and for this he not only received, long after, the honour of a Doctor's degree from the Univerſity of Oxford, but alſo the thanks of the Convocation then aſſembled (o). A friend of Dr Gale's, a member of the Church of England, and very zealous for the doctrines of the Church, conſidering the reputation of this book, wrote the Doctor a warm letter thereupon, as if it had been abſolutely impoſſible to read the arguments contained therein, without being convinced (p). It fell out, however, otherwiſe with Dr Gale; he was not only proof againſt both book and letter, but reſolved to anſwer them, purely to ſatisfy his correſpondent, that reaſon and learning might appear in defence of that cauſe which he thought ſo utterly overthrown by this performance (q). Theſe letters, though written in 1705 and 1706, were not publiſhed till 1711, and then at the very earneſt deſire of ſome perſons of diſtinguiſhed abilities, who thought it an injury to the publick that they ſhould remain longer in obſcurity (r). Thus, by their own merit, they came abroad into the world, and made their author generally known and reſpected in a very ſhort ſpace (s), even by thoſe who did not embrace his ſentiments. Indeed there was ſo much good ſenſe, learning, and moderation, in his diſcourſes, that it was impoſſible they could meet with any other than a favourable reception [C]. But, amongſt the beſt judges of thoſe who were in

[C] Than a favourable reception.] The beſt way of making the value of this work known within the narrow compaſs of a note, will be by entring into a ſuccinct analyſis of his learned performance, in which he has ſhewn himſelf equally converſant with books and men, and with polite literature as well as eccleſiaſtical writers. In the firſt letter, he obſerves that Mr Wall's hiſtory is not ſo formidable as is pretended, tho' the beſt defence of Infant Baptiſm which he had ſeen, and that for thoſe reaſons on which Mr Wall himſelf recommends it in his preface. He then tells us, that Mr Wall is not much to be depended on, and that his real aim and deſign, was only to eſtabliſh the Baptiſm of Infants, and that he takes all occaſions to blacken the Anti-Pædobaptiſts, diſguiſing his deſigns with pretences to moderation. That Mr Wall endeavours to poſſeſs his readers with an opinion of his penetration, by ſeveral needleſs digreſſions, and to gain reputation by quarrelling with ſeveral of the greateſt men for learning, &c. as particularly Archbiſhop Tillotſon, Biſhop Burnet, Rigaltius, Gregory Nazianzen, both father and ſon; St Chryſoſtom, Monſieur le Clerc, and Grotius. That he has not acted the part of a faithful Hiſtorian towards the Anti-Pædobaptiſts, but ſeveral times, on no ground at all, takes for granted ſome things, merely becauſe they favour his deſign, and charges the Anti-Pædobaptiſts with whatever he had heard any one among them to have believed or ſaid. In the ſecond Letter, Dr Gale endeavours to juſtify his brethren from the charge of ſchiſm; and obſerves, that in order to an union it would be requiſite (5), and 'I think, ſays he, none can except againſt it, 'that ſome fit perſons were choſe on both ſides, to 'examine the Scriptures impartially; and the Fathers 'of the three firſt centuries, who followed their great 'maſter through ſufferings, and whoſe writings are 'undoubtedly by far the beſt commentary on the ſacred books; and, with theſe helps, to collect from 'the Word of God, the true doctrine and diſcipline 'of the primitive Catholic Church. And to what 'ſhould be thus ſincerely deduced, every one ſhould 'reſolve to conform, without reſerve. And, I doubt 'not, if an union were endeavoured on this expe-'dient, it would be accompliſhed much more eaſily 'than is imagined.' In the third letter our author remarks, that the diſpute between the Engliſh Pædobaptiſts, and Anti-Pædobaptiſts, may be caſt under two heads, one relating to the mode of baptiſm, whether it is to be adminiſtred only by dipping, and the other, who are the true ſubjects of it, whether adult perſons alone, or infants alſo. He tells us, that ſo far as the ſcriptures are clear, the practice of the Anti-Pædobaptiſts is allowed to be agreeable therewith; and that therefore if they err, they are, however, on the ſafer ſide. He obſerves, that the Greek word for baptize, always ſignifies to dip only into any manner of a thing, but is more commonly uſed for dipping into liquids, which obſervation he confirms from ſeveral paſſages of ancient writers. In the fourth letter he remarks, that the critics conſtantly affirm the proper and genuine ſenſe of βαπτίζω, to be immergo; that Mr Wall is conſcious, notwithſtanding his pretence that the opinions of learned men are againſt him; and that whereas that writer appeals to the ſcriptures for the ſenſe of the word, it is evidently never uſed there in his ſenſe, but the contrary. In the fifth letter he obſerves, that though it is very unreaſonable to appeal to the Scriptures only, for the ſenſe of a word; yet it is clear from them the Greek word muſt always ſignify to dip; that if the word were otherwiſe ever ſo ambiguous, yet, as it relates to baptiſm, it is ſufficiently determined, only and neceſſarily to mean to dip, by the doctrine and practice of St John, amongſt the apoſtles, and of the ſucceeding Church for many centuries, which urged a trine immerſion. He affirms likewiſe, that the ancient Church of the three firſt centuries did not practice affuſion; that all who baptized in the times of the apoſtles, were baptized by immerſion; that clinical affuſions do not appear to have been introduced, till about two hundred and fifty years after Chriſt, at which time their validity was much doubted; and that all allow immerſion to have been inſiſted on anciently, as the only regular way in all common caſes. In the ſixth letter, he proceeds to the other chief in the ſame opinion with the Divine who wrote the book he anſwered, ſome thought themſelves obliged to teſtify their eſteem for his candour and abilities, while others went a little further, chief article in diſpute, between the Anti-Pædobaptiſts and their antagoniſts, relating to the perſons who are the true ſubjects of baptiſm, whether adult perſons alone, or infants alſo. He obſerves, that Mr Wall's attempt, though the beſt in it's kind, falls very ſhort of anſwering the deſign of it; and that this writer allows it cannot be made appear from Scripture that infants are to be baptized, and therefore recurs to theſe as the only expedients. 1. To the practice of the Jewiſh Church. 2. To the practice of the antient Chriſtians. Dr Gale remarks upon this, that from Mr Wall's conceſſion, that it cannot be proved from Scripture, it unavoidably follows, that it is no inſtitution of Chriſt, and that to ſuppoſe it may be included in ſome of the more general expreſſions, is only to beg the point in diſpute; and that unleſs Mr Wall can ſhew that Infant-Baptiſm is ſo much as mentioned in Scripture, the Anti-Pædobaptiſts will not believe it inſtituted there. He obſerves likewiſe, that the Baptiſm of Infants is unlawful, if Chriſt has not inſtituted it, that true Proteſtants ſhould adhere to the Scripture as the only infallible guide in all religious controverſies, and that the ſilence of the Scripture is a good argument againſt Infant-Baptiſm. In the ſeventh letter, he ſhews from Matt. xxviii. 19. that the Scripture does not leave Infant-Baptiſm ſo undetermined as ſome would pretend, and that the commiſſion neceſſarily obliges to teach all whom it intends ſhould be baptized, and that therefore infants cannot be included in that commiſſion, and he aſſerts that the verb μαθητεύειν is conſtantly uſed to ſignify nothing leſs than to teach. In the eighth letter, he remarks that the ſubſtantive μαθητης is only ſaid of ſuch as are at leaſt capable of being taught, and that the moſt judicious have always agreed, that the word in the commiſſion particularly ſignifies to teach and inſtruct; and that this appears evidently to be the true ſenſe of the place from the authority of the Scriptures themſelves, from the practice of the Apoſtles, and from parallel places. The ſum of the Doctor's reaſoning on this head is this, that the commiſſion obliges to teach all that are to be baptized, and therefore that the Scriptures are not ſo ſilent concerning the baptizing of Infants as the Pædobaptiſts would perſuade us, ſo that if Mr Wall ſhould prove the Jews and Chriſtians did baptize their children, the Anti-Pædobaptiſts have ſtill reaſon enough not to admit the practice. In the ninth letter, he obſerves that Mr Wall's aſſertions, that the Jews did initiate their Proſelytes, and their infants by Baptiſm, and that the Apoſtles and Primitive Church baptized the Infants of believing parents, are miſtakes, and that the arguments brought to prove theſe two points are no better. Dr Gale examines firſt Mr Wall's pretences from the Jews in this and the following letter, in which he endeavours to ſhew, from many conſiderations, that the arguments of the Pædobaptiſts do not make it appear to have been the cuſtom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to baptize Proſelytes and their children, and urges ſeveral arguments to evince the contrary. He remarks likewiſe, that even ſuppoſing the fact could be demonſtrated, it is no rule in the adminiſtration of a Chriſtian Sacrament, as being only the tradition of their elders, and not grounded on Scripture or derived from Moſes. In the eleventh letter, Dr Gale proceeds to the other kind of evidence produced by Mr Wall, viz. the authority of the Primitive Fathers, which the Doctor obſerves ought to be valued more than Monſieur Daillé and ſome others ſuppoſe (6). 'It is an ill return, ſays he, for the 'great leſſons and examples of piety they have given 'us, and for their having been ſo inſtrumental in 'tranſmitting to us the knowledge of our moſt holy 'religion. And there is yet a greater evil attends 'this method, for all the abuſes and affronts put upon 'the Fathers of the firſt centuries, do in the end re'flect on Chriſtianity itſelf which thoſe great men 'have handed down, and which therefore muſt needs 'be in ſome degree of but doubtful authority, if it 'depends upon ſufficient teſtimony. It would not be 'difficult to defend the writings of the Fathers from 'the reproaches caſt on them by theſe men, and by 'Daillé, their oracle, notwithſtanding he has taken 'ſuch pains in the matter, and puſhed it with all the 'vigour he could. But it is a nice ſubject, and much 'too copious to be treated here at large. I ſhall 'therefore only ſay, that in many caſes the rejecting 'the authority of the Fathers is a very wild extreme, 'which men are driven to, only becauſe they have 'nothing better to ſay for themſelves, and cannot 'brook to ſee their opinions contradicted in their 'writings. That the Fathers of the firſt Churches 'were honeſt faithful men, and every way capable to 'acquaint us with the true poſture of affairs in their 'own Churches and times, and therefore are to be 'depended on, as far as they relate facts within their 'proper cogniſance, muſt be allowed on all hands, and 'I don't ſee how their greateſt enemies can have the 'face to deny this.' The Doctor then obſerves, that Mr Wall's argument from the Fathers turns upon a ſuppoſition which cannot eaſily be granted him, viz. That the Primitive Church believed and practiſed nothing but what they had received from the Apoſtles themſelves. But Dr Gale tells us, that without any reflection on the honour and fidelity of the Fathers, their teſtimonies cannot ſupport Infant Baptiſm, tho' they ſhould afford Mr Wall ever ſo many and full citations, 'for if the Fathers only prove Fact in the 'Church and not Right, and the Church was not 'wholly pure from innovations, how does this prove 'the Baptiſm of Infants was no innovation, but an 'inſtitution of Chriſt? And yet this is the thing our 'author ſhould have done, tho' he takes no notice 'of it. It is irkſome to remember the inſtances of 'human frailty which even the moſt antient Church 'was liable to. They were men ſubject to like paſſions with us, and therefore no wonder they were 'ſometimes in the wrong, and their zeal for God's 'honour was not always according to knowledge, 'which, tho' it might keep them from loſing the 'chief thing our Lord had commanded, might how'ever expoſe them to the inconveniency of ſuper'adding ſeveral things he never authorized. The 'Apoſtles undoubtedly kept cloſe to his directions in 'all things without deviation, either in defect or ex'ceſs, for they had the immediate aſſiſtance in a moſt 'extraordinary manner of the Spirit of God (7).' But that the Chriſtians of the very next age made ſeveral additions, Tertullian confeſſes in his book de Corona. And Euſebius from Hegeſippus (8) notes, 'that the 'Church continued all the Apoſtles times a pure vir'gin and undefiled.——But when thoſe holy men 'were dead——then errors began to ariſe thro' 'the miſtakes of other teachers.' Dr Gale then proceeds to diſcuſs the grand queſtion, whether it can be proved from any of the authentic pieces of the Primitive Fathers, that the Church uſed Infant-Baptiſm in thoſe early times? He conſiders in this and the twelfth and thirteenth letters, ſuch paſſages as are produced by Mr Wall. He remarks in the thirteenth, that in St Cyprian's time, Infant-Baptiſm was practiſed in Africa; and infers from thence, it probably took its riſe there, together with Infant-Communion; that the Africans were generally men of weak underſtandings, that the Greek Church probably had not yet admitted the error, that the practice of Infant-Baptiſm began, as all innovations do, with only ſome little variations in opinion, and then paſſed to as little deviations in practice, and ſo by very ſhort ſteps at length attained, unobſerved, the great reputation it has now indeed for a long time enjoyed; that this was occaſioned in ſome meaſure by a zeal which was not always according to knowledge, and that the earlieſt Pædobaptiſts admitted children to the Lord's Supper on the ſame principles as to Baptiſm. His own words upon this ſubject highly deſerve the reader's notice (9), 'for thus, ſays he, in a caſe 'moſt exactly parallel, the ſame perſons who intro'duced the baptizing of infants, were equally for ad'mitting them, immediately after that, to the other 'Sacrament likewiſe, and that upon juſt ſuch another 'miſtake of our Saviour's words too, for as they in'ferred the neceſſity of Baptiſm from John iii. 5. ſo 'they did alſo that of the Euchariſt from John vi. 53.

further, and confeſſed they were moved by his arguments, and that they had never received ſo much ſatisfaction before as to this point, tho' they had been long converſant even in the moſt arduous diſputes in Divinity, and the writings of the very ableſt maſters in controverſy (t). Such, again, as did not eſteem it neceſſary to make any declaration as to the point in queſtion, ſhewed equal regard for his learning and modeſty (u), for that ſtrength and dignity which appeared in his manner of reaſoning, and that ſpirit of candour and decency, which ſo happily diſtinguiſhed his writings (w). Above all, they ſet an high value upon his charity, and that inclination he diſcovered that things ſhould be calmly examined by the infallible ſtandard of the Holy Scriptures, taking their true ſenſe from the commentaries of genuine antiquity, in order to a thorough reconciliation of all ſincere Chriſtians upon a ſtable baſis (x) [D]. In the management of this diſpute, he took a proper opportunity to vindicate his friend Mr John le Clerc, from ſome imputations thrown on him by Mr Wall, or rather which he had taken upon truſt from others. One ſees in this, how much our author adhered to his own rule, that ſincerity was a thing never to be diſpenſed with. He had converſed with Mr le Clerc, but could have hardly ſtudied under him as his pupil; for after he quitted Leyden, he applied himſelf to the celebrated Limborch, one of the moſt learned and moderate of their Divines, and the ſcholar then in greateſt eſteem amongſt the Dutch (y). Yet, for the ſake of this acquaintance, and a perſuaſion that the attack on le Clerc was ill founded, and calculated to do him hurt here, he very generouſly engaged in his behalf, and very fully refuted whatever in his heat his opponent had charged upon him as impious, as well as heretical. This was certainly due to truth and friendſhip, but, without all queſtion, many would not have been ſo ready to diſcharge the debt. The point too as to which this defence is made, was not a little difficult; and, in ſpeaking to it, the Doctor's own notions would neceſſarily appear: He was no way moved by this conſideration, but has very fairly and juſtly ſtated the imputation, or rather inſinuation, which he overturns from that learned man's writings [E]; and then ſpeaks as frankly

'Thus St Auſtin from theſe very texts at the ſame 'time argues for baptizing and communicating in- 'fants. And this cuſtom of communicating infants 'accompanied the baptizing them, even from the firſt 'riſe of Pædobaptiſm for ſeveral hundred years toge- 'ther, as in the Greek Church it does to this day, all 'which is ſo true and manifeſt as to be pretty gene- 'rally acknowledged. Dr Taylor (10) ſomewhat 'largely proves it, and frequently ſays, the one is 'altogether as well grounded as the other, and in- 'deed earneſtly pleads for the continuance of both.'

(10) Worthy Communicant, ii. §. 2.

[D] Of all ſincere Chriſtians upon a ſtable baſis.] There is ſomething ſo attractive in a modeſt and learned ſearch after truth, through the obſcureſt paths of antiquity, that ſuch as take different roads in that ſearch, naturally wiſh each other well, and ſpeak kindly of their common labours. Thus the learned Dr Wotton, though he writes expreſsly againſt our author, in relation to the Jewiſh Talmud (11), ſays thus much of him. 'He ſeems to be well acquainted with 'thoſe books, and is a writer ſo well verſed in the 'arts of perſuaſion; and his way of writing is gene- 'rally ſo very winning, that when I had undertaken 'to treat of the true authority of this moſt ancient 'text of Jewiſh traditions to us Chriſtians, I ſhould 'have been wanting to my ſubject, if I had not taken 'notice of what he had ſaid upon theſe matters.' The famous Dr Whitby (12), who made no ſcruple of thinking freely, and of ſpeaking as freely what he thought, ſays, that Dr Gale's very learned letters prove it to be doubtful and uncertain, whether that practice did conſtantly obtain. Mr Whiſton (13), in a little treatiſe of his, very fairly acknowledges that the firſt light he received in reference to the primitive mode of baptizing, was from Dr Gale's obſervations upon the paſſage of Iræneus, which laid the foundation of what he wrote upon that ſubject. This account he has very much enlarged in a late work of his, in which he ſays (14), 'this moſt important diſcovery I ſoon 'communicated to the world in this paper, which both 'Biſhop Hoadley and Dr Clarke greatly approved, 'but ſtill went on in the ordinary practice notwith- 'ſtanding. I ſent this paper alſo by an intimate 'friend, Mr Haines, to Sir Iſaac Newton, and de- 'ſired to know his opinion: The anſwer returned 'was this, that they both had diſcovered the ſame be- 'fore: Nay, I afterward found, that Sir Iſaac New- 'ton was ſo hearty for the Baptiſts, as well as for the 'Euſebians, or Arians, that he ſome times ſuſpected 'theſe two were the two witneſſes in the Revelations.' In ſeveral other places of that work, where Mr Whiſton takes occaſion to mention our author, he never fails to do it with the higheſt marks of eſteem and reſpect, and makes no ſcruple of pronouncing him the moſt learned amongſt the Baptiſts, though it will fully appear from the ſucceeding note, that Dr Gale was not at all of the ſame ſentiments with him, in reſpect to ſome very material points; and therefore, this character of his, is the more to be admired, as it is the leſs to be ſuſpected. Sir Peter King, ſucceſſively Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, High Chancellor of Great Britain, and Lord King of Ockham, had a very high opinion of Dr Gale, who was alſo honoured with the friendſhip of Dr Hoadley, in his time Biſhop of Saliſbury, and now of Wincheſter, and of Dr Samuel Bradford, late Biſhop of Rocheſter, who declared in writing his eſteem of our author, on account of his good underſtanding, great learning, candour, and largeneſs of mind (15). Theſe were truly ſuch qualities as merited general eſteem, and ought to preſerve univerſal reſpect to his memory, as in his life-time they attracted from wiſe and good men of all denominations, a ſincere regard and veneration for his abilities, and the uſe he made of them, in labouring to promote the fundamental principles of the Goſpel, and that ſpirit of extenſive charity, which is the peculiar ornament of the Chriſtian religion.

[E] From that learned man's writings.] It is in his firſt letter upon Dr Wall's Hiſtory of Infant-Baptiſm, that he inſerts this vindication of Mr le Clerc, which he thought the more neceſſary, becauſe his opponent was not the only learned man who had attacked, and as, the Doctor conceived, miſrepreſented this gentleman's opinions, which therefore he thought requiſite to ſet in a true light. 'You may obſerve (16), 'ſays he to his correſpondent, he, that is Dr Wall, is 'very angry with Mr Le Clerc, chiefly on theſe two 'accounts: Becauſe he endeavours, with ſo foul a 'mouth, to viliſy the Fathers and their writings; and 'the other is, his ſuſpected Heterodoxy concerning the 'Bleſſed Trinity, and particularly the Deity of Chriſt. 'This is the common objection of all Mr Le Clerc's 'enemies, for which they moſt bitterly exclaim a- 'gainſt him, though very unjuſtly, and oftentimes, in 'very bad language too. But it ought to be conſi- 'dered, whether a different ſentiment, or ſuſpending 'the judgment in ſo abſtruſe a point, is a ſufficient 'warrant to diſpenſe with the rules of charity and for- 'bearance, which the great incarnate God ſo repeat- 'edly enjoins, and has made the diſcriminating badge 'of his diſciples. 'Tis dreadfully ſevere to damn 'men, becauſe they can't find out the Almighty to 'per-frankly his own ſenſe of things, the very mention of which, by a very little addreſs, might have been wholly left out of this diſpute (z). He was little more than twenty-ſeven years of age when he finiſhed this work, which ſhewed not only ſtrong parts and great judgment, but alſo moſt extenſive reading. Yet the reputation acquired thereby, did not haſten him in his deſign of publick and ſtated preaching, which he would not undertake till himſelf judged every obſtacle removed, and that he was in all reſpects qualified to diſcharge his truſt duly, and with ſucceſs (a). Upwards of ſeven years elapſed before this happened, and he who had merited and received a Doctor's degree at nineteen, declined a like degree in Divinity at twenty-three; and, before he attained the age of thirty, acquired the moſt eſtabliſhed character for learning and a ſound underſtanding, would not adventure on the great charge of conſtantly exhorting and inſtructing from the pulpit, till he was in the thirty-fifth year of his age (b). He was then choſen one of the miniſters of the Baptiſt's congregation, in Paul's-alley near Barbican (c); and his ſermons being chiefly calculated to promote the amendment of his hearers lives, and to preſs on Chriſtians the great duty of living up to their profeſſion, he was deſervedly attended to and admired by perſons of all perſuaſions, which occaſioned a prodigious reſort to hear him as often as he entered the pulpit (d) [F]. He was Chairman of a ſociety for promoting primitive Chriſtianity,

'perfection; for who then can be ſaved? But thanks 'be to God, the ſcriptures give us better hopes, and 'at the ſame time aſſure us, their condition is much 'the more dangerous, who ſo freely preſume to judge 'their brethren: For thou art inexcuſable, O man, 'ſays St Paul, Rom. xi. 1. whoſoever thou art that 'judgeſt. Beſides ſuch men, in effect, do nothing leſs 'than oppoſe themſelves to the merciful deſigns of our 'great Redeemer, and ſtrive to fruſtrate his kind en'deavour, to make us like himſelf, while he would 'teach us thoſe admirable virtues of meekneſs, love, 'and good will, &c. And though he has been pleaſed 'to take ſo much more care to fix us right in the 'practice of theſe things, than in the ſpeculations 'which diſturb us; yet, an exact conformity in theſe 'weighty matters, which our Lord himſelf lays ſo 'much ſtreſs on, as ſpotleſs converſation, a pious life 'in all godlineſs and honeſty, are not protection pow'erful enough to ſecure men from the inſults of theſe 'furioſo's, as if they thought all moral virtues were 'nothing, without being right in the notion of the 'Trinity; and that this one ſpeculation might com'penſate for the want of all other good qualities; 'and I believe, Sir, you may have obſerved with me, 'that many of theſe fiery zealots are none of the ex'acteſt men in their lives. But God grant, they may, 'in time, conſider that moſt charitable warning, our 'gracious Lord has given them, of their danger be'forehand, aſſuring them, Not every one that ſays un'to him Lord! Lord! and in words only acknowledges 'his mighty power and attributes, ſhall enter into the 'Kingdom of Heaven; but he only that does the will of 'his Father which is in Heaven. But what conſidera'bly aggravates the crime in the preſent caſe is, that 'the charge is utterly falſe; and 'tis ſtrange, perſons 'that pretend to juſtice and honour, ſhould exclaim 'againſt Mr Le Clerc, on ſuch ſlender grounds, who 'muſt be acknowledged a man of great piety and 'learning. For the ſubſtance of all they urge, with 'any manner of probability, is, that his interpreta'tions of ſeveral portions of ſcripture, deſtroy the fine 'gloſſes others have built upon them; and that he has 'gone about to ſhew, that the Fathers did not altoge'ther underſtand this myſtery in the preſent orthodox 'ſenſe. Hence ſome angry men proceed to accuſe 'him of Socinianiſm; ſome, for they are not agreed 'of Arianiſm, and others again of Photinianiſm; but 'they all join to reproach him, though for no reaſon, 'as I can diſcover, but his refuſing to ſtrain any text, 'which he believes in his conſcience is not to the pur'poſe, as men of no mean figure have done. A me'thod which he rightly thinks only ſerves to expoſe 'the cauſe they pretend to vindicate. By the way, 'Sir, I would not be thought to juſtify all his expoſi'tions, ſome of them I receive, and thank him for, 'but not all; and I know Mr Le Clerc will not be 'offended at my diſſenting. The queſtion is not whe'ther his interpretations are juſt or not, he thinks 'they are, and has a right therefore to propoſe them, 'without being ſtunned with ſuch hideous outcries of 'Socinianiſm, &c. eſpecially, ſince in ſeveral parts of 'his works he has cleared himſelf to the ſatisfaction of 'any impartial readers.' He then proceeds to cite ſuch paſſages, as render it very evident that Mr Le Clerc acknowledged the Divinity of Chriſt, as plainly and expreſsly taught in the Holy Scriptures, but was unwilling to make an article of faith, of any human explanation of that myſtery, which our Lord had left to exerciſe our faith, and not our reaſon.

[F] As often as he entered the pulpit.] The great figure this learned perſon made in his life-time, in quality of a teacher of divine truths, and the general eſteem the diſcourſes he left behind him, and which have been ſince publiſhed, are in, at this day, render it abſolutely neceſſary, that we ſhould ſet his character in this reſpect, in a clear and full light. One who had an intimate acquaintance with him for fourteen years, treats this ſubject of his preaching in the following terms (17). 'Thus mature in knowledge, and pre'pared for his Maſter's ſervice, he began ſtatedly to 'preach about the thirty-fifth year of his age, poſſeſſed 'of a heart glowing with humanity, and diſpoſed to 'ſacrifice every private view to that moſt glorious one, 'of promoting the eternal intereſt of mankind. This 'pleaſing work he purſued with unwearied diligence 'and integrity, preaching the word, as the Apoſtle di'rects, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, reproving, rebuk'ing, and exhorting, with all long ſuffering and doc'trine, reſolving firmly to regard no man in the diſ'charge of his duty. He ſtood too much in awe of 'his great Maſter, to fear or know any man, or to be 'ſwayed by any worldly conſiderations. He believed 'firmly that he muſt render an account of his conduct 'at the day of Judgment, and wiſely reſolved to act 'as that he might do it with rejoicing. He was e'qually qualified, both to teach and perſuade. His 'ſtile was eaſy and natural, his expreſſions ſtrong and 'lively, his reaſonings clear and convincing. He had 'almoſt an irreſiſtible power over the paſſions which 'he uſed, agreeably to reaſon, and to the nature and 'importance of the ſubject. Who would not love 'God, when what may be known of the Supreme 'Being was deſcribed by him? When he maintained 'and vindicated human freedom, fate and neceſſity 'ſeemed to vaniſh before him. How gloomy does he 'make the vale of death appear, and how glorious 'the reſurrection from that ſtate of darkneſs, and the 're-uniting for ever the immortal ſpirit, to the un'changeable body! how awful does he draw the laſt 'tribunal, when the Son of God, arrayed with the 'glory of his Father, ſhall come to render to every 'man, according to his works.' Dr John Kinch, who was alſo well acquainted with him, gives us the following pathetic account of his labours (18). 'But 'what rendered him moſt valuable was, that his mind 'was well ſtored with heavenly gifts and graces, ſo 'that as a ſcribe, well inſtructed in the law, he brought 'forth of his treaſures, things new and old. Furniſh'ed to every good work, he was prevailed on to en'gage in the Miniſtry, in the diſcharge of which of'fice, he ſtudied to ſhew himſelf approved to God, a 'workman that needed not to be aſhamed, rightly di'viding the word of truth, and giving to all a portion 'in due ſeaſon. In his preaching, though he highly 'deſerved ſtianity, from July the third 1715, to the tenth of February following. This ſociety met weekly at Mr Whiſton's houſe in Croſs-ſtreet Hatton-Garden, in order ſeriouſly and amicably to conſider and examine the moſt antient writers of the Chriſtian Church, to determine which of the pieces attributed to them were, and which were not genuine, that from thence the doctrines and diſcipline of the Church, in the ages next to the Apoſtles, might be clearly and certainly underſtood and embraced (e). This, as we have already ſeen, was entirely, was exactly, conformable to the Doctor's views, who was not paſſionate againſt any Church, or obſtinate in any opinions; but ſincerely deſirous of being, in faith and practice, a true Chriſtian, without regard to any other diſtinction. It is alſo acknowledged by Mr Whiſton, that none of that aſſembly ſhewed a more ſteady, warm, and conſcientious diſpoſition, in this reſpect, than he did; or diſcovered more willingneſs to contribute to the utmoſt of his power, to extinguiſh all diſputes amongſt Chriſtians (f) [G]. He remained however, at all times, firm to his firſt principles of religious liberty, which he conceived eſſentially neceſſary to the peace of the Church; and therefore, in the year 1719, when a great Synod was held amongſt the diſſenting Divines, in order to pacify the diſputes raiſed amongſt the people in their ſentiments at Exeter, he was one of the ſeventy-three who ſubſcribed an advice not to impoſe unſcriptural ſubſcriptions, whereas ſixty-nine ſubſcribed a contrary letter on that ſubject. This ſhews he was uniform in his judgment, and of the ſame opinion in an aſſembly of his friends, as in a controverſy againſt one who oppoſed that Chriſtian ſyſtem which he had embraced. At the perſuaſion alſo of Mr Whiſton, he had, in that gentleman's houſe, a conference with his former antagoniſt Dr Wall, which ended as ſuch conferences generally do, without any ſignal or deciſive ſucceſs (g). Indeed Mr Whiſton is very clear, that the advantage was altogether on the ſide of Dr Gale; but having

'deſerved the praiſe and commendation of his hearers, 'yet what he ſought, was their profit and advantage. 'It was pleaſing and agreeable to a polite and ingenious audience, which uſually attended him, and at 'the ſame time plain and eaſy to perſons of a meaner 'capacity; ſo that in his diſcourſes, there was inſtruction for the ignorant, and entertainment for the moſt 'learned and judicious. His deportment in the pulpit was eaſy, yet attended with a ſerioufneſs and gravity, becoming the ſolemnity of the work in which 'he was engaged. His method was exact, his ſtile 'elegant, but unaffected, his reaſoning clear and 'ſtrong, and his arguments juſt and nervous, which, 'by his happy managing them, conſtantly diſcovered 'freſh beauties to his hearers. His voice was clear 'and melodious, which at once charmed the ear, 'raiſed and fired the imagination, and could not eaſily 'fail to gain the affections, and engage a reaſonable 'mind, not wholly ſunk in ſin, and bound down with 'vicious habits, to receive the truth in love. He did 'not ſhun to declare, as far as he could, the whole 'counſel of God; nor was he afraid to oppoſe thoſe 'ſentiments he apprehended to be erroneous: though 'the zeal he ſometimes uſed upon thoſe occaſions, 'might perhaps induce ſome, unreaſonably fond of 'their own opinions, to treat his labours with diſreſpect. However, it is apparent from the whole of 'his conduct, that the earneſtneſs he has at any time 'ſhown, in contending for what he eſteemed the 'truth, did not ariſe from the diſaffection of his mind 'to the perſon of any man, but from the love he bore 'to ſouls, from his great deſire to reclaim thoſe whom 'he thought miſtaken, and prevent, to the utmoſt of 'his power, others from running into the like ſentiments. He ſtrictly adhered to the Scriptures, as 'the perfect and only rule of his faith and practice, 'and was a zealous aſſerter and patron of univerſal liberty, where it tended not to licentiouſneſs; a warm 'oppoſer of all human impoſitions, in matters of religion, and uſed earneſtly to preſs all Chriſtians to 'ſtand faſt in that liberty, wherewith Chriſt had made 'them free. He entertained a ſincere and hearty reſpect for all good men, and paid a great regard to 'his Maſter's new commandment to his diſciples, to 'love one another. The different apprehenſions between him and other Chriſtians, did not in the leaſt 'alienate his affections from them. He truly loved 'all who bore the image of the bleſſed Jeſus. He valued all his fellow-travellers, though they did not 'walk juſt in his path.' To theſe teſtimonies, it may not be improper to join that of Mr Joſeph Boroughs (19), ſpeaking to the congregation of Dr Gale, to whom he appealed for the truth of all he ſaid. 'Of his happy talent in the Miniſtry, when once he 'was brought ſtatedly to it, you all are witneſſes. 'Concerning which, I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak 'more particularly by and by. In the mean time, 'the conſideration that a perſon ſo well furniſhed, 'was content to ſtruggle with ſo many difficulties as 'he did, when he might have enjoyed eaſe and plenty; that for the ſake of what he believed to be the 'truth, and commands of Chriſt, he choſe to miniſter 'in an unfaſhionable and deſpiſed way, when he 'might have had both applauſe and riches; in turning 'his thoughts to ſome other courſes; and that he 'perſiſted in this choice to the laſt, obliges me to obſerve, that herein he did, like the Apoſtle, fight the 'good fight, and finiſh his courſe, and keep his fidelity. He imitated him likewiſe, in his zeal, as well 'as in his integrity and conſtancy. But though he 'would be very earneſt in defending his own opinion, 'yet he was far from bearing ill-will to any, for the 'ſake of their differing from him; and of very large 'and generous principles, as to the extent of Chriſtian 'Communion, with regard to any matters merely 'ſpeculative; and in his converſation in general, he 'ſhewed a good and agreeable temper.'

[G] To extinguiſh all diſputes amongſt Chriſtians.] We have before ſhewn, that our author declared himſelf a lover of peace, and one that was by no means inclined to increaſe thoſe heats, or widen thoſe diviſions, which had been already ſo fatal to Chriſtianity. It was with this view, and in hopes of finding a rule for interpreting Scripture, of greater authority, and more conſiſtent, than private opinion, that induced him to become a member of the ſociety at Mr Whiſton's, which conſiſted of men of very different perſuaſions, united by no other ties, than thoſe of being ſerious and ſincere in their enquiries after truth, as will fully appear, from the firſt and third articles of the rules (20) laid down for the conduct of that ſociety, conceived in the following words. I. That the main, proper, and direct deſign of theſe ſocieties, and their meetings, be the calm, ſerious, and impartial diſcovery of true religion, and genuine Chriſtianity, both as to faith, practice, government, worſhip, and diſcipline, as they were at firſt ſettled by the Apoſtles from Chriſt himſelf; and the conſequent recommendation of it to, and the re-eſtabliſhment of it in, the ſeveral Churches in Chriſtendom, with the propagation of the ſame throughout the world, and in proper and direct oppoſition to all party notions, human determinations, and modern controverſies, among the ſeveral contending bodies.——III To admit and invite good Chriſtians of all perſuaſions and denominations to theſe ſocieties, to avoid all unhandſome reflections upon any of their perſons and opinions, and to treat them all with that reſpect, tenderneſs, love, and affection, that are due to fellow-members, however different in their ſentiments about leſſer matters.

having himſelf embraced his opinion, perhaps his judgment in this caſe may admit of ſome exception. It is out of all doubt that reverend perſon was far enough from thinking ſo, ſince ſome years afterwards he wrote a reply to Dr Gale's anſwer, which, as we have already hinted, procured him a Doctor's degree from Oxford, which ſhews they conſidered his undertaking as no eaſy taſk (b). Notwithſtanding this, Dr Gale was not either ſilenced or diſcouraged, but reſolved to write a rejoinder; yet this, as well as many other important deſigns, were defeated by his death. All that we know concerning it, is from a paſſage in a letter to his father upon the ſubject, in which he does not ſeem to have much doubt of making his party as good againſt the defence, as he had done againſt the hiſtory (i) [H].

This

[H] As he had done againſt the Hiſtory.] The deſign of Dr Wall's defence of his Hiſtory of Infant Baptiſm, was, in general, to refute whatever had been ſaid againſt it by Dr Gale and others. His motives to it himſelf informs us were theſe (21). 'The book, ſays 'he, that is, the Hiſtory of Infant-Baptiſm having had 'more ſaid and publiſhed by ſome for, and by ſome 'againſt it, than I could have expected, theſe latter 'who have wrote againſt it, and eſpecially Mr Gale's 'large book of Reflections, ſo he calls them, he might 'have entitled them reproaches, have made it need-'ful, in the opinion of ſome worthy men to whom I 'owe a deference, for me, even in this my weak and 'ſuperannuated ſtate, to write ſomething in vindica-'tion, partly of the cauſe, and partly of myſelf, ſome 'people having it ſeems raiſed a report or ſuſpicion, 'as if I myſelf had altered my opinion about the duty 'or the antient practice of baptizing infants.' After diſpatching what he has to ſay againſt the reſt of his antagoniſts, in about the ninth part of his book, he enters upon what he has to ſay of our author, in the following manner (22). 'Thoſe that I have hitherto 'been ſpeaking to have concerned themſelves with my 'book but briefly and occaſionally. But Mr Gale in-'1711, wrote profeſſedly againſt it. And tho' the 'greateſt part of his book be either of perſonal mat-'ters, ſome about my life, temper, actions, &c. not 'relating to the cauſe; and ſome about my way of 'writing, when it is too long or too ſhort, or too cen-'ſorious, or catching at here and there a paſſage of 'my book, which he thought might be repreſented 'ſo as to put me out of favour with the Anti-Pædo-'baptiſts, as are his two firſt chapters which he calls 'my character, or elſe on another ſubject, viz. not the 'age or time of receiving Baptiſm, but the way of 'adminiſtring it, with which I had meddled very lit-'tle, as are his three next, yet he gave to the whole 'the title of Reflections on my book. And tho' he 'goes no farther in any methodical way of anſwering 'than to the introduction, and five firſt chapters of 'my book, not nigh one tenth part of it, which an-'ſwer begins at his ninth chapter, and he has but 'thirteen in all, yet it has gone among the men of 'his party as an anſwer to it. He deals not much 'with argument which the others have chiefly aimed 'at, but writes in a way of declaiming and flouriſh, 'and much addicted to reproaching, taking a pride 'in ſhewing how eaſily, and how naturally he can 'expreſs a contempt of his adverſary, or of any rea-'ſon or argument. He writes in a ſtile indeed ſuffi-'ciently fluent, and with a good ſtock of philological 'learning, but does not keep very cloſe to the rules 'of candour, modeſty, or truth; but delights in vaunt-'ing, inſulting, ſlighting, and laying odious and falſe 'imputations, not on me only, but on the Clergy of 'England in general, and indeed our whole Church, 'as that was a time in which ſome people found their 'advantage by raiſing ſuch ſlanders. His talent in 'Rhetoric, which is not inconſiderable, he uſes to 'falſe colouring, and gaining his point, as he calls it, 'by wreſted repreſentations of things and paſſages. 'Of his impertinencies, to name but one ſort of them, 'an unparallel'd inſtance is his picking up ſtories of 'things ſaid or done by me before he was born, and 'naming the people, whoſe names one would never 'have thought to have ſeen in print, nothing, thanks 'be to God, of which one need be aſhamed. But it 'is a great ſhame to ſee ſuch impertinent ſtuff brought 'into a controverſy of religion. Of his untruths, I 'would before-hand inſtance in one flagrant and ma-'niſeſt one, which, as I ſhall ſhew, he has affirmed 'above twenty times over; his ſaying that I have in 'my books yielded, and owned that there is no Scrip-'ture proof for Infant-Baptiſm, tho' near half his 'book be ſpent in refuting, as well as he can, thoſe 'proofs which I brought from Scripture. The pro-'vince which I had undertaken, was the hiſtory of 'the times near following, but I did not altogether 'omit thoſe of Scripture. If I had followed my own 'inclinations, or the advice of ſome of my friends in 'drawing up an anſwer to him, I ſhould have made 'it ſhorter by half than it is, and taken notice only 'of thoſe few reflections of his, that ſeemed to be of 'moment to the main point. The tyranny of cuſtom 'obliges me not only to take more pains than I needed, 'but the dry work of following him καθ' ὡδας, 'and anſwering to many things that are impertinent 'to the cauſe, or of ſmall weight in it: but alſo when 'I have done it to make an excuſe to any judicious 'reader why I did it. Such an one will pardon me, 'if he conſider, that ſome captious and litigious men 'would otherwiſe have been apt to ſay, that I had 'paſſed over the material objection. To ſpare the 'time of thoſe who are choice of it, tho' I had not 'liberty to ſpare my own, I muſt advertiſe them, that 'there is hardly any thing in Mr Gale's firſt ſix chap-'ters, or in my anſwer to them that is very material 'to the point of Infant-Baptiſm. And it will be no 'great loſs to ſtep over them. A vein of boaſting 'and magnifying his own performance runs through 'all his book. With that he continues his work, and 'with that he ends, and contrary to Horace's rule, 'who ſays of a vaunting prefacer, Quid dignum tanto 'feret hic promiſſor hiatu? With that he begins.' For in an advertiſement prefixed to his book, having 'taken notice that ſeveral great and worthy men 'whom he names too, had given a favourable charac-'ter of my book, he ſays, that he publiſhed theſe his 'Reflections, to inform the publick, &c.——and to 'let thoſe learned gentlemen know, that they had been 'too haſty in their judgments, and that this hiſtory is 'not by far what they take it to be. Is not this youth 'a likely man, think you, to be able to inform their 'judgment of any conſiderable thing? I ſet down this 'as a ſpecimen of the arrogance you are to expect all 'through the book. In the ſame advertiſement, he 'ſays, that theſe Reflections, tho' publiſhed in 1711, 'were written in 1705, and 1706. Suppoſe that. 'But when he ſaw in 1707, my ſecond edition with 'ſome alterations, ſhould he not have left out his 'needleſs remarks on thoſe places of my firſt edition, 'which I myſelf had altered in the ſecond? He there 'adds, that he had hoped that a more learned advo-'cate would have been engaged. If Mr Stennet were 'once deſired or pitched on to anſwer my book, and 'it was devolved upon this man, it was an unhappy 'change both for the Anti-Pædobaptiſts and for me. 'For if he had anſwered at all, he would have ſaid 'more to the purpoſe, would have uſed a more ra-'tional, modeſt, and candid way of ſeeking the truth, 'and I ſhould have had far more Chriſtian treatment.' In another place, he acquaints us with particularity relating to the Doctor's book, which at once contains both compliment and ſatire (23). '. I will make one 'obſervation, a better natured one tending to the com-'mendation of him, and of the Anti-Pædobaptiſts of 'them for their generoſity and being pleaſed, and of 'him for his abundant juſtice. It is to be noted, that 'this chapter was publiſhed a good while before the 'reſt, as a ſpecimen of what the book ſhould be. 'They ſeemed very well pleaſed, and much taken 'with it, and encouraged him to go forward. Which 'was an inſtance of very good nature, ſince it is ſo 'little to the purpoſe, that if one were to expoſe him among

This, as we juſt now hinted, was not the only great deſign of which he had formed the plan before he quitted this life, and of which the publick was deprived by the loſs of ſo valuable and ſo induſtrious a perſon. He had thoughts of contributing to the ſtudy of the oriental languages, by offering ſome means for facilitating the ſpeedy acquiſition of them; which he knew would have a very great effect in rendering the Scriptures, as well of the New as of the Old Teſtament, thoroughly underſtood, which, without this help, is impoſſible, and is one great ſource of thoſe miſtakes which do ſo much diſcredit to Revealed Religion. Another great and uſeful labour he had propoſed to himſelf, if Providence had lengthened his days, was a tranſlation into Engliſh of the Septuagint, according to the accurate edition publiſhed by Dr Grabe, at Oxford. But what ſeems moſt to have occupied his thoughts, to have been in the faireſt train of execution, and for the loſs of which, in all appearance, the Chriſtian world has moſt cauſe to be concerned, was the ſcheme he had framed of a compleat Expoſition of the whole New Teſtament from the pulpit, which, whoever impartially reflects on his critical knowledge of the Greek tongue, his ſoundneſs in the fundamental articles of religion, his great ſagacity in judging, his known candour in ſpeaking, and his moderation towards ſuch as differed from him in opinion, muſt allow it to have been a loſs indeed! It is hard to ſay, whether this loſs is ſoftened or irritated, by the plan he left behind him of this important work; but this, as is highly fit, ſhall be left entirely to the reader's judgment, by inſerting that very curious and accurate, though plain and conciſe, piece, in the notes [I]. We muſt add to theſe another treatiſe of great expectation;

' among judicious men, one would deſire them to read ' this chapter. But he is to be commended for doing ' them more than juſtice, and making the goods to be ' delivered better than the ſample. For the following ' chapters are really ſomething more to the purpoſe, ' and of a better ſtrain.' Yet many diſintereſted perſons who have read our author's book, think there is not a ſtronger chapter in it, and that the firſt part of it particularly contains as much as can poſſibly be ſaid in favour of his opinion. As Dr Wall is very angry with him for being rude in many places in his book, yet in the following paſſage he cenſures him for being civil (24). ' He labours, ſays he, to defend ' the late Biſhop of Saliſbury's notion, that by the ' Kingdom of God in that text, is meant not Heaven, ' but the Church on Earth, and by ſome flattering ' elogiums of his Lordſhip's, unaſwerable arguings, ' &c. ſeems to have aimed at currying favour. And ' whereas, I had ſaid that all the Antients underſtand ' it in this place of the Kingdom of Glory; he ſays, ' yet it may not be the true ſenſe if they do. For ' the Antients were fallible, &c. It ſeems he could find ' no unaſwerable arguments among them, for they ' were all dead and had no places to give.' It does not appear that this inſinuation had the leaſt foundation, from the conduct of the perſon to whom it is applied; and the truth of the matter is, that Dr Gale's civility in one place (25), was intended to atone for his cenſure in another; for tho' he does acknowledge that the Biſhop had very well proved, that this expreſſion, generally ſpeaking, refers to the Kingdom of Chriſt, and not to the Kingdom of Glory; yet he denies his Lordſhip's concluſion, from the paſſage which he had cited, and maintains, that tho' it does rarely ſignify the Kingdom of Glory, yet there it muſt be ſo underſtood. If this be currying of favour, it is a ſtrange way of doing it. We come now to the paſſage of our author's letter mentioned in the text, which was conceived in theſe words. ' Dr Wall has written a de- ' fence of his Hiſtory of Infant-Baptiſm, in which he ' has treated me very roughly, and has endeavoured ' to enrage the Clergy, as well as our own people, ' againſt me, beſides which there appears not to be ' much in his book, however I am preparing an an- ' ſwer, which, &c.' After all, as they were men, we do no injuſtice to theſe learned perſons in ſaying they had both their failings, or to ſpeak with greater propriety, both had the ſame failing, that of warmth, and ſuffering themſelves to be too much heated in the courſe of the diſpute. But when a proper allowance is made for this, it may be truly ſaid, and indeed tho' in their heat they ſometimes unſay it, yet in ſeveral places they ſay it of each other, that Dr Wall's Hiſtory of Infant-Baptiſm is by much the beſt vindication of the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church that ever appeared; as, on the other hand, Dr Gale's reflections upon that work is the beſt defence of the Baptiſts that was ever publiſhed, and this, tho' it be no more than the truth, is ſaying a great deal for both, ſince the ſubject had been handled by very great men before.

[I] Tho' plain and conciſe piece in the notes.] Amongſt Dr Gale's papers after his deceaſe, there was found his introduction to this practical expoſition, and therein we have the plan of it ſo clearly, and ſo circumſtantially laid down, that we may from thence form a juſt notion of the nature and importance of his deſign, and of how great value the work itſelf would have been had he lived to finiſh it. This ſhort preface runs thus (26).

' I am now about to begin an Expoſition of the New ' Teſtament, and deſign, if God in his boundleſs good- ' neſs ſhall give me life and ability, to go thro' the ' whole, with as much brevity as the nature of the ' thing will conveniently admit. To engage your ' moſt diligent attention, and to help your memory, ' and thereby render theſe lectures the more uſeful, I ' think it may be very proper at preſent to give you ' a ſhort model of my deſign, and the method I in- ' tend to take in the proſecution of it. Now my ' chief view is not to engage you in any particular ' ſet of opinions, or to enſlave your minds to any ' man's private interpretation of the Scripture, by ' dreſſing them to advantage, and concealing or miſ- ' repreſenting what is ſaid by others; this indeed is ' commonly thought warrantable enough, but truth ' needs no ſuch artifices, but diſdains to trick men ' unwarily into the belief or knowledge of it. Be- ' ſides, ſince we are too ſenſibly convinced, how liable ' we are all to error and miſtake, we by this artificial ' way deprive ourſelves of the aſſiſtance of other men ' for the diſcovery of the truth, and when we are in ' an error ourſelves, do all we can to cover others ' with the ſame darkneſs, and if our endeavours were ' ſucceſsful, we ſhould effectually deprive them of any ' poſſibility of being better informed. I am very ſen- ' ſible what poor ſhort-ſighted creatures we are, and ' therefore will endeavour not to eſpouſe any parti- ' cular opinion or interpretation, or urge any with ' that warmth, which may any way contribute to ' blind or obſcure my own mind, or deceive you. ' But my whole aim ſhall be to lay before you the ' moſt ſacred and awful rule of our faith and practice, ' without any partial diſguiſes; and to the utmoſt of ' my power aſſiſt you in opening your minds to re- ' ceive and own thoſe great truths, which are able to ' make you wiſe unto ſalvation; that you may, upon ' a mature and due conſideration of things, judge for ' yourſelves with all that juſt liberty and true free- ' dom of thought which ſo well becomes all men, and ' is the indiſpenſible duty of every Chriſtian, and upon ' which, 'tis the peculiar glory of the Chriſtian reli- ' gion to have ſpread itſelf thro' the whole world. ' To build your faith on the ſenſe and authority of ' great men, is giving up your ſouls intirely to them, ' and to believe in them and not in Chriſt, as peeviſhly and haſtily to paſs judgment or take up an ' opinion without hearing, and diligently weighing ' what pectation, which was an Hiſtory of the Notion of Original Sin, in which he hoped to have explained many deep truths, and to have driven out of the boſoms of reaſonable men, ſeveral rooted and yet dangerous errors (k). About the beginning of December 1721, he was attacked by a ſlow languid fever (l), of which he died, after an illneſs of about three weeks, on the of the ſame month. He bore his laſt ſickneſs with great conſtancy and patience, expreſſed the utmoſt reſignation to the Divine Will, and, in his laſt moments, teſtified an entire confidence in that almighty and all-wiſe Being in whoſe hands are the iſſues of life and death, and whoſe mercy is over all his works (m). He may be ſaid to have died in the flower of his age, being in his forty-ſecond year; and in ſome meaſure unexpectedly, as being of a ſtrong and healthy conſtitution. In his perſon he was rather taller than the common ſize, of an open pleaſant countenance, and of eaſy and affable behaviour. Serious, without any tincture of moroſeneſs; chearful without levity, having a moſt perfect command over his paſſions, inſomuch that one who knew him intimately for many years, aſſures us he never once ſaw him diſcompoſed (n); extremely humble, tho' in ſuch high reputation for learning; and particularly careful of giving offence to ſuch as were in low circumſtances, as being ſenſible that nothing makes the mind of man ſo tender as poverty, and that nothing wounds ſo deep as the very ſuſpicion of contempt. As to his character in other reſpects, it may, in a great meaſure, be collected from what has been already ſaid; and, if this ſhall appear deficient, the reader may receive ample ſatisfaction from thoſe pieces that ſhall be preſently mentioned, and in ſome meaſure from the extracts at the bottom of the page [K]. He was, as is apparent from a variety of evidence, as univerſally

' what others ſay, is ſetting up a very dangerous ig' norant idol in your own minds, and paying divine
' honour and worſhip to the vain deluſion. Beſides,
' 'tis the higheſt affront and indignity that can be put
' upon God and Chriſt, to deal ſo careleſsly and diſ-' reſpectfully with thoſe holy books, as if we would ' boldly deſpiſe and trample upon all the ſacred doc' trines which the Son of God himſelf came down
' from heaven to teach us, and that purely for our ' good. Since then the extremes on both ſides are ſo
' very dangerous, it highly concerns every private
' Chriſtian to proceed in affairs of ſuch great moment
' with the utmoſt caution and calmneſs of mind, with ' great ſincerity and impartiality, for the Scripture
' contains ſuch things as are undoubtedly to every one ' of you matters of the laſt concern. On your con-
' ſcientious obedience to this rule your eternal welfare
' depends, and by this you ſhall be judged. To give ' you what help I can in this very important buſineſs,
' I intend to take this as the moſt proper method for ' your aſſiſtance and inſtruction. I will take in order
' entire portions of Scripture, which comprehend a ' full and compleat ſenſe. This I would, if it were ' proper, read to you in the original language, but ' that not being convenient, I ſhall read the common
' verſion and conſider it carefully, comparing it with
' the parallel places where the ſame thing is handled,
' the ſame words or phraſes uſed, or any thing which
' may give light, and ſhall conſult alſo the ſeveral
' opinions of learned men, with the reaſons on which ' they build and compare the antient verſions in the ' learned languages, together with the interpretations ' of the firſt Chriſtians, and ſuch remarks from the
' antient Hiſtorians, and ſuch accounts of the Jewiſh
' and Greek Antiquities, as may give us any light at ' this diſtance from the time and place wherein the ' Scriptures were at firſt written. After having thus ' examined every thing which may ſeem to need exa' mination, from the whole I will endeavour to give
' a very impartial and unbiaſſed tranſlation and para-
' phraſe, and herein draw out and make ſome rules
' and maxims for the conduct of life, in order to faſten
' all upon your minds, and leave it to your ſerious
' and diligent conſideration. Before I do this, I ſhall
' in general prove the truth of the Chriſtian rule.
' This comprehends, firſt that the books were written ' by thoſe whoſe names they bear, and ſuch as could ' not but know, whether what they writ was true or ' not; ſecondly, they could not deſign to impoſe upon ' us. And I will ſettle the authority of each book
' juſt before I enter upon the expoſition of it. It may ' perhaps be objected by ſome, that in the courſe of ' theſe lectures there muſt be ſeveral things ſaid not ' fit for common auditories; but ſince it is neceſſary
' to render the Scriptures intelligible to all, whatever ' is neceſſary to this end muſt not be omitted upon
' this pretence, that theſe things are unfit for com' mon auditories, i. e. not to be eaſily underſtood by
' common auditories, becauſe people do ſo rarely, if
' at all, hear them talked of. By treating theſe moſt
' difficult matters frequently, they will become fami ' liar to all, all things even the moſt neceſſary are
' ſtrange and diſtaſteful, and hard to underſtand at ' firſt. In the ſchools men are made acquainted with ' the moſt difficult matters, by being frequently en' tertained with them, and having them repeated over ' and over again. And this is deſtroying and cutting ' up by the very roots, hereſy and ſchiſm, atheiſm,
' irreligion and profaneneſs, and all error and miſtake,
' as far as it can be hoped for in this imperfect ſtate
' of men; for 'tis reſerved for the life to come to be ' perfect, when all error and miſtake ſhall be done
' away for ever.'

[K] At the bottom of the page.] The author of that ſhort account of his life prefixed to the Sermons publiſhed after his deceaſe, among other remarkable paſſages has theſe (27). ' The grand principle which ' he endeavoured to root the deepeſt, and cultivate ' with the greateſt care, in his own mind, as well as ' in the minds of his hearers, was that of ſincerity, ' upon which he thought our happineſs or miſery in ' a future ſtate will depend. He therefore conſidered ' that this would be of the higheſt importance, when ' many of the acquirements we here gain one above ' another will fade and wither away, which made him ' very humble, notwithſtanding his great abilities. ' This alſo diſpoſed him to judge charitably of thoſe ' who differed from his ſentiments, and to be very ' diligent in his enquiries after truth. His embracing ' the doctrine of the Trinity was one effect of this, ' for he did not run into this belief from any preju' dices of education or biaſs put upon his mind, in his ' youth having been early introduced into the conver-
' ſation of thoſe who examined the ſeveral doctrines ' of the Chriſtian Revelation with the utmoſt freedom, ' amongſt whom were ſome foreigners as well as others ' of the firſt rank for learning and abilities.' Dr Kinch, in his diſcourſe (28), ſets ſome other parts of his character in a very graceful light. ' He was bleſſed, ' ſays he, with extraordinary natural abilities, a hail ' ſtrong conſtitution, a ſmooth ready wit, a bright ' and lively fancy, a piercing thought, a quick in' vention, a ſtrong memory, and a good and ſolid ' judgment. Theſe excellent qualifications were very ' much heightened and improved by the advantages ' he received from an ingenuous and liberal educa' tion, in which he made ſo great a progreſs, as ren' dered him truly valuable to all perſons of real worth ' and learning, who were ſo happy as to have any ' knowledge of or acquaintance with him.—He had ' an even and compoſed temper, which diſcovered it-
' ſelf in the conſtant ſerenity of his countenance. The ' different turns of his affairs ſeemed to make little or ' no impreſſion upon his mind, for he, with the great ' Apoſtle

verſally regretted as any man of his character and abilities ever was, or could be, notwithſtanding the heats and party prejudices which prevailed in thoſe days (o). His funeral ſermon was preached at Barbican, to his own congregation, by Mr Joſeph Burroughs, December the fourteenth (p); and on the ſunday following, December the thirty-firſt, by John Kinch, Doctor of Laws (q); elegant and pathetick diſcourſes both. But his praiſes were not only in the mouths of his brethren, I mean thoſe of his own communion; but others alſo who were acquainted with his merit, his learning, and his zeal for the fundamental truths of the Chriſtian religion, took alſo a ſhare in the ſorrow for his death, and willingly contributed their part in confeſſing and applauding his virtues (r). It is very certain that thoſe who have ſaid ſuch high things of his attention to the great duties of his calling, his contempt of the vanities of this life, and his exalted confidence in the ſupreme Being, have not gone to any exceſs, or expreſſed his diligence, humility, or patience, with any excuſable degree of latitude, but have ſtrictly adhered to truth. Thoſe were his ſentiments in the vigour of his health, nor did they ceaſe to be his ſentiments on his bed of ſickneſs. While he was able, he preached to his congregation from the pulpit; when he was no longer able, he preached to them from his death-bed. He taught them in words how to live with hope, he taught them by his example to die in comfort. Theſe things, which might otherwiſe, in an age ſo cenſorious and incredulous, meet with doubts and ſuſpicions, are put beyond all queſtion by his ſermons printed ſince his deceaſe, and which fully ſhew what he was. As theſe poſthumous works make the greater part of what he has left behind him to poſterity, we reſerved the mention of his writings till we could ſpeak of them at once, and preſent their titles all together to the reader's view [L]. In them the juſtification of all that has been ſaid of his parts, or his piety, will be found; and there

'Apoſtle St Paul, had learned in whatever ſtate he 'was therewith to be content. He knew both how 'to be abaſed, and how to abound every where, and 'in all things was he inſtructed, both to be full, and 'to be hungry, both to abound, and to ſuffer need. 'He was truly pious, but without any thing of oſten'tation, exerciſing himſelf herein to have a conſci'ence void of offence toward God, and toward man. 'He adorned the profeſſion he made of the Chriſtian 'Doctrine by a holy and exemplary life, which was 'a convincing proof that he firmly believed religion 'to be of the greateſt importance, and that he was 'in earneſt when he endeavoured to perſuade others 'to live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this pre'ſent world. He was a perſon of great integrity, 'and preferred the peace of his own mind in the an'ſwer of a good conſcience to all other conſiderations. 'His thoughts were ſo fully employed about affairs 'of the higheſt conſequence, that he neglected ſeveral 'opportunities of advancing his temporal intereſts. 'He was ſo intent upon his great Maſter's buſineſs, and 'was ſo warmly engaged in the purſuit of the durable 'riches of the eternal world, that theſe fading trea'ſures paſſed his notice. He was a kind friend, and 'made it his buſineſs to inſtruct and inform, to ad'viſe, and, on proper occaſions, to reprove thoſe with 'whom he converſed; which moſt difficult office of 'friendſhip he ſo well managed, that none could be 'offended with him. And being always delighted in 'doing good, he was ever as ready to perform any 'friendly office even for the meaneſt diſciple of Chriſt 'Jeſus, as for thoſe whoſe circumſtances being more 'exalted, are from thence generally deemed to have 'a more commanding influence. He abounded greatly 'in thoſe fruits of the Spirit mentioned by the Apo'ſtle, Gal v. 22, 23. love, joy, peace, long ſuffer'ing, gentleneſs, goodneſs, faith, meekneſs, and tem'perance. But that virtue wherein he peculiarly ex'celled, was his great humility. Notwithſtanding his 'valuable and uncommon abilities, both natural and 'acquired; he always appeared humble and modeſt, 'mild and courteous; and was ſo far from having a 'vain and proud conceit of his own endowments, that 'he knew how, without the affected vanity of leſſen'ing his own qualifications, to eſteem others better 'than himſelf. He bore his laſt ſickneſs with great 'patience and reſignation to the will of God. When 'a little before his diſſolution, his mournful conſort, 'with weeping eyes and wringing hands, expected the 'dreadful ſeparation, Truſt in the all-ſufficient one, 'ſays the good man, who can if he thinks fit raiſe me 'up. He ſeemed to depart with the greateſt com'poſure and ſerenity of mind, making good that ob'ſervation of the Pſalmiſt, that the end of the per'fect and upright man is peace, and indeed what 'ſhould diſcompoſe him? For he well knew in whom 'he had believed.' Mr Borroughs obſerves alſo of his departed friend (29), 'That his extenſive know'ledge, and the ſweetneſs of his addreſs, gave him an 'eaſy acceſs to men of the greateſt figure and worth, 'by converſing with whom, his own abilities were 'very much improved, and this advantage he con'ſtantly purſued. The large acquaintance he had 'with the Claſſic authors in both languages, and the 'progreſs he made in mathematical ſtudies, and in 'the moſt valuable parts of Philoſophy, were accom'panied with a good degree of ſkill in the oriental 'tongues. But tho' he took a large compaſs, 'tis 'evident that he turned the whole courſe of his ſtu'dies to the work of the Miniſtry, to prepare for 'which, he ſpent a very conſiderable part of his time 'in the ſtudy of the Scriptures themſelves in their 'originals, and in comparing them with the verſions 'of various languages, particularly the more antient, 'whereby he became a great maſter in the knowledge 'of the Scriptures, and capable of diſcourſing to ad'vantage upon any point which immediately related 'to them. Beſides this, he employed himſelf with 'much diligence in conſulting the antient commenta'tors upon the Bible, and in reading and digeſting 'the primitive writers of the Chriſtian Church, for 'whoſe interpretations of Scripture he ſhewed a more 'than ordinary value. And here I think it deſerves 'to be mentioned, to his ſpecial honour, that he en'tered into a voluntary ſociety erected on purpoſe to 'enquire into the primitive doctrines and practices of 'the Chriſtian Church, and compare them with the 'books of the Old and New Teſtament, at a time 'when ſuch a thing could not be done without ſuf'fering much reproach for it; and that he continued 'diligently ſeveral years to ſearch into the antient 'books for this purpoſe, and by diſcourſe with others 'to make them familiar to him, the effect whereof 'might have been very beneficial to the publick, if 'it had pleaſed God to prolong his life.'

III. Sermons preached upon ſeveral Subjects, by the late Reverend and Learned Dr John Gale; to which is prefixed, an Account of his Life, in four Vols. Lond. 1726, 8vo. the ſecond edit.

The firſt edition, was publiſhed very ſoon after the death of the author, and met with ſuch a reception as might be expected, from the reputation he had acquired while living. In theſe four volumes, there are ſeventy-eight diſcourſes, excluſive of that preached on the fifth of November, which is reprinted (30). It may be very truly ſaid, that though the eloquence of the pulpit be in itſelf a very diſtinct thing, from the various kinds of eloquence, by arriving at perfection, in which ſome men make themſelves the guides and leaders of others; yet even this eloquence of the pulpit, is capable of many ſubdiviſions; and we ſhall find, upon a ſtrict enquiry, that few have been diſtinguiſhed preachers, without having ſomething very peculiar in their manner. We cannot either illuſtrate this obſervation, or bring this article better to a cloſe, than by giving an inſtance from Dr Gale's Diſcourſes (31).

(30) It is the 16th Diſcourſe in the 4th Volume.

(31) Gale's Sermons, Vol. IV. p. 414.

In diſcourſing upon theſe words, Follow peace with all men, and holineſs, without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord. Having firſt ſtated the nature of this command, and deſcribed that habit of mind which Chriſtians are directed to acquire, he proceeds to ſhew the advantageous conſequences, that muſt be the natural, and therefore neceſſary, reſult of ſuch an acquiſition. 'This noble, generous, peaceable, and 'holy diſpoſition of mind, ſays he, as it is every man's 'duty, and highly acceptable in the ſight of the great 'God, and ſupreme Governor of the world; ſo is it 'likewiſe of unſpeakable advantage to mankind, and 'abſolutely neceſſary to their well being, in every 'ſtate and condition, whether here or hereafter. To 'confine ourſelves at preſent, to a proſpect of this life 'only, we know men can't ſubſiſt without ſociety, 'there is ſuch a mutual dependance upon one ano'ther, ſo ſtrongly planted and rooted in our very na'tures, that no art or violence can pluck it up; be'ſides, our internal diſpoſitions, and ſtrong inclina'tions to converſe, and which ſhine out ſo clearly, 'that ſome of the ancient Philoſophers have thought 'fit to define man, by calling him a ſociable creature, 'believing nothing in man to be ſo eſſential and di'ſtinguiſhing as this: we are likewiſe, as to our exter'nal condition, viſibly placed, by the wiſe Author of 'all things, very much in one another's power; and 'though men were to condemn themſelves to the 'moſt unnatural and uncomfortable ſtate, and betake 'them to deſarts, and ſolitary mountains and foreſts, 'there to lead a ſavage life, in the moſt obſcure re'tirement, they could not remove themſelves out of 'one another's reach; for even theſe places would be 'open to their rude incurſions, and inevitably haunt'ed by wilder and more ſavage monſters, than they 'are at preſent. The only remedy for all the num'berleſs evils, and inconceivable miſeries, into which 'an independent ſtate, in every particular man, would 'certainly plunge us, is this of ſociety, which nature 'itſelf, that is, the finger of God, has pointed out to 'us; and yet, without theſe virtues of peace and ho'lineſs, ſociety, inſtead of a good, will be the worſt 'condition rational creatures can be in; families, cities, 'and commonwealths, will be only ſo many ſwarms 'of ſcorpions, tygers, and all manner of venomous 'and rapacious creatures, pent up together in a nar'row compaſs, and inceſſantly ſpending their utmoſt 'rage and fury upon one another; for no creature is 'more fierce and unruly than man, or expoſed to more 'failings, which diſturb and overturn ſociety, when 'he throws off all reſtraint. Our own experience, as 'well as the hiſtory of all paſt-times, ſhews us, that 'moſt ſavage man exerciſes all his cruelties, not like 'the gentler beaſts of the foreſt, upon thoſe chiefly 'of a different kind, but even more eſpecially upon 'mankind itſelf; and beſides the ſtings of hunger, and 'other natural appetites, which it ſeems are not 'enough abuſed to the worſt purpoſes, they have 'created to themſelves other more powerful, at leaſt 'more frequent and miſchievous, incentives to vio'lence and oppreſſion, and the vileſt acts of injuſtice 'and impiety. Thus they have raiſed in themſelves, 'an endleſs burning thirſt after things ſuperfluous, 'which muſt be continually gratified, no matter how; 'they have planted in their very hearts, the moſt per'nicious of all evils, the curſed ſins of ambition, pride, 'and avarice, which lead captive virtue in adaman'tine chains of ſlavery, while they ravage the world. 'Outrageous malice, fierce reſentment of petty inju'ries, and implacable revenge, do almoſt ſeem the 'natural product of a human mind; theſe are ſome 'of the inexhauſtible ſprings, whence pour forth thoſe 'deep foul rivers of ſin and wickedneſs, which ſpread 'themſelves over the whole earth, and pollute all the 'ſeveral degrees and ſtations of life. Hence ariſe 'quarrels, envy, hatred, rancour, enmities, diſcord, 'confuſion, and endleſs diſorders. Hence ſpring all 'kinds of violence, injuſtice, oppreſſion, and fraud; 'hence come robberies, horrid murthers, and cruel 'devaſtations, by fire and ſword, together with all 'manner of direful calamities; and, in fine, hence 'proceed the mighty armies of impiety, vice, and pro'faneneſs, which make a conſtant and too ſucceſsful 'war upon religion and virtue, eſtabliſhing infidelity 'and impurity, irreligion and debauchery, atheiſm 'and immorality, and all manner of licentiouſneſs, 'and numberleſs abominations, which utterly ſubvert 'and deſtroy all ſociety from amongſt men, and bury 'the diſtinctions of good and bad, right and wrong, 'in one common dreadful ruin: for by theſe, private 'perſons break to pieces all the bonds and ties of 'duty, friendſhip, and relation; and by theſe, ſu'preme governors, and men of great influence, whoſe 'ſphere of action is large, and widely extended over 'the commoner ſort, when they throw off the re'ſtraints of reaſon and law, ſpread ruin and deſolation 'throughout the world. Thus then you ſee, as it 'were in miniature, a repreſentation of man's uncul'tivated nature, which may well be likened to a deep 'wide ſea, which theſe unnatural paſſions ſoon blow 'up into a dreadful ſtorm, and render very turbulent 'and boiſterous, and hardly to be confined within any 'bounds; but of what amazing force and efficacy 'then, muſt thoſe divine virtues be, which can reme'dy all theſe mighty evils; which can ſubdue, ma'nage, and tame the wild ſavage nature, and make 'it mild and calm; which can curb and reſtrain all 'the unruly paſſions, and confine them within the 'bounds of right and good, juſt and honourable? 'Nothing can be more amiable or beneficial to man'kind; and here, no doubt, you'll fix your thoughts 'upon that peace and holineſs, which the great Lover 'and Benefactor of mankind ſo earneſtly recommends 'to us, not for his own advantage, but for our good; 'for theſe moſt powerfully expel all noxious humours, 'and naturally tend to ſettle an everlaſting ſerenity, 'quiet, and uninterrupted happineſs among men: 'And notwithſtanding the corruptions of our natural 'appetites, or any unnatural propenſions and diſpoſi'tions, we may have contracted theſe great virtues, 'having once gained admiſſion into our hearts, and a 'full power there, will render us pure and holy, as 'that bright flame which warms the breaſts of ſaints, 'gentle as innocence, and kind and peaceable as love. 'For a truly peaceable diſpoſition of mind, will 'conſtantly exert itſelf in all manner of generous and 'wonderful acts of goodneſs to all mankind; 'twill 'teach us to put on a calm, modeſt, and friendly be'haviour towards every one, and is always bent up'on that beneficial work, of promoting the growth 'of publick and private peace and concord; and ac'cordingly, is in all caſes forward, and ſtrongly in'clined, to put the moſt candid and favourable inter'pretations upon mens words and actions, and not 'quick-ſighted to ſee their failings, and forward to 'blow them through the world, or lightly to play 'with another's reputation and good name; for a 'generous and good man, would ſooner ceaſe to 'breathe, than one contagious peſtilential breath ſhould 'eſcape him, to blaſt his neighbour's fame. The true 'diſciples of the Lord Jeſus, whoſe diſtinguiſhing cha'racter from the juſt diſtribution of the parts of a diſcourſe, and not a pomp of choſen words, and ſounding epithets; or men retain any ſenſe of thoſe intereſting and important truths, which he has ſo repreſented as to be ſure of their making an impreſſion on the heart, by their filling the whole meaſure of the underſtanding.

' racter it is, to follow peace with all men, and holineſs, poſſeſs a mind ſeaſoned with the divine arts ' of peace, and works of purity; and therefore, inſtead of improving occaſions of quarrelling, by returning ill language, or hard words, or by reſenting ' the reflections and affronts, put on them by violent, angry, or abuſive men, they rather ſtrive to moderate matters: and by a winning and engaging ' ſweetneſs of temper, and ſoft anſwers to turn away wrath, Prov. xv. 1. when grievous words would ſtir up anger, and blow up a ſpark into a raging flame, afterwards it may be hardly ever to be quenched.' E

GARDINER (STEPHEN), an able Lawyer, a learned Divine, and ſhrewd Stateſman; Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Chancellor of England, in the XVIth Century (a). Few have riſen higher by mere dint of abilities, few ſuffered greater changes of fortune, few have been more magnified or commended, few more invidiouſly and outrageouſly treated, than this famous Prelate, in his life-time and ſince his deceaſe; yet, for any tolerable account of him there is none. We find no article of him in any collection of this kind, very little amongſt the compilers of hiſtorical memoirs, and, tho' there is more in our literary and other biographical Hiſtorians, it is ſo intermixed with other matter, or ſo viſibly tinctured with party reſentment, that it is almoſt impoſſible to know what to think, or whom to truſt. In this caſe, the collecting his memoirs with caution, care, and candour, and reporting them fairly to poſterity, is a work of equal labour and difficulty; but what then? It is neceſſary, uſeful, conducive to the bringing much truth to light, and expoſing many errors which have been ſo often, and elegantly, repeated by thoſe who took them to be truths, that we may reaſonably hope a kind and favourable reading of what particulars are here digeſted concerning this great man's life, which are as copious, as exact, and as free from bias of any kind as we were able to make them. It is alſo to be hoped, that they will be peruſed with the ſame equal ſpirit, and that the reader will bring an inclination to be informed how things really happened, what were, and what were not, the actions of this famous man, who had many failings, and ſome vices; but, withal, had fine parts, general knowledge, and abilities every way equal to the poſts he gradually filled, and even to thoſe high employments to which he at length attained [A]. [A] To which he at length attained.] Such as have not had experience of the incertainties, inconſiſtencies, and contradictions, that perpetually occur in moſt of the books relating to Engliſh Hiſtory, will very probably wonder at theſe complaints, and look upon it as a thing ſtrange, that the perſonal hiſtory of one who roſe to ſuch high dignities, both in Church and State, ſhould be a thing ſo very obſcure and perplexed, as we have repreſented it. The only method of making this plain, would be producing to the reader's view, the genuine cauſes of this darkneſs and embarraſſment; but, as that would require a volume inſtead of a note, it ſhall, in this place, ſuffice to ſet down briefly, only a few of theſe cauſes, and ſuch as have a direct relation to the article before us. The authors of our Chronicles and Annals, very frequently, either in the courſe of their hiſtories, when they ſpeak of remarkable perſons, or at the cloſe, perhaps, of a Prince's reign, when they come to ſpeak of the ſcholars, ſtateſmen, and ſoldiers, that flouriſhed in his time, give ſhort characters of ſuch great men, from what occurs to their memory; but theſe conciſe repreſentations, rather heighten than ſatisfy our curioſity, and excite in us a deſire, to know where we may meet with more, inſtead of giving us content in the particulars we would be glad to learn. Some again, from an inclination to render their narratives more pleaſing, draw their pictures a little fuller, and give not barely the out lines, but add alſo ſomething of ſtrength and colour to the piece, which is attended with various inconveniencies, not foreſeen by the author. For the ſame period of time falling under the conſideration of ſome other writer of a different genius and ſentiments, he gives the picture of the ſame perſon oppoſite, it may be, in ſeveral, if not in all reſpects; and then we want new lights, to inform us which, or whether either, of theſe pictures were taken from the life. Thoſe who have attempted to exhibit the lives and characters of ſuch as have filled certain high offices, either through the want of proper materials, or negligence in collecting them, have rather given us catalogues, and thoſe too very imperfect. Biſhop Godwin, for inſtance, in this very article, has hardly two right dates in the whole. Such as out of a love to learning, have undertaken the hiſtory of our eminent writers, content themſelves, commonly, with a few general ſtrokes in relation to their characters, and theſe rather taken from common fame, than from a cloſe examination of their works. Beſides, partiality and prejudice have had ſo great a dominion over the two principal authors in this way, with reſpect to our nation, that we learn from them, rather their own opinions, than the hiſtories of thoſe of whom they write. According to Bale (1), this Biſhop of Wincheſter was a devil incarnate; but then, according to Pits (2), he was a very angel of light. It is the ſame thing with reſpect to Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians, or ſuch as have written tracts relative to eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. John Fox (3) aſſerts, that this prelate was of a moſt fierce and ſanguinary diſpoſition; and the principal author of all the cruelties, in the reign of Queen Mary. Father Perſons (4), on the other hand, aſſures us, that ſuch as will ſpeak truth, muſt acknowledge Biſhop Gardiner to have been not only of a mild, but of a moſt compaſſionate nature; and that it was chiefly owing to him, the principal Proteſtants in that reign eſcaped. The remedies that are to be applied in this caſe, in order to free ourſelves from miſtakes, and to make the way open for truth, is to proceed methodically, and to ſhew his progreſs in preferment, the ſeveral employments through which he went, and the manner in which he diſcharged them. It is from facts, that we muſt collect his real character, and not from the panegyricks written by his creatures, or the invectives penned by his enemies. We muſt conſider the temper of the times in which he lived, the nature of the affairs which went through his hands, the circumſtances attending his actions, the means by which he roſe, the cauſes of his fall, the manner of his recovery, and the meaſures he afterwards purſued. We muſt be content to compare what is advanced by diffetrance of our labours, we meet with nothing but doubts and incertainties. Moſt authors of his age tell us he was born of obſcure parents at Bury St Edmund, in the county of Suffolk (b). As to the place, indeed, there is no diſpute at all; but for the obſcurity of his parentage, if we may truſt to ſome very good authorities, it aroſe from hence, that he was the illegitimate ſon of a prelate nobly deſcended and royally allied, who took pains to conceal that ſo much diſcrediting circumſtance to himſelf, by beſtowing his concubine on one of his meaner ſervants, whoſe name, being born in wedlock, this infant bore (c). Fuller, who is not always an enemy to ſecret hiſtory, rejects this ſtory, as invidious and ill contrived (d); but many, as like to be well informed, and not at all more credulous, admit the truth of it; and Sir William Dugdale (e), whoſe knowledge in ſuch points can hardly be diſputed, ſets it down as a fact. We cannot, indeed, go quite ſo far; but laying all circumſtances together, there appears to be the greateſt probability that this was really the caſe, as the reader will ſee in the notes [B]. As to the year of his birth, that has been hitherto as great a ſecret as his deſcent; and very likely the deſign of concealing the one, might occaſion ſo profound a ſilence in reſpect to the other; however, from an original picture of his ſtill preſerved, we have good grounds to conclude that it ought to be fixed to 1483 (f). We know nothing of his education, or the manner in which he paſſed his youth, till he was ſent to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he ſtudied in Trinity-Hall with great diligence and ſucceſs. He was diſtinguiſhed there by his quick parts, his correct pen, his elegance in writing and ſpeaking Latin, and for his extraordinary ſkill in Greek, which procured him very high compliments, as to his acquiſitions in literature, when he was in no condition to reward flatterers (g). In proceſs of time he applied himſelf entirely to the Civil and Canon Law, for which that learned foundation was very famous [C]. The reputation he attained at rent authors, in order to diſcover not only the truth of ſome things, and the falſhood of others, but the probability or improbability of ſuch tranſactions, as at this diſtance of time cannot be reduced to any abſolute certainty. It is not of much importance to us, whether our diſcoveries heighten or depreſs the characters of ſeveral writers; but it is of very great importance to know the truth, and to have a juſt notion how the great buſineſſes he managed were brought about, and whether he was at the bottom, a weak and wicked man, or a politician of great art and addreſs; and who, like other politicians, ſometimes purſued the intereſts of his country, for which, upon what motives ſoever he did it, it is fit he ſhould be commended, and ſometimes croſſed them to purſue his own, when he ought to be cenſured, how plauſible ſoever his excuſes might be. Theſe are the true principles upon which this kind of writing ought to reſt, that thoſe who move in the ſuperior ſpheres of life, may be always ſenſible, that whatever their preſent fate may be, they will have juſtice done them by poſterity; and that their memories will not be either tarniſhed by the groundleſs calumnies which envy excited, or preſerve any of that falſe luſtre, their mercenary flatterers, while living, were encouraged to beſtow

[B] As the reader will ſee in the notes.] The plain fact, in reſpect to his birth, was this. He is ſaid to have been the ſon of Dr Lionel Woodvill, Widvill, or as he wrote his own name, Wydviſle, Dean of Exeter, and Biſhop of Saliſbury, brother to Elizabeth, Queen Conſort to Edward the Fourth, who died in 1484 (5). Dr Fuller (6) objects to this, that Saliſbury is at a great diſtance from Bury, where Gardiner was born, which is, in reality, no objection at all, for, ſince that prelate was ſo cautious as to oblige his miſtreſs to marry an inferior ſervant of his, whoſe name was Gardiner, the better to conceal this ſhameful tranſaction, he might therefore be well ſuppoſed to have been as careful in ſending her far enough off to lie in. Another objection he makes, has ſomewhat more weight, he thinks Biſhop Woodvill muſt have had this ſon in his youth; and if ſo, the age of Gardiner, at his death, would not agree with the ſtory. But thoſe who relate it, ſay that he was born while his father was Biſhop of Saliſbury; and he did not hold that dignity above two years, which takes away the force of this objection. In the ſatirical writings againſt him and Bonner (7), it was objected to them, that it was not ſtrange they were againſt the marriage of prieſts, ſince they were both born in adultery. Now Bonner was the baſtard of one Savage, a clergyman, who was himſelf the baſtard of Sir John Savage, Knight of the Garter. Bonner's was preciſely the ſame caſe with Gardiner's, for his mother was married before he was born, to the perſon whoſe name he bore; and it is very remarkable, that both of them, till they were Biſhops, declined uſing their ſurnames, the one being called Dr Stephens, and the other Dr Edmonds. But Gardiner ſeems to have been better reconciled to his name afterwards, ſince he aſſumed the arms of the Gardiners of Glemsford in Suffolk (8), with a diſtinction of a border; and afterwards, either through the miſtake of the painter, or by his own direction, they were impaled with the arms of the See of Wincheſter, without any ſuch diſtinction. Biſhop Burnet plainly proves, that this ſtory was believed in our Prelate's life-time, for he tells us, that he had ſeen a letter written by Sir Edward Hobby, to one of the exiles abroad, for religion, immediately upon Gardiner's death, in which it was ſaid, that he was a man of higher deſcent, than he was commonly reputed; and in the margin of the letter it was noted, that he was Nephew to a Queen of England (9); but though this might be true, and though he was, by this means, ſecond couſin by the King's mother to Henry the Eighth, Biſhop Burnet's conjecture is not at all probable, that this might be the cauſe he was ſo ſuddenly advanced to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter; for as the reader will ſee, there was another cauſe, which is aſſigned by Gardiner himſelf; neither is it at all likely, that the King knew this piece of ſecret hiſtory, or would take any notice of it if he did. Had it been otherwiſe, amongſt the many private papers relating to that reign (for whence it's publick hiſtory is beſt collected) which, in proceſs of time, have come to light, ſomething of that kind would have appeared.

[C] For which that learned foundation was very famous.] Amongſt other poems of the famous Antiquary, John Leland, there is one addreſſed to Stephen Gardiner, when he wore no higher title; and in the cloſe of which, he foretels him, that his brow would be honoured with a mitre. In this poem he compliments him on his great progreſs in polite literature, on his fine taſte, and juſt reſpect for the Ancients; and the deſire he had ſhewn of promoting the ſtudy of their valuable writings in the univerſity (10). His own writings ſhew how much he had ſtudied Cicero; and the critics of thoſe times reproached him with affectation in that reſpect. As to ſeverer ſtudies, he is allowed to have excelled in the Civil and Canon Law; and in reſpect to the latter, he was ſo able, that Biſhop Burnet tells us, King Henry, as eager as he was for promoting his divorce, would not ſuffer the proceedings to be begun before the two Cardinals, till the return of Dr Gardiner from Rome, ſo much he relied upon his judgment and abilities. Both that Biſhop, and the Revcrend Mr Jeremy Collier, who ſeldom thought the ſame way of men or things, agree that he was but moderately ſkilled in Divinity; and therefore, it is reaſonable to acquieſce in their deciſion. But then it is to

at Cambridge, ſoon opened him a paſſage into the favour and confidence of ſeveral of the greateſt men of that age. Firſt, as ſome report he was taken under the protection of that generous and potent Peer Thomas Duke of Norfolk (b), and afterwards received into the family of the ſtill more potent Cardinal Wolſey, in quality of his Secretary (i). But whatever hopes he might entertain of riſing at Court, he had ſtill academical honours in view, and in 1520 received the degree of Doctor of Civil Law (k), and was the year following made Doctor of Canon Law alſo; but whereas the learned Biſhop Tanner, not without authority, makes him Maſter or Guardian of Trinity-Hall the ſame year (l), there ſeems to be good reaſon to ſuppoſe he did not attain that preferment till ſome years after. There is no queſtion, that, as the Cardinal of York's Secretary, he had a good proviſion made for him; but this muſt have been by way of penſion or ſalary, for preferment, ſo far as we find as yet, he had none. In 1525, he was, by an accident, admitted at once into the King's preſence and favour (m) [D], to the great ſatisfaction of the powerful Cardinal, his Maſter to be conſidered, that they ground their ſentiments upon his book of true Obedience, which they confeſs he wrote to pleaſe his Sovereign, and againſt his own ſentiments. It is no great wonder, therefore, that his arguments are not very ſtrong, and that he does not reaſon ſo cloſely and convincingly as he might have done; but notwithſtanding this, whoever reads that book with attention and impartiality, will not be able to deny, that he has overturned the Pope's Supremacy effectually; and though it is not penned, at leaſt the greater part of it, with that heat and vehemence, viſible in the writings of Proteſtant Divines, yet there is enough in it to ſhew learned men, that he had thoroughly conſidered the point, and was able to have ſaid much more if he had been ſo inclined. All this learning he muſt have brought with him from the univerſity, for from the time that he firſt came into buſineſs, to his being committed to the Tower, he was continually employed in matters of ſuch high importance, that it was impoſſible he ſhould have much leiſure for ſtudy. That his parts and learning indeed were very extraordinary, muſt be confeſſed; but if what one of his greateſt enemies ſaid of him was true, we muſt have ſtill an higher idea of them, ſince there is nothing harder, than for a man of a diſagreeable, and even forbidding aſpect, to make his way in a Court, and inſinuate himſelf into the good graces of all ſorts of people, which it is confeſſed he did. But we will tranſcribe the paſſage, which is very curious, and the book from which it is taken very ſcarce, for the reader's ſatisfaction (11). 'Albeit, this Doctor be now but too 'late thoroughly known, yet it ſhall be requiſite, that 'our poſterity know what he was; and, by his deſcription, ſee how nature hath ſhaped the outward 'parts, to declare what was within. This Doctor 'hath a ſwart colour, hanging look, frowning brows, 'eyes an inch within his head, a noſe hooked like a 'buzzard, noſtrils like a horſe, ever ſnuffing into the 'wind, a ſparrow mouth, great paws, like the devil's 'talons, on his feet, like a gripe, two inches longer 'than the natural toes, and ſo tied to with ſinews, 'that he cannot abide to be touched, nor ſcarce ſuffer 'them to touch the ſtones. And nature having thus 'ſhaped the form of an old monſter, it gave him 'a vengeable wit, which at Cambridge, by labour and 'diligence, he had made a great deal worſe, and 'brought up many in that faculty.' The author who wrote this, and whom we ſhall be obliged to quote hereafter, was Dr Ponet, advanced to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, upon the deprivation of Gardiner, in the reign of King Edward the Sixth; and at the time he wrote this book, an exile in Germany, where he died. In his treatiſe, he gives Gardiner, who was then Chancellor of England, the title of Doctor of Practices, and beſtows the name of Maſter of Practices upon the Lord Paget, whom he makes to have been Gardiner's pupil; he was indeed bred up in his houſe, and owed his firſt riſe to Biſhop Gardiner's favour; and to ſhew how great wits will differ in opinion, John Leland complimented Paget upon this very circumſtance, calling Gardiner's family the ſchool of the Muſes. At the time he directed theſe verſes to him, he was Sir William Paget, and Secretary of State to Henry VIII; and their author thought it would not create either diſcredit or diſpleaſure to him, to ſhew how much he, and Wriotheſley, then his Fellow-Secretary, and afterwards Chancellor, were obliged to that Prelate for his countenance, and for their own preferment. The lines are very remarkable, and worth reading (12).

[D] Into the King's preſence and favour.] There is nothing more entertaining, as well as more uſeful and ſatisfactory, than to be thoroughly and certainly informed, of the firſt ſteps by which thoſe who have made a figure in the world, have riſen to greatneſs. That of Gardiner, as of many others, was owing purely to accident, to ſpeak according to the common ſenſe of mankind. In the year 1525, his maſter Wolſey thought fit to change ſides; and from being moſt violently attached to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, became as warm a friend to the French King, Francis the Firſt, then a priſoner in Spain. Humanity and compaſſion, one would think, muſt have been the motives to this change; and they might be ſo, but a very grave Italian Hiſtorian, has ſuggeſted cauſes of another kind (13). He ſays, that before the battle of Pavia, in which the French King was made priſoner, the Emperor uſed to write to Wolſey, with his own hand, and ſubſcribe your ſon and couſin CHARLES; but after that victory, the letters to Wolſey, like thoſe to other perſons, were written by his ſecretary, till the Cardinal taught him to reſume his old manner of writing. It was the penning this leſſon for his Imperial Majeſty, that brought Gardiner to the knowledge, or at leaſt introduced him to the favour of Henry the Eighth; the Cardinal had projected a treaty, which was to change the face of affairs in Europe, as indeed it did; and the King coming to his houſe at More-Park, in Hertfordſhire, found Gardiner, then the Cardinal's Secretary, buſy in framing that alliance. Few Princes underſtood buſineſs, or could tranſact it better, than Henry; and therefore, it is no wonder that from ſuch a ſpecimen, he ſhould make a true judgment of Dr Gardiner's abilities. He liked his performance extremely, his converſation better, and that ſertility he had in the invention of expedients, beſt of all (14). He did not diſguiſe his ſentiments from Wolſey, there was no need of it, the Cardinal was truly great in this particular, that he feared no man's parts, Maſter at this ſeaſon; whatever it might be in proceſs of time, when, as the Politicians remarked, the Cardinal ſunk in the ſame proportion as this ſervant of his roſe. At this juncture, the King's affairs at Rome were but in an untoward ſituation, the Roman Pontiff, Clement VII, having addreſs enough to feed the King's Agents with fair promiſes, according to the ſtanding maxim of that Court; but, in effect, making no progreſs at all towards the King's point, which was the obtaining a divorce from his Queen Katherine of Arragon. His Majeſty therefore reſolved to ſend ſome perſon thither, in whom he could entirely confide, and of whoſe abilities and attachment he had a like opinion (n). After much conſideration, he fixed upon our Doctor, now become Maſter of Trinity-Hall, and, as Biſhop Burnet remarks, eſteemed at that time the beſt Civil Laywer in England (o); to whom he joined Edward Fox, Provoſt of King's College in Cambridge. At the time of his departure, in February 1528, there is nothing clearer, or more certain, than that he had the moſt entire confidence repoſed in him, both by the King and his Miniſter, who hoped all things from his diligence and dexterity [E]; and who, if there be any credit due either to their verbal or written declarations, were equally ſincere and in earneſt in this matter. In their journey towards Italy they executed a commiſſion at the Court of Paris, where, by warm and vigorous repreſentations of what their Maſter had done, and might do, for King Francis, they obtained that Monarch's letter to the Pope, in as ſtrong terms as could be deſired, in ſupport of King Henry's demands. When they came to Orvieto, where the Pope then was, Dr Gardiner uſed very free language with his Holineſs, ſhewed him the danger he was in of loſing the King by playing a double game, and how much injury he would do the Cardinal if he failed his expectations. By theſe meaſures all was obtained which his inſtructions required, and a new commiſſion directed to the Cardinals Wolſey and Compegius was iſſued (p). In the courſe of this long embaſſy, the Pope, whoſe mind was continually perplexed, and to whom the Imperial, French, and Engliſh Miniſters allowed no quiet, fell dangerouſly ill, the diſorders of his affections operating upon the humours of his body; and this, as might be expected, gave a new turn to the intrigues of Rome. Dr Gardiner had as large a ſhare in theſe as any Miniſter, for he laboured the cauſe of the Cardinal of York, in caſe the Pope's death made way for a new election (q). He had the French King's letters alſo to ſupport this deſign; for by ſolliciting the Popedom, he thought to make Wolſey more than amends for the Archbiſhoprick of Toledo, which was once tendered him by the Emperor; it may be with the ſame ſincerity, or, in other words, with none at all. Yet ſo much was Wolſey ſet upon having, at leaſt for a time, the title of Pope, that, having intelligence the King's agents, and his own, parts, but was proud of bringing to the royal notice, able and active men; and even under his misfortunes, as will be hereafter ſhewn, he had no reaſon to repent that the new miniſters, Cromwell and Gardiner, were taken out of his houſe, becauſe, in their higheſt proſperity, they did not forget that they had been once his domeſticks. This treaty, (which was the foundation of Gardiner's fortunes) or at leaſt the ſubſtance of it, may be found in that great work of the noble Hiſtorian (15), who has done ſo much honour to the reign of Henry the Eighth, and placed that important period of time, in a much better point of light, than almoſt any other, relating to the affairs of this kingdom. It was from this time, that Dr Gardiner was admitted into the ſecret of affairs, and equally employed and truſted by the King and his Miniſter, tho' we have no particular account of the matters, which exerciſed his care, till he came to be employed in the troubleſome buſineſs of the King's divorce, which was about three years afterwards. All we know is, that he and his friend Dr Fox, were the perſons upon whom the Cardinal chiefly relied, for directing his fine buildings, and for laying the plan of thoſe magnificent foundations, which, however they might excite the envy of the times in which he lived, have very juſtly recommended his memory to poſterity.

[E] From his diligence and dexterity] Our Hiſtorians, are moſt of them dark, and divided in their ſentiments, as to the ſincerity of Cardinal Wolſey, in the buſineſs of the divorce. Yet this may be obſerved, that thoſe who were beſt informed, and took moſt pains to look into original papers, are very clear, with reſpect to the Cardinal's real intention, to carry that point for the King, as the only one that could preſerve his power, and ſecure him againſt all his enemies. Dr Ponet however, who made no ſcruple of laying every thing to Gardiner's charge, that might render him odious, tells us plainly, that, in order to his own advancement, he betrayed the Cardinal in this embaſſy, and puſhed, with the greateſt vigour, what his maſter wiſhed might be ſpun out, in order to gain time. But let us hear what the induſtrious and impartial Mr John Strype ſays upon this ſubject, from better authorities than any of our Hiſtorians, except Fox, had ever ſeen, which will effectually clear up this affair (16). 'Gardiner, ſays he, the Cardinal's Secretary, and Fox, the King's ſervant, Provoſt of King's College Cambridge, were diſpatched to the Pope to effect this, in February 1527, according to the computation of the Church of England. Of whom, Gardiner was the chief, having been admitted into the King's and Cardinal's Cabinet Council for this affair, and ſtiled in the Cardinal's credential letters to the Pope, Primary Secretary of the moſt ſecret Counſels. He was grown into extraordinary requeſt with the Cardinal, in ſo much, that in his ſaid letters, he called Gardiner the half of himſelf, than whom none was dearer to him. He writ, that he ſhould unlock his breaſt to the Pope; and that in hearing him ſpeak, he might think he heard the Cardinal himſelf. The particulars of this embaſſy, of which I have the very minutes, in divers letters ſent to the King and Cardinal, I will give ſome account of, eſpecially of ſuch things, as the Lord Herbert, or the Right Reverend Author of the Hiſtory of the Reformation, have made no mention of, or but briefly and imperfectly.' He proceeds then to ſhew from theſe papers, that when the Pope intimated to Dr Gardiner, that he underſtood this proceeding was not managed with Cardinal Wolſey's conſent; and that he had likewiſe heard ſome ſtrange things of the Lady intended for the King's bed; the Doctor thereupon, in the name, and by the authority of the Cardinal, who had been acquainted with this before he left England, demonſtrated to him the falſity of thoſe ſuggeſtions, and what the Cardinal's real ſentiments were in both points (17); and that the reader may have no doubts, as to the relator's capacity in ſtating theſe matters, he has printed ſeveral letters from the originals, which very fully juſtify all that is ſaid of them; and ſhew the Cardinal was, hitherto at leaſt, diſpoſed to ſerve his maſter as far as he could.

own, had procured for him the ſuffrages of one third part of the Cardinals, orders were ſent them immediately, to cauſe thoſe Cardinals to withdraw to a place of ſafety, in caſe the Conclave appeared more inclined to any other, and there to declare him Pope, aſſuring them they ſhould be moſt vigorouſly ſuſtained by King Henry and his allies. No doubt the pains taken in this buſineſs muſt have been highly pleaſing to the Cardinal, though, after all, the deſign came to nothing; for when Wolſey had ſhewn his utmoſt ſtrength, and procured from the King very liberal marks of eſteem for the Cardinals of his faction, Clement VII. recovered, and things once more returned to their old ſtate (r). All imaginable care was taken to have the new commiſſion penned to the King's mind, which, not without much difficulty, was obtained; and then it was to be carried from Orvieto to Rome, to paſs through the neceſſary forms requiſite to render it authentick. This being alſo an affair of nicety, and the diſpoſing Cardinal Campegio to make a tour to England with a good will, requiring ſome extraordinary management, Dr Gardiner took it upon himſelf, after having procured whatever was requiſite for his negotiation, and put every thing neceſſary to ſet this in a proper light at home into the hands of his colleague (s). Upon this, Provoſt Fox was ſent home with a full account of their negotiation, with which the King, the Cardinal, and Mrs Anne Bullen, were equally pleaſed, and unanimouſly joined in applauding the induſtry, intrepidity, and ingenuity, of this new Miniſter, as is inconteſtably proved from the authentick minutes of this negociation, which are, or at leaſt very lately were, ſtill preſerved and in being [F]. The King, indeed, had the beſt reaſon to be ſatisfied, ſince Dr Gardiner dealt clearly with him, and ſhewed him plainly there was nothing to be obtained by ſolliciting at Rome; that the Pope might probably be induced to approve any thing the King could perſuade the Legates to do, but, without queſtion, would never be prevailed on, by hopes or fears, to do any thing himſelf, which, in his judgment, was the final iſſue of all this trouble and ſollicitation (t). Biſhop Burnet is offended with Gardiner for deſiring the King not to ſhew this epiſtle to the Cardinal (u), which, however, might be very conſiſtent with his attachment and regard for his old maſter, ſince, from this caution, it appears he had no ſettled private correſpondence with the King; for then it would have been needleſs, and ſome of the contents, as he was to ſit in judgment in the cauſe, were exceedingly improper for him to have ſeen. The reader will find at the bottom of the page the greateſt part of this letter, which ſhews not barely a ſtrong capacity and a true political genius, but alſo how politely and how correctly he wrote, and that too in language very little antiquated even at this day [G]. [F] Were lately preſerved, and in being.] We learn from the ſame author, and from the ſame authorities, that Fox was moſt joyfully received upon his return, which was in the beginning of the month of May 1529; it was evening when he came to Court, when he was directed to go to Mrs Anne's, that is, Anne Boleyn's chamber, where he firſt made a recital to her, of ſuch points as were fitteſt for that Lady's ear; ſoon after the King came thither, and the Lady being withdrawn, he delivered his Majeſty the letters he had brought, and run into a large and particular detail of the ſeveral ſteps they had taken; all of which he entirely approved and highly admired. After ſome time, he ſent for Mrs Anne back again, and directed ſome paſſages to be repeated in her preſence; then Fox went to the Cardinal, who was no leſs pleaſed with every thing he heard, and particularly with the accounts given him, of Dr Gardiner's juſtifying his colleges to the Pope's ſatisfaction, and making his Holineſs ſenſible, that the revenues of the monaſteries granted for their endowment, were fairly applied. Altogether, made ſuch an impreſſion on the Cardinal's mind, that ſpeaking of Gardiner, he cried out, O ineſtimable treaſure, and jewel of this realm! which exclamation, he deſired Fox to remark, and to inſert in his letter (18). As for Mrs Anne Boleyn, ſhe thought herſelf under ſuch obligations to this able negotiator, that even before Fox's coming, ſhe wrote him the following letter (19), which is not amongſt the papers collected by Strype.

'Mr Stephens, I thank you for my letter, wherein I perceive the willing and faithful mind that you have to do me pleaſure, not doubting, but as much as is poſſible for man's wit to imagine, you will do; I pray God to ſend you well to ſpeed in all your matters, ſo that you would put me to the ſtudy how to reward your high ſervice. I do truſt in God, you ſhall not repent it; and that the end of this journey ſhall be more pleaſant to me, than your firſt, for that was but a rejoicing hope, which ceaſing, the lack of it does put me to the more pain, and they that are partakers with me, as you do know; and therefore I do truſt, that this hard beginning ſhall have the better ending.

'Mr Stephens, I ſend you here cramp rings, for you and Mr Gregory, and Mr Peter, praying you to diſtribute them as you think beſt. And have me recommended heartily to them both, as ſhe that, you may aſſure them, will be glad to do them any pleaſure which ſhall lie in my power. And thus I make an end, praying God ſend you good health. Written at Greenwich, the 4th day of April.'

The firſt part of this letter ſeems to refer to the journey made by Dr Gardiner, from the Pope's court at Orvieto to Rome, in order to quicken the departure of Cardinal Campegio. It is indeed very difficult to ſettle the dates of many letters, written about that time, becauſe ſometimes they have only the month, without either day or year; but more frequently the day and month without the year, which can only be recovered from circumſtances.

[G] Even at this day.] It has been very juſtly obſerved, that the ſureſt method of making a right judgment, as to the capacity of public miniſters, is to conſider their diſpatches; and it is for this reaſon chiefly, that the collections of letters, written by famous men, are ſo highly and ſo deſervedly valued. It is impoſſible for a man with a confuſed head, or of ſuperficial parts, to write clearly and cloſely; theſe are qualities not to be acquired even by a long habit of buſineſs, but are the pure effects of ſuperior talents. There is another remark, that may and ought to be made, upon this curious and important letter of Dr Gardiner's, which is, that ſolid learning enables a man to form a ſtile, very different from that of the age in which he lives; and if the ingenious reader will be pleaſed to compare the following epiſtle, not only with thoſe written about the ſame time, of which numbers are preſerved, by Fox, Hollinſhed, Stow, Fuller, Burnet, Collier, and Strype, but with ſuch as are in the Cabala, and even in later collections, he will find it is written with peculiar elegance and eaſe, and has nothing of that ſtiffneſs or pedantry, which is viſible in many of thoſe compoſitions. It is no exception to this, that

King had conſidered this advice ſufficiently, and ſaw how well it coreſponded with events, he recalled Dr Gardiner from Rome, in order to make uſe of him in the management of his

Gardiner makes uſe therein of ſeveral Latin expreſſions, becauſe of their apparent propriety; and that he was writing to a Prince, not only well verſed in that language, but who valued himſelf upon his learning. It may be alſo obſerved, that he ſhews a hearty and generous concern for Mr Gregory, in which there could be nothing of artifice or colluſion, ſince it is very evident, from the contents of this letter, that he could not have communicated it; as it is likewiſe plain, that, by recommending this gentleman's affairs, when he is abſolutely ſilent as to his own, he meant to render him the greateſt, and moſt effectual ſervice, in his power, which is a ſtrain of friendſhip rare amongſt Politicians (20).

'Pleaſeth it your Majeſty to underſtand, that beſides all other means uſed to the Pope's Holineſs, for attaining and atchieving your Highneſs's purpoſe and intent, ſuch as in our common letters to my Lord Legate's Grace, and my ſeveral letters to the ſame, be contained at length. I have alſo a-part ſhewed unto the Pope's Holineſs, that which your Highneſs ſhewed me in your gallery at Hampton-Court, concerning the ſollicitation of the Princes of Almayn, and ſuch other matter, as ſhould and ought to fear the Pope's ſaid Holineſs, adding alſo, thoſe reaſons which might induce the ſame to adhere expreſsly to your Highneſs, and the French King; and ſo to take the more courage, to accompliſh your Highneſs deſires, uſing all ways poſſible, to enforce him to do ſomewhat, being a man of ſuch nature, as he never reſolveth any thing, but by ſome violent affection compelled thereunto. And conſidering we can ſpeed no better at his hands, it agreeth with that, your Majeſty, of your high wiſdom before perpended, that his Holineſs would do nothing which might offend the Emperor, unleſs he firſt determined himſelf to adhere to your Highneſs, and the French King, and ſo to declare himſelf, containing himſelf no longer in neutrality, which he will not do: nor, the ſtate of the affairs here conſidered, it were for his weal ſo to do, unleſs the Leagues otherwiſe proceeded, than they yet do; or that his Holineſs would determine himſelf to leave theſe parts, and eſtabliſh his See in ſome other place, for as much as here being, he is daily in danger of the Imperial's, like as we have ſignified by our other letters.

'His Holineſs is in great perplexity, and agony of mind, nor can tell what to do; he ſeemeth in words, faſhion, and manner of ſpeaking, as though he would do ſomewhat for your Highneſs, and yet, when it cometh to the point, nothing he doth: I dare not ſay certainly, whether it be for fear, or want of good-will, for I were loth to make a lie of him, or to your Highneſs, my Prince, Sovereign, Lord, and Maſter. Finally, I perceive this by the Pope, and all other here, that ſo your Highneſs cauſe were determined there by my Lords Legates, they would be glad thereof; and as I think, if the Emperor would make any ſuit againſt that which ſhall be done there, they would ſerve him as they now do your Highneſs, and ſo drive off the time; for they ſeem to be ſo minded, as in this cauſe they would ſuffer much, but do very little.

'Wherefore, if my Lord Campegius will ſet a-part all other reſpects, and frankly promiſe your Highneſs to give ſentence for you, then muſt be your Highneſs remedy ſhort and expedite; nor ſhall there want wit by another means, to meet with ſuch delays, as this falſe counterfeit breve hath cauſed. For with theſe men here, your Highneſs ſhall, by no ſuit profit, which thing I write unto your Highneſs, as of my moſt bounden duty I ought to do, there ſhall every day riſe new devices, and none take effect, but long delays and waſted time; wherefore, doing what I can yet to get the beſt, although we be fully anſwered therein, I ſhall do what I can to get the commiſſion amplified as much as may be, and at the leaſt, to extend to the reprobation of the brief if I can, for I dare promiſe nothing to your Majeſty at this man's hands; and that which ſhall be obtained, if any be obtained, ſhall be, according to your Highneſs pleaſure, ſent by Mr Bryan.

'And whereas your Highneſs, in your gracious letters directed to me, and my colleagues, marvelleth that I have not, e're this, advertiſed the ſame, of ſuch Bulls as your Majeſty willed me to impetrate here: I thought verily, that for as much as the ſame be, to be impetrate at the Pope's hand; and that we ſignified unto your Majeſty, by our letters of the Pope's great ſickneſs; and how we could not have acceſs unto the ſame, that it had been ſuperfluous for me in my letters, to make any mention of the ſaid Bulls, ſignifying unto your Highneſs now, that having thoſe matters, as it becometh me to have in good remembrance, I have not yet broken with the Pope's Holineſs in them, nor thought good to interrupt the proſecution of your Highneſs matter, with the purſuit of thoſe, ſaving that I ſpake a word to the Pope's Holineſs, de Eccleſiis Cathedralibus; and his Holineſs ſaid, nothing could be done, till the Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor be recovered.

'In other things I ſpeak not, for our audience with the Pope's Holineſs hath been ſo ſcarce, that we thought it little enough to ſpend the ſame in your Highneſs principal matter. And to advertiſe your Highneſs what Counſel is here conducted, for the defence of your Majeſty's cauſe, the ſame ſhall underſtand, that this court, as it hath ſuffered in all other things, ſo it is alſo much appeyred in learned men; and of them that be, we dare not truſt every one, ne Cauſa Majeſtatis veſtræ illis denudata, they ſhould, prodere illam Adverſariis, wherefore, counſelling as yet only with two, the one called Dominus Michael, the other Dominus Sigiſmundus; we perceived nothing to be ſollicited openly on the other ſide; and that there, as yet, hath been no need to diſpute openly, have communicated your Highneſs matter to no more. And as for that article, Quod Papa non poſſit diſpenſare, the Pope himſelf will hear no diſputations in it; and ſo he might retain your Highneſs good mind, he ſeemeth not to care for himſelf, whether your Highneſs cauſe be decided by that article or no, ſo he did it not; but ſurely it appeareth, as a man may gather, by his faſhion and manner, that he hath made his account no further to meddle in your Highneſs matter, neither with your Majeſty, nor againſt the ſame, but follow, that ſhall be done by his Legates there.

'Wherefore, if my Lord Campegius would promiſe your Majeſty to give ſentence frankly and apertly, having propitium Judice, I would truſt, being there, with ſuch conſultations, as I ſhould bring from hence, to ſay ſomewhat to this breve there, Apud illos & iſta eſt ſacra anchora Majeſtatis veſtræ; for from hence ſhall come nothing but delays, deſiring your Highneſs not to ſhew this to my Lord Campegius, nor my Lord's Grace.

'Mr Gregory ſendeth preſently unto your Highneſs, the promiſe made by the Pope's Holineſs, concerning your Highneſs cauſe, at ſuch time as I went to Venice, for his cauſe, which promiſe in the firſt three words, viz Cum nos juſtitiam ejus cauſæ perpendentes, &c. doth make as much, and more, for the maintenance of that, ſhall be done in your Highneſs cauſe; then if the commiſſion decretal, being in Cardinal Campegius's hands, ſhould be ſhewed, and this your Highneſs, at your liberty, to ſhew to whom of your Council, it ſhall pleaſe your Grace, thinking, in my poor opinion, that it were not the beſt, therefore, to move the Pope in that matter again, in this adverſe time. I moſt humbly deſire your Majeſty, that I may be a ſuitor to the ſame, for the ſaid Mr Gregory, ſo as by your gracious commandment, payment may be made there, to his factors, of ſuch diets as your Highneſs alloweth him; for omitting to ſpeak of his true, faithful, and diligent ſervice, which I have heretofore, and do now perceive in him here, I aſſure your Highneſs, he liveth here ſumptuouſly and chargeably to your Highneſs honour; and in this great ſcarcity, muſt needs his cauſe before the Legantine Court. Upon his return he had the Archdeaconry of Norfolk beſtowed on him by Biſhop Nyx, of Norwich, for whom he had obtained ſome favours from the Pope. He was inſtalled March the firſt 1529 (w), and this, ſo far as appears, was his firſt preferment in the Church; but in the State his growth was quicker, for the King having conſtant need of his ſervice, and not eſteeming it proper to uſe it while he belonged to another, took him from his old Maſter Cardinal Wolſey, and declared him Secretary of State (x). In this ſituation he was conſidered as having a large ſhare in the management of all affairs, and was particularly adviſed with by the King, when Cardinal Campegio declared that the cauſe was avoked to Rome, and that himſelf and his colleague could proceed no farther (y). An accident furniſhed the King with the means of extricating himſelf out of the many difficulties into which this behaviour of the Pope's had thrown him, for which he was indebted to the ſhrewd advice given by Dr (afterwards Archbiſhop) Cranmer (z), as he was indebted for that to Dr Gardiner, who introduced him [H]; and by this, and this only, contributed to his old patron's ruin. As ſoon as the King ſaw a way open for the concluſion of his buſineſs, without the aſſiſtance of the Cardinal, he delayed no longer making himſelf ſenſible of his diſpleaſure. Whence it aroſe, is variouſly and inconſiſtently related by our Hiſtorians; but, without recurring to deep and incertain motives, we may be ſatisfied with this, that when Henry ſaw his Miniſter had either concurred with the Court of Rome in duping him, or was in reality duped moſt ungratefully and egregiouſly by that Court himſelf, he determined to truſt him no longer, but to make him

'be driven to extremity, unleſs your Highneſs be a 'gracious Lord unto him in that behalf.'

This letter is dated the twenty-firſt of April, which muſt have been in the year 1529; but before it came to the King's hands, he had written a long diſpatch to Gardiner, which is ſtill preſerved. The orders for his return to England, were communicated to him, and to Sir Francis Bryan, in a long diſpatch by Cardinal Wolſey, who tells the former, what has been hinted in the text, that his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary at home, the King being unwilling to commence his ſuit before the two Cardinal Legates, without having his advice; and therefore, there is reaſon to believe, that he left Italy ſome time in the month of May, or it may be in the latter end of April (21). He was ſucceeded by Dr Bennet, who was alſo a creature of the Cardinal's, and who was particularly charged to ſpare no pains, in moving the compaſſion of the Pope, by ſhewing him plainly, that the welfare or ruin of the Cardinal of York, depended upon the ſucceſs, or want of ſucceſs, in the King's ſuit for a divorce (22).

[H] Who introduced him.] There are ſome writers, who aſcribe the introduction of Cranmer to the King's knowledge, to Fox entirely; and whoever was inclined to flatter Gardiner's memory, would ſuffer this to paſs; for certainly, the manner in which he introduced him, was very unworthy; Biſhop Burnet, after John Fox and others, relates it thus (23). 'Dr Cranmer, being forced 'to fly out of Cambridge, from a plague that was 'there, and having the ſons of one Mr Creſſy, of 'Waltham Croſ, committed to his charge, he went, 'with his pupils, to their father's houſe at Waltham. 'There he was, when the King returned from his 'progreſs, who took Waltham in his way, and lay a 'night there. The harbingers having appointed Gardiner and Fox, the King's Secretary and Almoner, 'to lie at Mr Creſſy's houſe, it ſo happened, that 'Cranmer was with them at ſupper. The whole diſcourſe of England being then about the divorce, theſe 'two courtiers, knowing Cranmer's learning and ſolid 'judgment, entertained him with it, and deſired to 'hear his opinion concerning it. He modeſtly declined it, but told them, that he judged it would be 'a ſhorter and ſafer way, once to clear it well, if the 'marriage was unlawful in itſelf, by virtue of any 'divine precept: for if that were proved, then it was 'certain that the Pope's diſpenſation could be of no 'force, to make that lawful, which God had declared 'to be unlawful. Therefore, he thought that, inſtead of a long fruitleſs negotiation at Rome, it were 'better to conſult all the learned men, and the univerſities of Chriſtendom; for if they once declared 'it in the King's favour, then the Pope muſt needs 'give judgment, or otherwiſe, the Bull, being of itſelf null and void, the marriage would be found 'ſinful, notwithſtanding the Pope's diſpenſation. This 'ſeemed a very good motion, which they reſolved to 'offer to the King; ſo next night, when he came to 'Greenwich, they propoſed it to him, but with this 'difference, that Gardiner had a mind to make it paſs 'for their own contrivance, but Fox, who was of a 'more ingenuous nature, told the King from whom 'they had it. He was much affected with it, ſo ſoon 'as he heard it, and ſaid, had he known it ſooner, 'it would have ſaved him a vaſt expence, and much 'trouble, and would needs have Cranmer ſent for to 'Court, ſaying, in his coarſe way of ſpeaking, That 'he had the ſow by the right ear. So he was ſent for 'to Court, and being brought before the King, he 'carried himſelf ſo, that the King conceived an high 'opinion of his judgment and candour, which he preſerved to his death, and ſtill payed a reſpect to 'him, beyond all the other churchmen that were 'about him; and though he made more uſe of Gardiner in his buſineſs, whom he found a man of great 'dexterity and cunning, yet he never had any reſpect 'for him. But for Cranmer, though the King knew 'that in many things he differed from him, yet for 'all his being ſo impatient of contradiction, he always 'reverenced him.'

This laſt obſervation of the Biſhop's, is, perhaps, a little too refined, ſince it was impoſſible to know what were the real ſentiments of King Henry, farther than they are diſcovered to us by facts; and theſe ſpeak pretty equally in favour of Cranmer and Gardiner. They were both countenanced, employed, and preferred, and both were ſometimes checked and frowned upon by their maſter; he had this in his temper, which no body better underſtood than Gardiner, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. They were both guilty of inexcuſable compliances, to preſerve their credit with that haughty and haſty Prince, which Cranmer did to the laſt; and how Gardiner came to loſe it we ſhall enquire. At preſent, it may be convenient to give ſome account of what is aſſerted in the text, that the bringing Cranmer to the King, proved Wolſey's ruin, as to which, it muſt be confeſſed, that our hiſtories are ſilent, but it appears thus. All the world expected his diſgrace, upon the avocation of the King's ſuit to Rome, which, however, did not happen; and Biſhop Burnet very well obſerves, that the Cardinal himſelf began to be cured of his apprehenſions, when he ſaw that the King's countenance was not altered towards him; and that thoſe who were moſt familiar with that Monarch, preſerved their reſpect to him. But when, to uſe the King's coarſe expreſſion, he had once got the ſow by the right ear, he no longer temporized with the Cardinal, but ordered his Attorney-General, Chriſtopher Hales, to file an information againſt him in Michaelmas-term; ſent for the Great Seal, and ordered him to retire to his houſe at Aſher, which belonged to his Biſhoprick of Wincheſter. It is therefore plain, from a compariſon of dates, and of facts, that the King's receiving and embracing Cranmer's counſels, was the true ſource of the Cardinal's diſgrace, the King being then perſuaded, that he had no farther need of him.

him in ſome meaſure the victim that might ſatiate popular reſentment, and ſtifle thoſe clamours raiſed amongſt his ſubjects in different parts of the kingdom (a). This tempeſt broke with ſuch fury on the head of this devoted Miniſter, that his miſery became as much the ſubject of amazement, as his proſperity had ever been. In this diſtreſs he had recourſe to his old ſervant the Secretary, and, though ſome have inſinuated the contrary, he met with as ſincere returns of gratitude and friendſhip, as he could deſire or expect [I]. [I] As he could deſire or expect.] There is a great deal to be met with in ſecret hiſtory, in relation to the fall of Cardinal Wolſey, as well as of the ſtrange calamities into which he fell; and his misfortunes are, by many, attributed to the reſentment of Mrs Anne Boleyn, which, however, there is ſome cauſe to doubt. Great Miniſters have always bitter enemies, who earneſtly wiſh, and would willingly work, their deſtruction; but it does not follow from thence, that they accompliſh what they have wiſhed and worked for, even when it falls out; for it may and often does happen, from other ſecret cauſes, in reſpect to which, they have no power, and of which, ſometimes, they have not the leaſt knowledge. It has been ſhewn, in the former note, that the King thought he had no farther need of this Miniſter; and whoever looks cloſely into the hiſtory of Henry the Eighth, will perceive that it was his ruling maxim, to promote men whom he might uſe, to protect them while he could uſe, and to give them up when they were of no further uſe. He was not entirely ſatisfied, that the deſtruction of Wolſey's perſon could promote his deſigns, and therefore he ſpared him; and as he ſaw further, that the fall of his Miniſter, would be conſidered as a point of importance in other kingdoms, as well as his own; he was willing to ſee how far the Cardinal's intereſt reached, and whether the Court of Rome, for which he had done ſo much, might not be inclined to do ſomething for him; and this induced the King to take ſo much care of his life, when, through the agitation of his ſpirits, he fell into a dangerous illneſs at Aſher (24).

(24) He ſent his own Phyſician, Dr Butts, to attend him, and by him ſent kind meſſages and preſents.

It is very rare in ſuch caſes, for Miniſters to find friends, more eſpecially amongſt thoſe, who, in point of fortune, depend upon the maſter with whom they are in diſgrace. Thomas Cromwell, then Secretary to the Cardinal, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by adhering ſteadily to his maſter, and ſoliciting ſtoutly for him at Court; in reſpect to this, all our hiſtories agree, and commend him for it, as he deſerved. But they do not tell us, to whom he applied himſelf at Court, though at that time, he was not of a rank to have any admittance to the King, though his conduct, in this reſpect, recommended him afterwards to his favour, as a man of abilities, ſpirit, and fidelity. Dr Gardiner was then Secretary of State, in the King's Council, and one of his moſt active Miniſters. To ſay nothing of his having been bred and raiſed by Cardinal Wolſey, the then ſtate of affairs, and the ſituation of that once great man, were points that muſt have fallen under his notice; and whoever had an inclination to look into his hiſtory, muſt neceſſarily be curious to know how he acted in ſo delicate a conjuncture; and whether ambition, and ſelf-intereſt, ſo much took up his heart, as to leave no room for gratitude or pity. It might have been ſurmiſed, that conſidering his former condition, and his ſtation at this time, that he was the perſon to whom Cromwell had recourſe, in favour of his unfortunate maſter, that he ſollicited his ſuits, and procured him thoſe gleams of royal clemency and compaſſion, that broke through all the obſcurity of his misfortunes, to a degree, that revived the envy and the malice of his enemies. But the ſilence of our greateſt Hiſtorians, and the character commonly given to Stephen Gardiner, would have prevented any conjecture of this kind, from gaining the leaſt degree of belief. However, the indefatigable Strype (25), who had no talent for inventing or interpolating hiſtory, and who very honeſtly communicated to the public all he knew, has effectually ſettled this matter; and the reader will be pleaſed to ſee a part of his evidence in his own words, founded not upon obſcure hints, or upon memoirs of incertain authority; but upon Cardinal Wolſey's own letters; and facts, that will admit no diſpute.

(25) Memorials, Vol. I. p. 114.

'In the mean time, he employed thoſe few friends 'he had, to intercede with the King, and to make as 'good a concluſion of his troubles as they could. He 'had two that ſtuck cloſe to him, viz. the aforeſaid 'Thomas Cromwell, and Dr Stephen Gardiner, Se'cretary of State. This latter he plied with his let'ters, the bearer whereof was Cromwell, whom he 'called his truſty friend. After he had got free of the 'articles drawn up againſt him in Parliament, by the 'means of Cromwell, the King appointed, to come to 'ſome concluſion of the Cardinal's buſineſs, and to 'determine what was to be done concerning him. 'This Secretary Gardiner ſignified to him in writing, 'and likewiſe the time when he ſuppoſed it might be, 'namely, within a week, or thereabouts: and like'wiſe told him, that he would not fail to write to him 'the particulars. The Cardinal impatient to know 'the iſſue, and not thinking the Secretary ſwift enough 'in his information, above a week being now paſt, 'could take no reſt till he heard from him the ſum of 'what had paſt concerning him. And therefore in a 'letter ſent by Cromwell, moſt earneſtly begs the Se'cretary in much meanneſs of ſpirit, As he tendered 'his poor life, and at the reverence of God, and that 'holy time, he would ſend him his letter, appealing alſo 'to his pity, knowing in what an agony he was, and 'that he would not only deſerve towards God, but bind 'him thereby to be his continual beadſman. And ſo 'ended from Aſher. Written, thoſe are his words, 'with his rude hand and ſorrowful heart. Subſcrib'ing himſelf T. Carlis Ebor. miſerrimus, The moſt 'miſerable Thomas, Cardinal of York. This was 'written in Chriſtmas holidays.

'Soon after Cromwell returned from the Secretary 'with this meſſage to the Cardinal. That the King 'moved with pity of the Cardinal, and commiſerating 'his lamentable condition, preſt with extreme poverty 'as well as ſickneſs of body and mind, had committed 'the ending of his troubles to the Secretary, and ſome 'others of the Privy Council, and that to be done with 'all the haſte that might be. And that he ſhould have 'a pardon drawn up in the moſt full and ample form, 'that his own Counſel could deviſe. Upon this meſ'ſage he ſoon diſpatched a letter to the Secretary, im'porting, that this favourable order of the King, he 'was more ſenſible of and thankful for, becauſe it pro'ceeded from himſelf, out of a gracious remembrance 'of him: for which he accounted himſelf moſt bounden, 'to ſerve and pray for the preſervation of his moſt 'royal Majeſty: thanking God, that he, the Secre'tary, had occaſion given him to be a ſollicitor and ſet'ter forth of ſuch things, as ſhould conſerve his end. 'That in the making and compounding whereof, his 'aſſured truſt was, that he would ſhew the love and 'affection which he bore towards him. He earneſtly 'intreated him, to whom he, the Cardinal, had been 'an old lover and friend, that he would ſo declare 'himſelf in the managing of his buſineſs, that the 'world might perceive that by his good means, the King 'was the better good Lord unto him; and that now 'coming newly in a manner into the world, there might 'ſuch reſpect be had unto his degree, old age, and long 'ſervice, as might be to the King's honour, and the Secretary's praiſe; which would, as he ſaid, un'doubtedly follow, if he obtained his benevolence to'wards him. And men would perceive, that it was 'by his wiſdom and dexterity, that he was relieved and 'holpen in his calamity. At the reverence therefore of 'God, he prayed him that was his refuge, to ſet to his 'hand, that he might come to a laudable end and re'poſe. And that he would ſee that he might be fur'niſhed after ſuch a ſort, that he might end his ſhort 'time and life to the honour of Chriſt's Church and 'his Prince. Promiſing withal to requite his kindneſs 'in ſuch a manner, as he ſhould have cauſe to think his 'pains to be well employed. And ſo referring him to 'his truſty friend Cromwell, to whom he deſired him to 'give firm credence, he concluded, at Aſher with the 'trembling hand and heavy heart, of his aſſured lover year enſuing opened with the moſt important ſervice, at leaſt as his Maſter conceived it, that had been as yet rendered him by Dr Gardiner, and which nevertheleſs does more honour to his abilities than his virtue; and this was to manage the Univerſity of Cambridge, ſo as to procure their declaration in the King's cauſe, after Dr Cranmer's book ſhould appear in ſupport of it (b). This, in conjunction with Dr Fox, he accompliſhed, tho' not without much artifice and addreſs, as his own letter ſhews [K], which ſufficiently demonſtrates that men, and even great bodies of men, have been much the ſame in all ages. ' and beadſman ——Soon after, viz. February the ' twelfth, the King ſealed his pardon, and three days af- ' ter reſtored him the Archbiſhoprick of York, and ſent ' him money, upwards of ſix thouſands pounds, beſides ' plate, and furniture for his houſe and chapel. Which ' favours pretty well recovered the Cardinal, while ' he remained ſtill at Aſher, and by the King's leave ' removed thence to Richmond.

' But his enemies now thought him too near the ' Court: ſo they prevailed to get him removed to his ' Dioceſe of York. In the month of September Anno ' 1530, he came to Cawood-caſtle near York, ſo the ' Lord Herbert (26); but before he came hither, I ' find him in the months of July and Auguſt at South- ' well (27), a manor of the Archbiſhop's, where he ' made ſome ſtay. Here the Cardinal recommended ' unto the Secretary, one who had the title of Provoſt ' of Beverley, the Governor of a religious houſe, ſitu- ' ated in his Dioceſe. His ſtate, it ſeems, was in ſome ' hazard. Whereupon the Cardinal eſpouſing his ' cauſe, and probably to make himſelf popular upon ' his firſt coming into his Dioceſe, deſired the Secre- ' tary that he would uſe his intereſt for him to the ' King, and bring him into his preſence. This the ' Secretary did accordingly, receiving the Provoſt as ' coming from the Cardinal, humanely and lovingly, ' and introducing him into the King's Highneſs pre- ' ſence. Whom the King received, and ſhewed him, ' that he was his good and gracious Lord, and admitted ' and accepted him as his Orator and Scholar. For this ' the Cardinal from Southwell thanks him much, in- ' treating him to continue his good favour towards the ' ſaid Provoſt, and to take him into his patronage and ' protection. The Cardinal now found a great change ' in his revenues and incomes, which were ſinking ' very low, in compariſon of what they had been. So ' that he laboured under want. This made him write ' in the month of July to his friend the Secretary, to ' take the opportunity to excite the King to ſome libe- ' rality towards him That he would remember the poor ' ſtate and condition he ſtood in, and to be a means to the ' King's Highneſs for his relief; whereby he would not ' only as he ſaid, deſerve thanks of God, but alſo declare ' to his perpetual laud and praiſe, that he being in au- ' thority, had not forgotten his old maſter and friend.' This is all the language of thoſe times and of thoſe letters, much more to the ſame purpoſe the reader may find in the ſame place; but this being enough to our point, we ſhall not detain him any longer.

[K] As his own letter ſhews.] We are told by the Lord Herbert of Cherbury (28), who had read this letter, and had a very juſt notion of the buſineſs, and of the means by which it was carried, what the reaſons were, that occaſioned the King more trouble in obtaining the declarations of his own Univerſities in his favour, than of many others in foreign parts, and more eſpecially of the difficulties that were met with at Cambridge He ſays, that there were two parties in the Univerſity, that united together in oppoſing the King's deſire; that is, thoſe who were really againſt the divorce, as a thing they apprehended to be unjuſt; and thoſe, who, independent of that motive, were zealous for the Popiſh religion, and diſliked whatever had a tendency to promote the Reformation, or, as it was ſtiled in thoſe times, the new opinions. The reaſon that the latter party were ſo much alarmed, was, becauſe they ſaw thoſe they oppoſed, with Cranmer at their head, eager for this declaration; and the ſtrength theſe united parties had in the Univerſity, being well known to Cranmer, we need not at all wonder, that the King was ſo uneaſy about it; or that he conſidered the ſervice in procuring it, even in the manner it was procured, as a thing of the greateſt conſequence. Let us now come to the letter (29), which will ſhew, that the King had intruſted his concerns in the hands of very capable agents.

February 1530, from Cambridge.

To the King's Highneſs.

' PLeaſeth it your Highneſs to be advertiſed, that ' arriving here at Cambridge upon Saturday laſt ' paſt at noon, that ſame night and Sunday in the ' morning, we deviſed with the Vice-Chancellor, and ' ſuch other as favoureth your Grace's cauſe, how, and ' in what ſort to compaſs and obtain your Grace's pur- ' poſe and intent, wherein we aſſure your Grace, we ' found much towardneſs, good-will, and diligence in ' the Vice-Chancellor, and Dr Edmunds; being as ſtu- ' dious to ſerve your Grace as we could wiſh or deſire: ' nevertheleſs, there was not ſo much care, labour, ' ſtudy, and diligence employed on our party by them, ' ourſelf, and other, for attaining your Grace's pur- ' poſe, but there was as much done by others, for the ' let and impeachment of the ſame; and as we aſſem- ' bled, they aſſembled; as we made friends, they ' made friends, to let that nothing ſhould paſs as in the ' Univerſity's name, wherein the firſt day they were ' ſuperiors; for they had put in the ears of them, by ' whoſe voices ſuch things do paſs multas fabulas, too ' tedious to write unto your Grace.

' Upon Sunday at afternoon were aſſembled, after ' the manner of the Univerſity, all the Doctors, Ba- ' chelors of Divinity, and Maſters of Art, being in ' number almoſt two hundred: in that congregation we ' delivered your Grace's letters, which were read ' openly by the Vice-Chancellor. And for anſwer to ' be made unto them firſt, the Vice-Chancellor calling ' apart the Doctors, aſked their advice and opinion; ' whereunto they anſwered ſeverally as their affections ' led them, & res erat in multa confuſione.

' Tandem they were content. Anſwer ſhould be made ' to the queſtions by indifferent men: but then they ' came to exceptions againſt the Abbot of St Benet's, ' who ſeemed to come for that purpoſe; and likewiſe ' againſt Dr Reppes and Dr Crome, and alſo generally ' againſt all ſuch as had allowed Dr Cranmer's book; ' inaſmuch as they had already declared their opinion; ' we ſaid thereunto, that by that reaſon they might ' except againſt all; for it was lightly, that in a queſ- ' tion ſo notable as this is, every man learned hath ' ſaid to his friend, as he thinketh in it for the time, ' but we ought not to judge of any man, that he ſetteth ' more to defend that which he hath once ſaid, than ' truth afterward known. Finally; The Vice-Chan- ' cellor, becauſe the day was much ſpent in thoſe al- ' tercations, commanding every man to reſort to his ' ſeat apart, as the manner is in thoſe aſſemblies, ' willed every man's mind to be known ſecretly, whe- ' ther they would be content with ſuch an order, as ' he had conceived for anſwer, to be made by the ' Univerſity to your Grace's letters, wherunto that ' night they would in no wiſe agree. And foraſmuch ' as it was then dark night, the Vice-Chancellor con- ' tinued the congregation till the next day at one of the ' clock; at which time the Vice-Chancellor proponed ' a grace, after the form herein incloſed, and it was ' firſt denied: when it was aſked again, it was even ' on both parties, to be denied or granted; and at the ' laſt, by labour of friends, to cauſe ſome to depart ' the houſe, which were againſt it, it was obtained in ' ſuch form, as the ſchedule herein encloſed purport- ' eth, wherein be two points which we would have ' left out; but conſidering, by putting in of them, we ' allured many, and that indeed they ſhall not hurt ' the determination for your Grace's part, we were fi- ' nally content therewith.

' The one point is that where it was firſt, that quic- ' quid major pars, of them that be named, decreverit, ' ſhould be taken for the determination of the Univer- ' ſity. Now it referred, ad duas partes, wherein we ' ſuppoſe ſhall be no difficulty. The other point is, ' that your Grace's queſtion ſhall be openly diſputed,

After this great exploit, as it was then thought, his aſcent in the Church was marvellouſly quickened. In the ſpring of the year 1531, he was inſtalled Archdeacon of Leiceſter (c), reſigning that of Norfolk, which he held before; and, towards the cloſe of the month of September enſuing, he alſo reſigned that in favour of his coadjutor Dr Edward Fox, who became afterwards Biſhop of Hereford (d). In the month of October he was incorporated at the Univerſity of Oxford (e), and November the twenty-ſeventh 1531, he was conſecrated Biſhop of Wincheſter (f), contrary to what many writers aſſert, that he was not promoted to this See till about three years after (g). On the fifth of December following, the temporalities were reſtored (h), which is a ſufficient proof that the former is the right date. Dr Gardiner, it ſeems, was not appriſed of the King's intentions, who would ſometimes rate him ſoundly, and at the inſtant he beſtowed it put him in mind of it. I have, ſaid he, often ſquar'd with you, Gardiner (a word he uſed for thoſe kind of rebukes), but I love you never the worſe, as the Biſhoprick I give will convince you (i). He ſat with Dr Cranmer, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, when that prelate pronounced the ſentence of divorce againſt Queen Katherine, or rather declared her marriage with the King null and void, May the twenty-third 1533 (k). The ſame year he was ſent over to Marſeilles, that he might have an eye to the interview between the French King and the Pope, from whence his maſter ſuſpected ſome detriment might ſpring; and there he intimated the appeal of Henry VIII. to a General Council, in caſe the Pope ſhould pretend to proceed in his cauſe (l); and he did the like on the behalf of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who made a particular application to him for that purpoſe [L]. Upon his return to England, he was

And becauſe Mr Doctor Clyſs ' hath ſaid, that he hath ſomewhat to ſay concerning ' the Canon Law, I, your Secretary, ſhall be adjoin- ' ed unto them for anſwer to be made therein.

' In the ſchedule, which we ſend unto your Grace ' herewith, containing the names of thoſe who ſhall ' determine your Grace's queſtion, all marked with the ' letter (A), be already of your Grace's opinion, by ' which we truſt, and with other good means, to in- ' duce and obtain a great part of the reſt. [L] To him for that purpoſe.] We have this paſſage, together with the Archbiſhop's letter, from an unexceptionable author, who, having mentioned this interview, proceeds thus (30), ' Gardiner, Biſhop of ' Winton, about this time, and upon this occaſion, ' was ſent Ambaſſador to the French King, and Bonner ' ſoon after followed him to Marſeilles, where Gardi- ' ner, at the interview between the French King and ' the Pope, now was. For the King, and the Coun- ' cil, apprehended ſome miſchief to be hatching againſt ' the kingdom by the Pope, who was now inciting the ' Emperor, and other Princes, to make war upon us. ' And indeed he had vaunted, as the Lord Herbert de- ' clares, that he would ſet all Chriſtendom againſt the ' King. And the Emperor, in diſcourſe, had averred, ' that, by the means of Scotland, he would avenge his ' aunt's quarrel. The Archbiſhop, in this juncture, ' had ſecret intimation of a deſire to excommunicate ' him, and interdict his Church. Whereupon, as the ' King, by Bonner, November the ſeventh, had made ' his appeal from the Pope to the next General Council, ' lawfully called, ſo by the King and Council's advice ' the Archbiſhop ſoon after did the ſame: ſending his ' appeal with his proxy, under his ſeal, to Bonner, de- ' ſiring him, together with Gardiner, to conſult to- ' gether, and to intimate his appeal in the beſt man- ' ner they could think expedient for him. And this ' letter he wrote by the King's own commandment. ' It was not the hand of the Archbiſhop, nor of his Se- ' cretary. So I ſuppoſe it was drawn up by ſome of his ' own lawyers, and is as followeth.

(30) Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. 22.

In my right hearty manner I commend me to you. So it is, as you know right well, I ſtand in dread, leaſt our Holy Father, the Pope, do intend to make ſome manner of prejudicial proceſs againſt me and my Church. And therefore, having probable conjectures thereof, I have appealed from his Holineſs to the General Council, accordingly as his Highneſs, and his Council, have adviſed me was called upon, as other Biſhops were, not only to acknowledge and yield obedience to the King as Supreme Head of the Church, but to defend it; which he did, and this defence, or court ſermon, he publiſhed; and this is that celebrated piece of his, intituled, Of true Obedience. His pen was made uſe of upon other occaſions, and never declined vindicating the King's proceedings in the buſineſs of the divorce, the ſubſequent marriage, or throwing off the dominion of the See of Rome, which writings of his then acquired him the higheſt reputation (m). In the next year 1535, he had ſome diſpute with Archbiſhop Cranmer, on account of his viſiting his dioceſe; upon which occaſion there appeared a good deal of heat on both ſides (n). When he went over again to France, to reſume his embaſſy, he had the ill luck to differ with another Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as he afterwards became, Dr Reginald Pole, then Dean of Exeter, whom, as King Henry's bittereſt enemy, he prevailed on the French King to remove out of his dominions, whence thoſe diſtaſtes grew which afterwards became publick (o). While he was thus employed, Cromwell demanded his opinion about a religious league with the Princes of Germany; which, on that bottom, he diſſuaded, and adviſed making an alliance grounded on political motives, and ſtrengthened by ſubſidies, which he thought would laſt longer, and anſwer the King's ends better (p). In 1538, he was ſent Ambaſſador, with Sir Henry Knevit, to the German Diet, where he is allowed to have acquitted himſelf well in regard to his commiſſion; but either fell into ſome ſuſpicion, or was in danger of having ſomething faſtened on him, in reſpect to his ſecret correſpondence with the Pope, which at that juncture might have been his ruin (q) [M]. His being ſo often, and ſo much, abſent from the Court, as it gave him a great knowledge of foreign affairs, ſo it kept him from having any hand in ſeveral tranſactions which did no great honour to that reign, ſuch as the divorce and death of Queen Anne Bolleyn, the proſecution of Sir Thomas More, and bringing Biſhop Fiſher to the block: It is however aſſerted, that tho' he was clear of theſe, yet he inſtigated other ſeverities, and was the principal author of all the cruelties committed upon Hereticks, as they were then called; which, being a matter of great conſequence, the reader may expect ſhould be more clearly diſcuſſed. The only way of doing this, will be to conſider a few of thoſe ſanguinary proceedings, in which he is ſaid to have had the chief hand; for this will ſhew us what credit is due to the general ſuggeſtion, that perſecution was the great object of his counſels. Amongſt theſe, the firſt that occurs is the caſe of Lambert (r), who was burnt for denying the Real Preſence in the Sacrament, and which is commonly attributed to the virulent ſpirit of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and with what reaſon the reader will diſcover in the notes [N]. me to do. Which my appeal, and procuracie, under my ſeal, I do ſend unto you, herewith deſiring you right-heartily to have me commended to my Lord of Wincheſter, and, with his advice and counſel, to intimate the ſaid provocation, after the beſt manner that his Lordſhip and you ſhall think moſt expedient for me. I am the bolder thus to write unto you, becauſe the King's Highneſs commandeth me thus to do, as you ſhall, I truſt further, perceive by his Grace's letter: nothing doubting in your goodneſs, but, at this mine own deſire, you will be contented to take this pains, though his Highneſs ſhall percaſe forget to write unto you therein. Which your pains and kindneſs, if it ſhall lie in me in time to come to recompence, I wol not forget it with God's grace. Who preſerve you, as well as myſelf. From Lambeth the twenty-ſeventh day of November.

THOMAS Cantuar.

[M] Might have been his ruin.] We have this ſtory thus told by Mr Strype (31). 'About the year '1538, a Diet was held at Ratiſbone, whither King 'Henry ſent Biſhop Gardiner and Sir Henry Knevit, 'his joint Ambaſſadors: where alſo was Contarini, a 'Legate from the Pope. This Legate brought letters 'from the Pope to Wincheſter, and, going away ſuddenly, deſired an Italian Merchant, named Lodovico, 'to go to Wincheſter, and to haſten his anſwer to the 'Pope's pacquet, for that the carrier was ready to depart in a day or two. This Lodovico ſoon after 'meeting one Wolf, Steward to Sir Henry Knevit, 'prayed him that he would tell the Engliſh Ambaſſador what the Legate deſired. Wolf told him there 'were two Ambaſſadors, and aſked him which. He 'ſaid he knew not that: but he ſaid it was a Biſhop, 'whom he ſtiled Reverendiſſimo. This, Wolf diſcovered to Mr Chaloner, Sir Henry Knevit's Secretary. 'And him Wolf carried to Lodovico, that there might 'be another witneſs beſides himſelf; and then pumped 'him ſo in Chaloner's company, that he again ſpake 'of it. This whole matter was fully related by theſe 'two perſons to Knevit. And he ſent ſecret notice of 'it to the King. The King thought fit, at that time, 'to put it up, and ſent word to Knevit and the Biſhop, 'who had words together about this, that they ſhould 'both unite and mind his buſineſs.'

(31) Memorials, Vol. III. p. 274.

This was Sir Henry Knevit's explanation of the matter; but the Biſhop of Wincheſter gave it quite another turn, he ſaid that there was poiſon in his diſh, which he explained by ſuggeſting that Lodovico was ſuborned to ſet this ſtory on foot, of which he complained to the Emperor, and the man was impriſoned. All our Hiſtories of Henry VIII, forbid us to believe that he would wink at a miniſter's betraying him; it is much more probable, that he underſtood the thing thoroughly, and adviſed his miniſters wiſely to make uſe of the keenneſs of their wits in the diſcharge of their duty, and not to the prejudice of each other. But tho' this tale was harmleſs in one reign, it proved hurtful in another; one who owed his bread and being to the Biſhop, and who came to the knowledge of it by being his Secretary, gave it in evidence when the Protector firſt picked, and thoſe who came after maintained, a quarrel with the Biſhop of Wincheſter, in the time of Edward VI (32); and this has very unaccountably helped it to credit ever ſince, tho' ſurely ſuſpicions ſlighted by King Henry deſerve none; had there been any thing in it, he would not have been afterwards employed in affairs of the greateſt importance, both foreign and domeſtick.

(32) In the evidence at what is called the Biſhop's Trial when deprived.

[N] In the notes.] It is allowed on all hands, that the caſe of this unfortunate perſon, was, in all reſpects, the moſt extraordinary that happened throughout this reign, in which there were ſo many, and ſuch ſtrange, proſecutions. Let us hear the account that Biſhop Burnet gives of it (33). 'One John Nicholſon, alias 'Lambert, was then queſtioned by the Archbiſhop of 'Canterbury. He had been Miniſter of the Engliſh 'company at Antwerp, where, being acquainted with 'Tindal and Frith, he improved that knowledge of 'Religion which was firſt infuſed in him by Bilney: 'but Chancellor More ordered the Merchants to diſmust be owned was the law on which many were put to death, is attributed to his contrivance, and said to have been passed by his influence, having been warmly opposed, both by the Archbishop, and the Vicegerent Cromwell (s); but those who alledge he had no credit with the King, and was little beloved by the people, cannot expect an implicite faith to attend such an assertion. That he was principally concerned in drawing it, and that he was very earnest in promoting it in the House of Lords, in conjunction with the Duke of Norfolk, and other Lords Spiritual and Temporal, those must have but little knowledge in English History who will attempt to deny. It was not long after this, that Robert Barnes (t) fell under persecution, and, in the issue, was condemned to be burnt; who, becaufe

'miss him; so he came over to England, and was 'taken by some of Archbishop Warham's officers, and 'many articles were objected to him. But Warham 'died soon after, and the change of Councils that fol-'lowed, occasioned his liberty. So he kept a school 'at London, and hearing Dr Taylor afterwards preach 'of the presence of Christ in the Sacrament, he came 'to him upon it, and offered his reasons why he could 'not believe the doctrine he had preached: which he 'put in writing, digesting them into ten arguments. 'Taylor shewed this to Dr Barnes, who, as he was 'bred among the Lutherans, so had not only brought 'over their opinions, but their temper with him: he 'thought that nothing would more obstruct the pro-'gress of the Reformation, than the venting that doc-'trine in England. Therefore Taylor and he carried 'the paper to Cranmer, who was at that time also of 'Luther's opinion, which he had drunk in from his 'friend Osiander. Latimer was of the same belief. 'So Lambert was brought before them, and they stu-'died to make him retract his paper: but all was in 'vain, for Lambert, by a fatal resolution, appealed to 'the King. This Gardiner laid hold on, and persuad-'ed the King to proceed solemnly and severely in it. 'The King was soon prevailed with, and both interest 'and vanity concurred to make him improve this op-'portunity for shewing his zeal and learning. So let-'ters were written to many of the Nobility and Bishops 'to come and see this trial, in which the King intend-'ed to sit in person, and to manage some part of the 'argument. In November, on the day that was pre-'fixed, there was a great appearance in Westminster-'Hall, of the Bishops and Clergy, the Nobility, Judges, 'and the King's Council, with an incredible number of 'spectators. The King's guards were all in white, and 'so was the cloth of state.'

All this is taken upon the credit of Fox, who likewise informs us, that, as Lambert had advanced ten (34) arguments in defence of his opinion, the King resolved that these should be answered by ten Bishops, appointing Cranmer to solve the first of Lambert's objections, which was, The impossibility of Christ's body being in two places; and Fox makes it a great crime in the Bishop of Winchester, that he interposed to assist Cranmer in the debate; however, the King himself had the greatest share in the triumph, for he so affrighted the poor man with the sternness of his looks, and the roughness of his language, that, at length, wearied out with the debate, he said, he would submit himself to the King's clemency; upon which Henry ordered the Lord Cromwell, as his Vicegerent, to read the sentence by which this tragedy was ended, Lambert being appointed to die on the ninth of October 1538. Fox says, that, in the morning before he suffered, he was carried to the Lord Cromwell's house, who most humbly asked him forgiveness.

(34) Acts and Monuments, Vol. II. p. 396.

Another writer, no way inclined to favour Popery or Bishop Gardiner, gives quite another turn to this whole affair, for he represents it thus (35). 'John Lambert, 'alias Nicholson, bred in Cambridge, had lately been 'much persecuted by Archbishop Warham, about some 'opinions he held against the corporal presence in the 'Sacrament. And now being fallen into fresh troubles 'on the same account, to make the quicker work (fol-'lowing the precedent of St Paul appealing to Cæsar) 'he appeals to the King. Who having lately taken 'upon him the title of the Supreme Head of the Church 'of England, would shew that head had a tongue could 'speak in matters of Divinity. In Whitehall the place 'and day is appointed where an Act Royal was kept, 'the King himself being the Apponent and Lambert the 'Answerer; and where his Highness was worsted or 'wearied, Archbishop Cranmer supplied his place, ar-'guing, tho' civilly, shrewdly against the truth and 'his own private judgment. Was not this worse than 'keeping the cloaths of those who killed St Stephen, 'seeing this Archbishop did actually cast stones at this 'Martyr, in the arguments he urged against him? Nor 'will it excuse Cranmer's cowardice and dissimulation, 'to accuse Gardiner's craft and cruelty, who privily 'put the Archbishop on this odious act; such Christian 'courage being justly expected from a person of his 'parts and place, as not to be acted by another con-'trary to his own conscience. I see not, therefore, 'what can be said in Cranmer's behalf; save only, that 'I verily hope, and stedfastly believe, that he craved 'God's pardon for this particular offence, and obtain-'ed the same on his unfeigned repentance. And be-'cause that mens faults are commonly seen in the glass 'of their punishment, it is observable, that as Lambert 'now was burnt for denying the corporal presence, so 'Cranmer now, his opponent, was afterwards con-'demned, and died at Oxford for maintaining the 'same opinion; which valour, if sooner shewn, his 'conscience had probably been more clear with-'in him, and his credit without him, to all poste-'rity.'

(35) Fuller's Church Hist. p. 229.

Here the charge, with respect to Gardiner, is entirely changed; for he is accused not of giving ill counsel to the King, but of making a tool of the Archbishop; quite contrary to the relation of Fox, and very unlikely to be true, since they were not friends. But this imputation is nothing in comparison of the load laid upon the Archbishop, and this too without any cause; for, as Mr Strype has very clearly shewn in the life of that prelate (36), he sincerely believed the real presence at that time, and did not change his opinion till about the close of King Henry's reign, or a little after.

(36) Memoirs of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 255.

It would take up too much room to produce Strype's account of this matter, who has preserved the original argument of the Bishop of Chichester against Lambert; from whence it appears, that Fox is mistaken in many particulars, for instead of ten there were but eight arguments advanced by Lambert, and of these the first was answered by the King, so that there were but seven left to the Bishops. Upon the whole we may see, that Ecclesiastical Historians, of all others, are to be read with great caution, as being too much addicted to suffer their own conjectures to supply the want of materials, and this sometimes at the expence of the highest characters; as of Cranmer's, by Fuller, for want of considering duly the progress made by that great prelate, in detaching himself by reasoning and reading, from the errors in which he was bred. Yet, in the main, Dr Fuller seems to be in the right as to the true motive of this transaction, which was the King's vain affectation of displaying his authority as Supreme Head of the Church, to which Cromwell, Cranmer, Gardiner, perhaps all, more or less unwillingly, were obliged to bow. At least it is apparent, that the Bishop of Winchester had no hand in the seizing, or examining, this man; on the contrary, he was brought before Cranmer, and, by his appeal from him to the King as Supreme Head of the Church, he made that method of proceeding necessary; the advising of which, Bishop Burnet, from Fox, imputes to Gardiner, whose guilt, in this business, seems to have been no greater than that of the rest; and yet leaves it great enough too, since it was extremely hard to proceed in a matter of such exceeding difficulty, with such celerity and severity, in those more especially who contended themselves for the right of a free inquiry, which this method was plainly calculated to destroy.

becauſe he ſhewed particular ſpleen againſt Biſhop Gardiner, and was firſt committed to priſon for want of reſpect to him in a ſermon, he is ſurmiſed to have been the author of all his ſufferings, and the perſon by whoſe power that unfortunate Friar was at length brought to the ſtake, which is mentioned as a ſecond inſtance of his good will to perſecution [O]. There is no doubt, that, in the courſe of this reign, the Biſhop of Wincheſter muſt have done many things againſt his inclination, and ſeveral againſt his conſcience. He was obliged to take a ſhare in the divorce of Anne of Cleves, which was none of the moſt honourable; and he was likewiſe obliged to bear a part in that of Queen Katherine Howard, which, conſidering his attachment to that moſt noble family, could be no very pleaſing employment (u). But in theſe, and other compliances, he had many companions, and the excuſes made for them by ſome great pens, may ſerve for him; or the reader will paſs ſentence as he pleaſes, ſince we have no intention to diſguiſe faults, but to diſcloſe truths. Upon the death of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Eſſex, he was elected Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge 1540, which preferment was very acceptable to him (w). He ſtill preſerved his Maſterſhip of Trinity-Hall; and it was well he did preſerve it, ſince, in [O] Of his good will to perſecution.] There was certainly a very ſtrange ſpirit prevailing at this time among all ranks of people, and this was a bitterneſs againſt each other, in reſpect to religious opinions, which led them to be buſy in perſecuting others, at the very time that themſelves were flying in the face of thoſe doctrines which had the ſanction of the law on their ſide. In this ſtate of things, it was impoſſible for thoſe who held high ſtations in the Church, to avoid odium, becauſe the very people who complained of perſecution, when they felt it, complained as loudly of indulgence, whenever it was extended to others. Theſe are plain and natural obſervations founded on facts, and which nothing can more fully prove, than the ſtory now before us. 'This Barnes, ſays my author, had formerly 'been in trouble, upon the ſcore of his preaching 'and opinion. During Wolſey's Miniſtry, he had 'reflected in a ſermon at Cambridge, upon the Car- 'dinal's port and equipage (37). The Cardinal told 'him, this ſtate and magnificence could not well be 'diſpenſed with by a perſon in his ſtation; that it was 'neceſſary to ſupport his character, and the reputation 'of the government. Barnes not reaching this reaſon, 'was unwilling to retract his invective: but Gardiner, 'the Cardinal's Secretary, and Fox, afterwards Biſhop 'of Wincheſter, being his friends, prevailed with him 'to give ſatisfaction, and abjure ſome opinions charged 'upon him. He was afterwards, in 1536, delated 'upon other articles, and in danger of being burnt; 'but counterfeiting himſelf lunatick, got off into Ger- 'many. Here he made an acquaintance with Luther, 'Melancthon, and other Divines. He was likewiſe 'known to the Duke of Saxony, and the King of Den- 'mark. Fox, Biſhop of Hereford, Ambaſſador at 'Smalcald, ſent him into England, where he was 'kindly entertained by Cromwell. By his intereſt, 'the correſpondence with the Germans was in ſome 'meaſure kept up He was firſt employed in the buſi- 'neſs of the King's marriage with the Lady Anne of 'Cleve. But this Lady's perſon proving unacceptable, 'was, it may be, one occaſion of Barnes's diſgrace. 'But other accidents concurred to Barnes's misfortune. 'This year, 1540, in Lent, Biſhop Bonner appointed 'him, Gerrard, and Jerom, to preach at St Paul's 'Croſs; this it ſeems, was done as a mark of reſpect, 'and to oblige Cromwell; but Gardiner ſent Bonner 'word, he intended himſelf to preach at St Paul's Croſs 'on Sunday. In his Sermon, he ſpent ſome ſtrokes of 'ſatire againſt the new teaching: complained that the 'Devil had taught ſome people to throw off confeſſion, 'faſting, and other inſtances of diſcipline and penance. 'About three weeks after, Barnes took the ſame text, 'but ſpent his diſcourſe in maintaining the oppoſite 'doctrine. Beſides this, he gave himſelf the liberty 'of making ſome bold indiſcreet reflections upon Gar- 'diner's perſon. He played upon his name, and 'brought a jingling compariſon or two, which were 'ſhort both in ſenſe and breeding. Gerrard and 'Jerom preached much the ſame doctrine, but with- 'out falling foul upon any perſon. Jerom had been 'charged with preaching againſt the magiſtracy, but he 'explained himſelf to a very defenſible and honeſt 'meaning He affirmed, That if the laws of Princes, 'are conſiſtent with thoſe of God Almighty, we are 'bound to obey them; but in caſe the Prince is 'wicked, and commands a contradiction to Revealed 'Religion, when this happens, we are to ſubmit and 'ſuffer, and not apply to the expedient of reſiſtance. 'To return to Barnes: though Gardiner ſeemed to 'bear the affront with great temper and neglect, his 'friends thought it neceſſary to ſollicit for reparation. 'To this purpoſe they complained to the King of 'Barnes's intemperate language; how ill he had uſed 'Gardiner, who was both a great Prelate and a Privy- 'Counſellor. Fox reports one circumſtance otherwiſe, 'and faith, Gardiner complained to the King himſelf. 'But let this be as it will, Barnes was reprimanded for 'his miſbehaviour, and ordered to aſk the Biſhop of 'Wincheſter's pardon. They were likewiſe to argue 'the point of Juſtification. Upon this article, Barnes 'had maintained, That though God requires us to for- 'give our neighbour, as a condition of forgiveneſs from 'him, yet God muſt forgive us firſt, before we forgive 'our neighbour; for elſe, it would be ſinful to forgive 'our neighbour: For St Paul tells us, Whatſoever is 'not of faith, is ſin. By this foreign and uncatholick 'conſtruction of the text, it appears, Dr Barnes was 'none of the greateſt Divines. The next day, Gardi- 'ner and Barnes had another conference: at the con- 'cluſion, the latter made his ſubmiſſion, aſked the Bi- 'ſhop's pardon, and deſired to be under his inſtructions. 'The Biſhop very frankly paſſed over the former af- 'front, entertained Barnes as his companion, and of- 'fered him a penſion of forty pounds a year. Barnes 'accordingly went to the Biſhop's houſe: but hearing 'the people talk to his diſadvantage, and diſcourſing 'with ſome men of learning, he grew weary of this 'cloſe correſpondence, and diſengaged with the Biſhop. 'The King was diſpleaſed with Barnes's manage- 'ment; and ordered him, Gerrard, and Jerom, to re- 'nounce their opinions. They promiſed ſatisfaction, 'and made their recantation But this, it ſeems, was 'but a force upon their judgment; for they retracted 'their recantation in the pulpit. Upon this, they 'were ſent to the Tower, and attainted of hereſy in 'Parliament. On the thirtieth of July, they were 'brought to Smithfield, with three others of a different 'perſwaſion, Abel, Fetherſtone, and Powel. Theſe 'were attainted for owning the Pope's Supremacy, and 'denying the King's. One of each was put upon a 'hurdle; the Papiſts were hanged, drawn, and quar- 'tered, and the other three burnt. This was an odd 'ſpectacle, and looked like fanciful ſeverity. Inſo- 'much, that a Frenchman who was there, being ſur- 'priſed at the conduct of the Government, told his 'friend in Latin, They had a ſtrange way of managing in 'England; for thoſe who were for the Pope, are 'hanged, and thoſe againſt him burnt' At his death, this Barnes behaved with great courage and conſtancy, forgave the world in general, and the Biſhop of Win- cheſter in particular, if he had any hand in his death; which implying a doubt in him at that time, and in thoſe circumſtances, it will not be eaſy to find any evi- dence to render this matter certain to us; and therefore a famous writer (38), than whom none was more a friend to liberty, or leſs inclined to palliate perſecution, after reading the proceedings againſt Barnes, which his friends took care to ſend into Germany, lays no blame upon Biſhop Gardiner at all.

in the next reign, this in moſt peoples opinion preſerved the foundation. As he was elected Chancellor of the Univerſity without influence, he was very aſſiduous in his office, that he might conciliate the affections of it's members, and did all he could to aſſiſt them with his intereſt at Court, which, when he had done any great ſervice, was very good. Certain it is, that whatever power or preferments his compliances obtained under this Monarch were dearly purchaſed, ſince they were held in continual hazard, and imbittered with violent ſtorms of royal reſentment; which, though, as this Prelate himſelf ſays, he knew how to ſuſtain without ſinking, muſt nevertheleſs be exceedingly diſtaſteful [P]. In ſome conjunctures too we are ſatisfied they filled him with many apprehenſions, and, tho' he might be dextrous in ſometimes ſhifting off the King's ill humours, yet at others, how great or how alert ſoever his ſpirit might be, he was forced to bear ſlights with patience, and even ſubmit to very

[P] Be exceedingly diſtaſteful.] Though Cromwell and Gardiner had been both bred in the ſame family, and both derived their preferment from the diſplay of their abilities in Cardinal Wolſey's ſervice; yet when Cromwell, though he came later into the King's favour, gained the aſcendant, they could never agree together, which will be the leſs ſtrange, when we conſider, that they acted upon very different maxims; Cromwell being deſirous to place his ſafety and proſperity in being always of the ſame ſide with the King, in which, perhaps, he followed his old maſter; but Gardiner, taught by the example of that maſter, thought it better to lean upon the law than the King; by which, if he did not make his court ſo well, yet certainly he carried his point better. Amongſt other diſputes they had, the Biſhop has left us one, in a letter of his to the Duke of Somerſet, which is worth the knowing, and it cannot be better told than in his own words (39). 'The 'Lord Cromwell had once put in the King's, our late 'Sovereign Lord's head, to take upon him to have his 'will and pleaſure regarded for a law; for that he ſaid 'was to be a very King; and thereupon I was called 'for at Hampton-Court; and as the Lord Cromwell 'was very ſtout, come on my Lord of Wincheſter '(quoth he), for that conceit he had, whatſoever he 'talked with me, he knew ever as much as I, Greek 'or Latin, and all. Anſwer the King here, quoth he, 'but ſpeak plainly and directly, and ſhrink not, man: 'Is not that (quoth he) that pleaſeth the King, a law? 'have ye not the Civil Law therein? (quoth he) Quod 'principi placuit, and ſo forth, (quoth he) I have ſome-'what forgotten it now: I ſtood ſtill, and wondered 'in my mind, to what concluſion this ſhould tend; the 'King ſaw me muſing, and with earneſt gentleneſs, 'ſaid, Anſwer him whether it be ſo or no? I would 'not anſwer my Lord Cromwell, but delivered myſelf 'to the King, and told him, I had read indeed of 'Kings that had their will always received for a law; 'but I told him the form of his reign, to make the 'laws his will, was more ſure and quiet, and by this 'form of government ye be eſtabliſhed, quoth I, and 'it is agreeable with the nature of your people: if ye 'begin a new manner of policy, how it will frame no 'man can tell; and how this frameth ye can tell, and 'would never adviſe your Grace to leave a certain, 'for an uncertain. The King turned his back, and 'left the matter after, till the Lord Cromwell turned 'the cat in the pan afore company, when he was angry 'with me, and charged me, as though I had played 'his part.' Some other particulars there are in the ſame reign, curious in themſelves, and the more ſo, as coming from him, a perſon of great ſagacity, and who made no vulgar obſervations. As they are in reality part of his perſonal hiſtory, and written with his own pen, we will be bold to inſert them, ſpeaking to the ſame great perſon he ſays in his letter. 'Whether the 'King may command againſt the Common Law, or an 'Act of Parliament, there is never a Judge, or other 'man in the realm, ought to know more by experience 'of that the Lawyers have ſaid, than I. Firſt, my 'Lord Cardinal had obtained his Legacy, by our late 'Sovereign Lord's requeſt at Rome; yet being, it was 'againſt the laws of the realm, the Judges cenſured 'the offence of premunire, which matter I bore away, 'and take it for a law of the realm, becauſe the Law-'yers ſaid ſo, but my reaſon digeſted it not. The 'Lawyers, for the confirmation of their doings, brought 'in a caſe of my Lord Typtoft, an Earl he was, and 'learned in Civil Laws, who being Chancellor, be-'cauſe in execution of the King's Commiſſion, he of-'fended the laws of the realm, he ſuffered on Tower-'Hill; they brought in the examples of many Judges 'that had fines ſet on their heads in like caſes, for 'tranſgreſſion of the Laws, by the King's command-'ment, and this I learned in this caſe. Since that 'time being of the Council, when many proclamations 'were deviſed againſt the carriers out of corn; when 'it came to puniſhing the offenders, the Judges would 'anſwer, it might not be by the Laws, becauſe the Act 'of Parliament gave liberty, wheat being under a 'price: whereupon at the laſt, followed the Act of 'Proclamations, in the paſſing whereof were many 'large words. When the Biſhop of Exeter and his 'Chancellor, were by one body brought into a premu-'nire; I reaſoned with the Lord Audley, then Chan-'cellor, ſo far as he bad me hold my peace, for fear of 'entring a premunire myſelf: but I concluded, that 'although I muſt take it as of their authority that it is 'Common Law, yet I could not ſee how a man autho-'riſed by the King, as ſince the King's Majeſty hath 'taken upon him the Supremacy, every Biſhop is, that 'man could fall in a premunire. I reaſoned once in 'the Parliament-Houſe, where was free ſpeech without 'danger, and there the Lord Audley, Chancellor, 'then to ſatisfy me, becauſe I was in ſome ſecret eſti-'mation as he knew, though art a good fellow, Biſhop, 'quoth he, look the Act of the Supremacy, and 'there the King's doings be reſtrained to ſpiritual juriſ-'diction; and in another Act, no Spiritual Law ſhall 'have place contrary to a Common Law, or an Act of 'Parliament. And if this were not (quoth he) the Bi-'ſhops would enter in with the King, and by means of 'his ſupremacy, order the Law as you liſted; but we 'will provide (quoth he) that the premunire ſhall never 'go off your heads. This I bore away there, and held 'my peace.' But as there was little fair weather abroad in thoſe days, the courtiers were not always ſure of avoiding foul by their keeping at home. The Biſhop himſelf tells us, that the King could be very angry, and would then talk very loud, very probably too his language was but coarſe, ſince many ſamples there are of that ſort in his hiſtory; this had a great effect upon thoſe that were about him, and kept them ever in a ſtate of deep humility, in which, without doubt, Gardiner differed but very little from the reſt; but the King letting him into the ſecret, that he could look ſour and talk rough without meaning much harm, he ever after bore thoſe fallies with much leſs anxiety. The thing happened thus, the Earl of Wiltſhire and Dr Gardiner had been joined in ſome affair of conſequence, which had not been managed ſo as to give the King ſatisfaction, upon which he treated Gardiner, in the preſence of the Earl, with ſuch a ſtorm of words as quite confounded him; but before they parted, the King took him into his chamber, and told him, that he was indeed very angry, yet not particularly with him, though he had uſed him ſo, becauſe he could not take quite ſo much liberty with the Earl. Biſhop Gardiner thenceforward could ſtand a royal rattling pretty well, or, to uſe his own words to the Duke of Somerſet, He folded it up in the matter, and bore it patiently. The King had another practice, which he called whetting, and this in effect was ſcolding with pen and ink; the Biſhop ſays, that when ſome of the courtiers ſaw letters to him in this ſtile, they looked upon him as undone, while himſelf was under no ſuch apprehenſions, knowing the King to be a wiſe Prince, and who, after thus venting his anger, would remember paſt ſervices, and be more ready to do an old ſervant a good than an ill turn, after giving him ſuch correction.

very diſagreeable ſupplications and expreſſions of deep humility, and great ſenſe of his own failings, directly contrary to the conviction of his own conſcience and underſtanding [Q]. In the time of King Henry, theſe were indiſpenſable conditions of miniſterial greatneſs; nor was there any ſuch thing as enjoying court favours, without being expoſed alſo to threats and frowns. Biſhop Gardiner felt theſe, as Cranmer and others did alternately, living now in the ſunſhine, and by and by in the ſhade, or rather under a cloud. But, in the latter end of the King's life, the proſpect grew darker than ever. In 1544, if we may rely on the credit of John Fox (x), who aſſures us he had what he relates from one Morrice, who was Secretary to Archbiſhop Cranmer, this Prelate had a very narrow eſcape from the greateſt danger to which he was ever expoſed in his whole life. He had a Secretary, and a relation, one German Gardiner, who is ſaid to have been much in his favour, and who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his conferences with John Frith the martyr, an account of which he publiſhed. This young Clergyman being ſuſpected in the matter of the King's ſupremacy, a proſecution was commenced againſt him, and, his obſtinacy being great, he was executed as a traitor March the ſeventh 1544. The enemies of the Biſhop, and, as Fox ſays, the Duke of Suffolk particularly, ſuggeſted to the King, that it was very likely, notwithſtanding all he had written, that he was of his Secretary's opinion, and that, if he was once in the Tower, matter enough might be found againſt him; on which his Majeſty conſented to ſend him thither. But the Biſhop, having intelligence of this, went immediately to the King, ſubmitted with the utmoſt humility, confeſſed whatever his Majeſty charged him with, and, to the no ſmall diſappointment of his enemies, by complying with the King's humour, and ſhewing the deepeſt concern for his real or pretended failings, obtained his full pardon. Yet, after this, we may

[Q] To the conviction of his own conſcience and underſtanding.] As long as this article may ſeem, our great care has been to make it as ſhort as it was poſſible, conſiſtent with perſpicuity, truth, and ſuch authorities as are requiſite to ſupport the facts mentioned therein; without which it muſt be confeſſed, that there is very little credit due to the hiſtories and memoirs of theſe times, which bear on all ſides ſuch viſible marks of partiality and prejudice, that nothing is to be depended upon, where there is not a degree of evidence produced proportionable to the importance of what is aſſerted. Mr Strype (40), who has preſerved the following letter, thinks it was written about the year 1535, and he gives us this account of the occaſion of it. The King, it ſeems, was deſirous that the Clergy of all ranks ſhould acknowledge, that all the powers they had were derived from him, as the ſupreme head of the Chriſtian Church in his dominions. Againſt this doctrine ſomebody had written a book, with which the King was offended; and, as the Biſhop of Wincheſter had both preached and written much to his ſatisfaction, in the ſupport of his ſupremacy, he ſent him this book, with orders to anſwer it. But, upon the peruſal of it, this Biſhop, whom we find often repreſented as one ſo complaiſant that the King could require nothing from him which he was not ready to perform, not only declined writing ſuch an anſwer as was expected, but profeſſed himſelf of the ſame opinion with the author of that book. It is no wonder at all, that, to a Monarch of Henry's diſpoſition, this diſappointment ſhould appear in a very bad light, or that he ſhould teſtify his diſlike in very ſtrong terms. This it ſeems he did, and ſent the Biſhop of Wincheſter word of it by his Almoner Dr Fox, as Strype conceives. The Biſhop knowing his Maſter's temper well, and not caring to meet the tempeſt of his anger by a perſonal apology, thought fit to write him the following letter, which is produced to ſhew the real ſentiments of the man, and that he was not always ſo ſervile, or ſo willing, an inſtrument of the King's will, as we find him ſometimes repreſented. In ſtating this fact without the letter, we muſt have left the reader in much incertainty; but now having that before him, he may judge for himſelf, and form a true deciſion of the fitneſs, or unfitneſs, of this Prelate's behaviour upon ſo important an occaſion.

'MY duty remembered to your Majeſty, with all lowly humility and reverend honour. For as much as letted by diſeaſe of body, I cannot perſonally repair to your Highneſs preſence, having heard, of your Grace's Almoner, to my great diſcomfort, what opinion your Highneſs hath conceived of me. I am compelled, by theſe letters, to repreſent me unto the ſame, lamenting and wailing my chance and fortune, to have loſt, beſide my deſerts, as much reputation in your Grace's heart, as your Highneſs, without my merit, hath conferred unto me, in eſtimation of the world. And if I comforted not myſelf with remembrance of your Grace's goodneſs, with whom Veritas ſemper vincit, & fortis tæderet & vitæ. I know in myſelf, and can never forget your Grace' benefits, your Highneſs notable affection toward me. I know my duty and bond to your Highneſs. How much I deſire to declare, in outward deeds, mine inward knowledge, God knoweth, and I truſt your Highneſs ſhall know. But, in the mean time, for want thereof, thus I ſuffer, and know no remedy but your Highneſs goodneſs, to expend what I have done, what I ſhould have done, and what I may do; and not to be miſcontent, though, in correcting the anſwer made, I believed, ſo great a number of learned men affirming it ſo preciſely to be true, that was in the anſwer alledged concerning God's law. Eſpecially, conſidering your Highneſs book againſt Luther, in mine underſtanding, moſt plainly approveth it. The book written in your Grace's cauſe, and tranſlated into Engliſh, ſeemeth to allow it. And the Council of Conſtance, condemning the articles of Wycklif, manifeſtly decreeth it. The contrary whereof if your Grace can now prove, yet I, not learned in Divinity, ne knowing any part of your Grace's proves, am, I truſt, without cauſe of blame in that behalf. When I know that I know not, I ſhall then ſpeak thereafter. It were pity we lived, if ſo little expreſſing our love to God in our deeds, we ſhould abuſe his name and authority to your Highneſs diſpleaſure, of whom we have received ſo many benefits. On the other part, if it be God's authority to us allotted, tho' we cannot uſe it condignely, yet we cannot give it away. And it is no leſs danger to receive than to give, as your Highneſs, of your high wiſdom, can conſider. I am, for my part, as I am bound, moſt deſirous not only to do what may be done to your Highneſs contentation, but alſo appliable to learn the truth what ought to be done. Truſting your Majeſty will finally take in good part, that I think that true for which I have ſo good grounds and authorities, until I hear ſtronger grounds and reaſons to the contrary. I ſhall moſt gladly confer with any of your Grace's Council in this matter. And, in the mean time, daily pray to God for knowlege of his truth, and preſervation of your Majeſty in much felicity; alway moſt ready and deſirous, to do as becometh may ſuppoſe, provoked by ſuch uſage, for, as Fox ſtates it, one cannot avoid ſeeing it was a deſign to deſtroy him at any rate, he thought of refining upon this invention, and of turning their own artillery upon his adverſaries. In ſhort, he is ſaid to have dipped very deep in a plot againſt Archbiſhop Cranmer, which was diſcovered and diſſipated by the King, who left all his enemies to his mercy, and, amongſt the reſt, the Biſhop of Wincheſter; but he forgave them (y). After this, the King opening himſelf to Biſhop Gardiner, upon ſome ſuſpicions he entertained of his laſt Queen Katherine Parre, as inclined to Hereſy, he ſo far improved theſe jealouſies as to prepare a paper of articles againſt her, which the King ſigned, and it was agreed to ſend her to the Tower; but Chancellor Wriothiſly, who was entruſted with this paper, dropped it out of his boſom, and it was immediately carried to the Princeſs. She ſo wrought upon the King's affections, as to diſpel his ſuſpicions; and this brought ſevere reproaches upon the Chancellor, and the King's reſentment againſt the Biſhop grew ſo ſtrong that he would never ſee his face afterwards (z). One has, however, ſome reaſon to wonder, that when John Bale wrote his article of Queen Katherine Parre, in which he celebrates her learning, piety, and zeal for true religion, at the time all parties were living, and when any thing againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter would have been well received, he ſhould ſay nothing of this iniquitous contrivance (a). Nor is it leſs ſtrange, that, when matter was ſought much farther back to charge him with, this ſhould not be remembered in the proceedings at his deprivation under the ſucceeding reign. We need not wonder, if, ſtanding in this light with the King, when drawing towards his latter end, he left him out of his will, and did not appoint him one of the Counſellors to Prince Edward, as he once intended. Sanders alledges another reaſon for this, which was, that Gardiner, taking ſome favourable opportunity, perſwaded the King to reſtore the ſupremacy to the Pope, either by a ſolemn declaration in Parliament, if there was time to call one; or by an authentick act of his own, if there was not; which would ſufficiently manifeſt his intention. In this reſpect, the King, as he tells the ſtory, ſoon after changed his mind; and thence proceeded his enmity to Gardiner (b). But all is pure fiction, for Biſhop Gardiner himſelf, in a ſermon before King Philip and Queen Mary, mentions ſome ſuch thoughts in the King during the Northern rebellion; and, had there been a grain of truth in it, no doubt would have mentioned his inclination at this time. Beſides, there actually was a Parliament then in being, which was diſſolved by his death. Some other reaſons were aſſigned for the King's excluding him in his teſtament, which will be mentioned at the bottom of the page [R]. Whatever uſage he might meet with at any time from his maſter, he ſhewed, upon all occaſions, very high reſpect for his memory, and ever ſpoke and wrote of him with much deference; and tho' Fox treats him very coarſely on that head, yet others have thought there was in it as much of prudence as of gratitude. Upon the acceſſion of King Edward VI, Archbiſhop Cranmer, being earneſt

in carrying on the great work of Reformation, to which he found the Protector Somerset well inclined, laboured all he could to gain the Bishop of Winchester to a concurrence, or at least to an acquiescence (c). But this wary Prelate thought, or seemed to think, that, by making too much haste, all might be spoiled; and opposed his sentiments at least; to those of the Protector, and all his Council. He suggested, that the ruling maxim in a minority was to keep things quiet, and alledged this could never be done if any signal alterations were attempted in Church or State. On this principle he dissuaded the war with Scotland, as a measure necessarily attended with much hazard and a vast expence (d). The Protector received his advice civilly, and wrote answers to his letters, still remaining, with much decency and moderation. But, notwithstanding this, things went on according to the plan laid down by the Archbishop, who formed a design of having a royal visitation by commissioners, who might see the condition of every diocese, encourage the progress of reformed religion, remove and discredit superstition, and one in each list of these Commissioners, being a Clergyman, was directed to preach sound doctrine (e). The wisdom of the Archbishop, in framing this scheme, was certainly great; and yet Winchester no sooner had intelligence of it, than he set up objections. In the first place, he doubted it's legality, as it was to countenance innovations; in the next, he thought it imprudent, as it would disturb the order of government in Church and State; and lastly, he thought it impolitick, as all things must be done in the King's name, and by his authority as Supreme Head of the Church, at a time when he, being a child, could know nothing of these things; and his uncle the Protector, being at the head of an army and absent, could know very little more of them; so that in the opinion even of the meanest people, this would weaken that great prerogative which King Henry had assumed, and on the due use of which all reformation must depend (f). Sir John Godsalve, one of the Visitors (but not for the diocese of Winchester), having heard of the Bishop's discourses, and, having a very sincere regard for him, wrote to him, desiring him to be more discreet, and not run the manifest hazard of ruining himself and losing his Bishoprick. Bishop Gardiner sent him an answer highly commended by Bishop Burnet, and which is inserted in the notes to shew the temper of the man in these times, and how very able he was in casting the fairest colour imaginable on all his opinions and actions (g) [S]. In all probability, this answer of [S] On all his opinions and actions.] It is very singular, that this, being a private letter, should remain and be preserved to our times. Bishop Burnet says, that it has the most of a Christian, and a Bishop, in it, of any thing he had seen of Gardiner's; he adds too, very judiciously, that it has no less of a Patriot, and therefore he resolved not to suppress it, tho' it was on the other side. But, from this letter, it cannot be shewn that the Bishop of Winchester was on the other side, for there is nothing of Popery in this letter, or indeed in his whole opposition; what he had in his heart no man can say; but either he was sincere in penning this epistle, or he was the most finished dissembler in the world (45). It is true he changed afterwards, and we shall consider how far he changed when we come to that period of his life, from the testimony of writers who did not at all flatter him. But now to the letter, which runs thus.

(45) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 36.

'MR GODSALVE, after my right hearty commendations, with like thanks for the declaration 'of your good mind towards me (as you mean it), although it agreeth not with mine accompt, such as I 'have had leisure to make in this time of liberty, since 'the death of my late Sovereign Lord, whose soul Jesu 'pardon. For this have I reckoned that I was called 'to this Bishoprick, without the offence of God's law 'or the King's in attaining of it. I have kept my 'Bishopriek these fifteen years, accomplished this very 'day that I write these letters unto you, without offending God's law or the King's in the retaining of 'it, howsoever I have of frailty otherwise sinned. 'Now if I may play the third part well, to depart 'from the Bishopric without the offence of God's law 'or the King's, I shall think the tragedy of my life 'well passed over, and, in this part, to be well handled, is all my care and study now how to finish this 'third act well; for so I offend not God's law nor the 'King's, I will no more care to see my Bishopriek 'taken from me, than myself to be taken from the 'Bishopriek.

'I am by nature already condemned to die, which 'sentence no man can pardon, nor assure me of delay 'in the execution of it; and so see that of necessity I 'shall leave my Bishopriek to the disposition of the 'Crown, from whence I had it, my household also to 'break up, and my bringing up youth to cease, the 'remembrance whereof troubleth me nothing. I made 'in my house at London a pleasant study that delighted me much, and yet I was glad to come into the 'country and leave it; and as I have left the use of 'somewhat, so can I leave the use of all to obtain more 'quiet; it is not loss to change for the better.

'Honesty and truth are more leef to me, than 'all the possessions of the realm; and in these two, 'to say and do frankly, as I must, I never forbare; 'yet, and in these two, honesty and truth, I take such 'pleasure and comfort, as I will never leave them for 'no respect, for they will abide by a man, and so will 'nothing else. No man can take them away from me 'but myself, and if myself do them away from me, then 'myself do undo myself, and make myself worthy to 'lose my Bishopriek, whereat such as gape might 'take more sport than they are like to have at my 'hands.

'What other men have said or done in the homilies 'I cannot tell, and what homilies or injunctions shall 'be brought hither I know not; such as the printers 'have sold abroad, I have read and considered, and 'am therefore the better instructed how to use myself 'to the Visitors at their repair hither, to whom I will 'use no manner of protestation, but a plain allegation, 'as the matter serveth, and as honesty and truth shall 'bind me to speak; for I will never yield to do that 'should not beseem a Christian. Bishops ought never 'to lose the inheritance of the King's laws, due to 'every Englishman, for want of petition. I will shew 'myself a true subject, humble and obedient; which 'repugneth not with the preservation of my duty to 'God, and my right in the realm not to be enjoined 'against an Act of Parliament: which mine intent I 'have signified to the Council, with request of redress 'in the matter; and not to compel me to such an allegation, which, without I were a beast, I cannot 'permit; and I were more than a beast, if, after I 'had signified to the Council truth and reason in 'words, I should then seem in my deeds not to care 'for it.

'My Lord Protector, in one of such letters as he 'wrote to me, willed me not to fear too much; and 'indeed I know him so well, and divers others of my 'Lords of the Council, that I cannot fear any hurt at

of the Biſhop's proved the cauſe of that Prelate's firſt impriſonment, which was in all reſpects extraordinary, and out of the common forms of juſtice (b). He was ſent for, when in London, to attend the Council, three weeks before the Viſitors came into his dioceſe; and becauſe he would not promiſe to receive the homilies, and pay obedience to whatever the King's Viſitors might require, the Council, notwithſtanding his cloſe reaſoning the point as to it's conſiſtency with law, and his earneſt entreaty to give him a little ſpace to conſider, committed him cloſe priſoner to the Fleet (i). He was there, as we ſee by his letters and petitions, very ſtrictly kept, and very indifferently uſed; which muſt have been by order, ſince John Fox has marked on the margin of one of his applications for redreſs, that the Warden of the Fleet was his friend (k). It is probable the Archbiſhop conſented to this, but it is impoſſible he ſhould contrive it; being a very deep, tho' a moſt unjuſtifiable, ſtroke of policy. The Biſhop held the viſitation, as directed by the inſtructions, illegal without an Act of Parliament; but, being confined, he could not hinder that viſitation going on; and, remaining cloſe in the Fleet during the whole ſeſſion (tho' a Lord of Parliament), he could give no oppoſition to thoſe bills, which were calculated to make the things lawful which he had objected to as illegal (l). When all this was done, he was diſcharged like a common malefactor, under colour of the King's general pardon, tho' never charged judicially with any offence (m). The very dates prove theſe facts; he was committed September the twenty-fifth, the Parliament aſſembled November the fourth, was prorogued December the twenty-fourth, and he was ſet at liberty before the cloſe of that year 1547. Beſides this, all that we have advanced is ſupported by unqueſtionable authorities (n) [T]. In the courſe of this impriſonment, it came out, that the famous ſtate

'their hands, in the allegation of God's law and the 'King's; and I will never defame them ſo much to 'be ſeen to fear it. And of what ſtrength an Act of 'Parliament is, the realm was taught in the caſe of her 'that we called Queen Anne; where all ſuch as ſpake 'againſt her in the Parliament-Houſe, altho' they did 'it by ſpecial commandment of the King, and ſpake 'that which was truth; yet they were fain to have a 'pardon, becauſe that ſpeaking was againſt an Act of 'Parliament. Did you never know, or hear tell, of 'any man, that for doing that the King, our late So-'vereign Lord, willed, deviſed, and required, to be 'done; he that took pains, and was commanded to do 'it, was fain to ſue for his pardon; and ſuch other 'alſo as were doers in it; and I could tell who it were; 'ſure there hath been ſuch a caſe, and I have been 'preſent when it hath been reaſoned.

'That the doing againſt an Act of Parliament ex-'cuſeth not a man even from the caſe of treaſon, altho' 'a man did it by the King's commandment. You can 'tell this to your remembrance, when you think far-'ther of it; and when it cometh to your remem-'brance, you will not be beſt content with yourſelf, 'I believe, to have adviſed me to venture the breach of 'an Act of Parliament, without ſurety of pardon, al-'though the King command it; and were ſuch indeed 'as it were no matter to do it at all. And thus I anſwer 'the letters with worldly civil reaſons, and take your 'mind and zeal towards me to be as tender as may be; 'and yet you ſee, that the following of your advice 'might make me loſe my Biſhoprick by mine own act, 'which I am ſure you would I ſhould keep; and ſo 'would I, as might ſtand with my truth and honeſty, 'and none otherwiſe, as knoweth God, who ſend you 'heartily well to fare.'

[T] Is ſupported by unqueſtionable authorities.] There is not, to ſay the truth, but very few writers amongſt our Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians that have taken upon them to juſtify theſe proceedings; but on the other hand, none of them go to the bottom, except Biſhop Burnet (46), who ſpeaks very clearly and candidly of this whole affair. 'On the twenty fifth of September, ſays he, the 'Council being informed that Gardiner had written to 'ſome of that board, and had ſpoken to others many 'things in prejudice and contempt of the King's viſita-'tion, and that he intended to refuſe to ſet forth the 'homilies and injunctions, he was ſent for to the Coun-'cil. Where being examined, he ſaid, he thought 'they were contrary to the word of God, and that his 'conſcience would not ſuffer him to obſerve them. 'He excepted to one of the Homilies, that it excluded 'charity from juſtifying men, as well as faith. This he 'ſaid was contrary to the book ſet out in the late 'King's time, which was afterwards confirmed in Par-'liament, in the year, 1542; he ſaid further, that he 'could never ſee one place of ſcripture, nor any an-'cient Doctor that favoured it. He alſo ſaid, Eraſ-'mus's Paraphraſe was bad enough in Latin, but 'much worſe in Engliſh; for the tranſlator had oft, out 'of ignorance, and oft out of deſign, miſrendered him 'palpably, and was one that neither underſtood Latin 'nor Engliſh well. He offered to go to Oxford to diſ-'pute about Juſtification with any they ſhould ſend him 'to, or to enter into conference with any that would 'undertake his inſtruction in town. But this did not 'ſatisfy the Council. So they preſſed him to declare 'what he intended to do, when the viſitors ſhould be 'with him. He ſaid, he did not know; he ſhould 'further ſtudy theſe points, for it would be three weeks 'before they could be with him, and he was ſure he 'would ſay no worſe than that he ſhould obey them, 'as far as could conſiſt with God's law and the King's. 'The Council urged him to promiſe that he would 'without any limitation, ſet forth the Homilies and 'the Injunctions, which he refuſing to do, was ſent 'to the Fleet. Some days after that, Cranmer went to 'ſee the Dean of St Paul's, having the Biſhops of 'Lincoln and Rocheſter, with Dr Cox, and ſome others 'with him. He ſent for Gardiner thither, and entred 'into diſcourſe with him about that paſſage in the 'Homily, excluding charity out of our juſtification, 'and urged thoſe places of St Paul, That we are juſti-'fied by faith, without the works of the Law: He ſaid, 'his deſign in that paſſage, was only to draw men from 'truſting in any thing they did, and to teach them to 'truſt only to Chriſt. But Gardiner had a very diffe-'rent notion of Juſtification. For as he ſaid, infants 'were juſtified by Baptiſm, and penitents, by the Sa-'crament of Penance; and that the conditions of the 'juſtifying of thoſe of age, were charity as well as 'faith, as the three eſtates make a law all join toge-'ther; for by this ſimile, he ſet it out in the report 'he writ of that diſcourſe to the Lord Protector, 'reckoning the King one of the three eſtates (a way of 'ſpeech very ſtrange, eſpecially in a Biſhop and a 'Lawyer). For Eraſmus, it was ſaid, that though 'there were faults in his Paraphraſe, as no book be-'ſides the Scriptures, is without faults, yet it was beſt 'for that uſe they could find, and they did chooſe ra-'ther to ſet out what ſo learned a man had written, 'than to make a new one, which might give occaſion 'to more objections, and he was the moſt indifferent 'writer they knew. Afterwards Cranmer, knowing 'what was likely to work moſt on him, let fall ſome 'words as Gardiner writ to the Protector (47), of 'bringing him into the Privy Council, if he would 'concur in what they were carrying on. But that not 'having it's ordinary effect on him, he was carried 'back to the Fleet.'

He afterwards gives the remainder of the ſtory thus. 'But notwithſtanding all his letters, yet he continued 'a priſoner till the Parliament was over, and then by 'the

ſtate book of religion, publiſhed by authority, under the title of The Erudition of Chriſtian Man, was compiled chiefly by Biſhop Gardiner (o). By comparing this with the religious ſyſtems in the reign of Edward VI, the difference may be ſeen between his notions and thoſe of Cranmer; and from hence we may diſcern the probability of his being in earneſt in his declarations, without ſuppoſing, as almoſt all writers do, miſled therein by the Papiſts themſelves, that in his heart he was a bigot to Popery. The Archbiſhop was once as well pleaſed with the book beforementioned as any body, and had recommended it as ſtrenuouſly; but now having changed his mind as to the real preſence, he was not unwilling the world ſhould know it's true author; and Gardiner, being touched with his inſinuations, replied very eagerly in defence of his book (p) [U]. Upon his obtaining his liberty, the Biſhop went down to his dioceſe, and there was ſo far from creating any trouble or diſturbance, that he was remarkably active and diligent in giving obedience, and ſeeing that it was given, to the laws concerning religion (q); but thoſe who had a diſlike to him, would not ſuffer him to be long at quiet. They were no ſooner informed of his returning to town, than they procured an order for him to come before the Council, where he was roughly treated, and then directed to keep his houſe till he gave ſatisfaction, which was to be done in a ſermon preached before the King and his Miniſters, in a publick audience; for the matter of which, he was directed as well what he ſhould not as what he ſhould ſay, by Sir William Cecil (r). On St Peter's day the Biſhop did accordingly preach, but was ſo far from giving ſatisfaction, that the very next day, June the thirtieth 1548, he was ſent to the Tower, and continued there a priſoner during all that reign (s). It was very near a year, notwithſtanding repeated applications, that he continued there, without having ſcarce any notice taken of him, his Chaplain having admittance but once when he was ill, and then reſtrained becauſe his life was not thought in danger (t). When the Protector was depoſed, or ſome ſmall time before, he had hopes given him of his releaſe, and from thoſe it is likely who could have done it if they had judged it proper (u). But finding himſelf deceived, he took the freedom of applying himſelf by letter to the Council, of which we have probably a true, tho' certainly a very unpoliſhed, account from honeſt John Stowe (w); who likewiſe tells us very plainly why he publiſhed it, which in effect was becauſe he ſaw that no body elſe would [W]. When the Duke of Somerſet, tho' removed

'the Act of Pardon, he was ſet at liberty. This was 'much cenſured as an invaſion of liberty; and it was 'ſaid, thoſe at court durſt not ſuffer him to come to the 'houſe, leſt he had confounded them in all they did. 'And the explaining Juſtification with ſo much nicety 'in Homilies that were to be read to the people, was 'thought a needleſs ſubtilty. But the former abuſes of 'truſting to the acts of charity that men did, by which 'they fancied they bought Heaven, made Cranmer 'judge it neceſſary to expreſs the matter ſo nicely, 'though the expounding thoſe places of St Paul, was 'as many thought, rather according to the ſtrain of 'the Germans, than to the meaning of theſe epiſtles. 'And upon the whole matter, they knew Gardiner's 'haughty temper, and that it was neceſſary to mortifie 'him a little, though the pretence on which they did 'it, ſeemed too ſlight for ſuch ſeverities. But it is or-'dinary, when a thing is once reſolved on, to make 'uſe of the firſt occaſion that offers for effecting it.'

[U] In defence of his book.] While the Biſhop was under this confinement, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſometimes wrote to him, and, as Strype tells us, propoſed to him, employing a part of his time in writing Homilies, which he declined; but it was in one of theſe conferences, that the diſpute to which we refer, happened, the ſame author tells it in the following words (48).

(48) Strype's Memorials, Vol. III. p. 277.

'During his being here, which was not long, there 'paſt ſome letters between the Archbiſhop of Canter-'bury and him: He had urged to the Archbiſhop, the 'ſtate of religion in King Henry's days; from which, 'he and the Clergy and the Council, did begin ſo 'much to vary, Wincheſter reminded him of the 'King's book as he called it, eſtabliſhed by Parlia-'ment. But the Archbiſhop in his anſwer, told him, 'that he indeed called it ſo, and that the King was 'ſeduced; and that he the Archbiſhop knew by whom 'he was compaſſed in that book.

But Wincheſter ſharply replied to him. 'That the 'book was acknowledged by the Parliament as the 'King's book, and that the Archbiſhop himſelf, com-'manded it to be publiſhed in his dioceſe as the King's 'book. And that if he thought it not true, he ought 'to think his Grace would not, for all the Princes 'chriſtened in the world, have yielded unto. And he 'threatened the Archbiſhop, that if he made this mat-'ter more public, and charged the late King with be-'ing ſeduced, he would vindicate his maſter, as one of 'his old ſervants. And whereas the Archbiſhop had 'adviſed him to bethink himſelf of his preſent condi-'tion, lying now in priſon; Wincheſter replied to 'this with ſeemingly much ſatisfaction: how himſelf 'was arrived to that haven of quietneſs, without the 'loſs of any notable tackle, as the mariners ſay, which 'he ſaid, was a great matter as the winds had blown, 'and with a little flea biting, conveyed to an eaſy 'ſtate. He adviſed, that ſeeing King Henry died ſo 'ſo honourably and ſo much lamented, and was con-'cluded to be received to God's mercy; the realm 'ſhould not be troubled during the King's minority, 'with matters of novelty, there being ſo many other 'things for the King's Counſellors to regard.'

[W] That no body elſe would.] Whoever will take the pains of examining our Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Hiſtories, will ſee how little care is taken to fix the dates relative to theſe tranſactions, which are only to be recovered from the original papers that are ſtill preſerved. By comparing them, the reader will perceive, that the Biſhop of Wincheſter never ſat in any one of King Edward's Parliaments; and notwithſtanding this flagrant injuſtice, we do not find ſo much as a ſingle word ſaid of it in the articles againſt the Protector Somerſet, tho' it was not only of more moment than many things alledged in them, but was alſo a fact which he could not poſſibly deny. It is indeed affirmed in the following account, and we have ſome notices of it elſewhere, that the Earl of Warwick, and ſome of the reſt of the cabal, gave Gardiner aſſurances of his liberty; but when they found themſelves able to act without him, they made no ſcruple of forgetting or breaking that promiſe, from a juſt foreſight, that he would give the ſame oppoſition to their meaſures he was inclined to have given to thoſe of the Duke.

But let us hear Stowe (49), who very ſeldom puts original papers into his Annals, and takes care, when he does, that they ſhall be equally curious and important, thus then he writes. 'Now when the Duke of 'Somerſet was firſt apprehended, Stephen Gardiner, 'Biſhop of Wincheſter, then being priſoner in the 'Tower (as before ye have heard) was borne in hand, 'he ſhould be ſet at liberty; in hope whereof, he pre-'pared him new apparel for that purpoſe, thinking 'verily removed from his high office, found means to come again into power, and to be called to Council, this affair of Biſhop Gardiner was brought once more on the carpet, and the Duke and others, by virtue of an order of that Board, went to confer with him in the Tower June the ninth 1550 (x). It was propoſed that he ſhould make a ſubmiſſion for what was paſſed, ſhould teſtify his approbation of all that had been done in religion ſince he had been laid aſide, and that he ſhould promiſe obedience for the future. The two laſt points Wincheſter readily conſented to, and actually ſigned all that was expected from him; but refuſed his aſſent to the firſt, inſiſting upon his innocence. Much ſollicitation there was, with what intent one cannot ſay; at laſt the Biſhop, perceiving they roſe in their demands, told them roundly he would do nothing in a priſon; and that he did not ſeek either favour or pity, but juſtice (y). On the nineteenth of July he was brought to the Council, and being aſked whether he would ſubſcribe the laſt articles or not, he anſwered in the negative; and it was thereupon declared to him, that his Biſhoprick ſhould be ſequeſtred; and, if in three months he did not comply, they would go ſtill farther (z). Fuller confeſſes, in caſe he was innocent, he was in the right not to acknowledge himſelf guilty (a); and Heylin ſeems to think, thoſe who had now to do with him, would not have been ſatisfied let him have ſubſcribed what he would (b). Strype, out of reſpect to Cranmer, approves the whole proceeding, as Fox applauds it; but Biſhop Burnet, having undertaken to ſtate the matter impartially, does it accordingly, with that clearneſs which the evidence of the fact demands [X]. When the three months were fully expired, and the Biſhop remained in the ſame

'verily to have come abroad within eight or ten days; 'but when he was forgotten, and nothing ſaid unto 'him by the ſpace of one month after, he thought it 'good to put the Lords in remembrance by his letters; 'wherein, after commendations had unto them, he 'wrote as followeth: I have continued here in this 'miſerable priſon now, one year, one quarter, and 'one month, this ſame day that I write theſe my letters, with want of air to relieve my body; want of 'books to relieve my mind; want of good company 'the only ſolace of this world; and finally, want of a 'juſt cauſe why I ſhould have come hither at all. 'More of this letter came not to my hands, but that 'the Lords took it in good part, and laughed very 'merrily thereat, ſaying, he had a pleaſant head; for 'reward whereof, they gave him leave to remain 'ſtill in priſon five or ſix weeks after, without ſaying, 'or ſending any word to him; which when he con'ſidered, then he wrote to them this letter following. 'After my due commendations to your good Lord'ſhips: Howſoever the time is ſtolen from you with 'the multitude of buſineſſes, and variety of matters 'wherewith ye be travelled; whereby ye rather want 'time, as I ſuppoſe, than be glutted with it; yet with 'me, being alone comfortleſſe in this miſerable priſon, 'the time paſſeth more ſenſibly; and as the grief 'groweth in length, ſo it bringeth more encombrie 'and travell with it. And being now the time of 'Parliament, whereof I am a member, in my degree 'called unto it by writ, and not cut from it by any 'fault, but only by power kept here; it is a double 'calamity to be detained in priſon by ſo intolerable 'wrong, and excluded from this aſſembly, ſo much 'againſt right. I have ſuffered the like in the late 'Lord Protector's time, againſt all reaſon, which God 'hath given you power now to reform; and among 'many other things, which in his time wrythed amiſſe, 'no one thing, as I ſuppoſe, was of worſe example, ne 'more prejudicial to the good order of the high Court 'of Parliament, which is the direction of all mens 'lives, lands, and goods in this realm, than to allow 'for a precedent, that any one man being member 'thereof, might, without cauſe, be excluded, and ſo 'letted to parlee there his mind in publick mat'ters for the wealth of the realm, and ſuch other pri'vate cauſes as do occur. If the ſtrength of the Par'liament be not impaired by wrong in one, becauſe 'right conſiſteth not in number, it ſhall be at the 'pleaſure of him that ruleth, to do the ſame in me, 'whereby others may take more harm than I, as ex'perience hath ſhewed in ſuch examples. But I know 'it becometh me not to reaſon the ſtrength of that 'court, ne the order of it; the Lawyers of this realm 'know that, and to their knowledge I ſubmit my 'judgment, and take for good that they allow. But 'this I dare ſay, when religion is entreated in a gene'ral Council of Chriſtendome, if the rulers of the Coun'cil let any man's repaire thither, that hath right to 'be there; whatſoever is there concluded, is in the 'laws of the world abroad, taken of no force by ex'cluding of one member wrongfully, that ſhould furniſh 'the body, which I write unto your Lordſhips for the 'good opinion I have of you, truſting that ye intend 'not to uphold or follow the late Lord Protector's do'ings, by wrong, but ſo faſhion your proceedings, as 'they may agree with juſtice at home, and ſeem agree'able to reaſon to others abroad, being ſo aſſured of 'mine innocency, that when your Lordſhips ſhall hear 'what can be ſaid againſt me and mine, anſwer there'unto, there ſhall appear cauſe why I ſhould have had 'praiſe, thanks, and commendations of the late Lord 'Protector (if truth, honeſty, and due obedience might 'look therefore) and no cauſe of trouble or diſplea'ſure at all, ſo wrongfully have I been tormented in this 'priſon, ſo boldly dare I ſpeak to you of my cauſe, 'with ſuch an opinion and eſtimation of your wiſ'domes, which I know and reverence, as I ought not, 'ne would not vainly hope to abuſe you with words, 'but upon certain confidence of your indifferencies; 'verily I truſt that ye will deem and take things in 'in ſuch ſort, as being plainly, and truly opened, ſhall 'appear unto you by matter indeed. In conſideration 'whereof, I renew my ſuit unto your Lordſhips, in'ſtantly requiring you, that I may be heard according 'to juſtice, and that, with ſuch ſpeed, as the delay of 'your audience give not occaſion to ſuch as be igno'rant abroad of my matter, to think that your Lord'ſhips allowed, and approved the detaining of me here. 'Which without hearing my declaration, I truſt ye will 'not but have ſuch conſideration of me, as mine eſtate 'in the Common-Wealth; the paſſing my former life 'amongſt you, and other reſpects do require; wherein 'you ſhall bind me, and do agreeably to your honours 'and juſtice: the free courſe whereof you have ho'nourably taken upon you to make open to the realm 'without reſpect, which is the only eſtabliſhment of all 'Common-Wealths; and therefore the zeal of him 'was allowed, that ſaid, Fiat juſtitia & ruat mundus: 'ſignifying, that by it, the world is kept from falling 'indeed, although it might ſeem otherwiſe in ſome re'ſpect, and ſome trouble to ariſe in doing it. And 'this I write, becauſe in the late Lord Protector's 'time, there was an inſinuation made unto me, as 'though I were kept here by policie; which, with the 'violation of juſtice, took never good effect, as I doubt 'not of your wiſdoms ye can and will conſider, and 'do therefore accordingly; for the effectual execution 'whereof, I ſhall not fail to pray Almighty God for 'the preſervation and increaſe of your honours. From 'the Tower.

'Thus much concerning theſe letters have I thought 'good to ſet down, for that I find not the ſame other'wiſe extant, in large diſcourſes of the ſaid Biſhop's 'writings.'

ſame ſentiments, a reſolution was taken to proceed judicially againſt him, in order to deprive him of the See of Wincheſter, and what other preferments he had under the authority of the King's commiſſion, in which the Archbiſhop preſided. Theſe Commiſſioners began their proceedings December the fifteenth, and ended them February the fourteenth following (c), having had in all two and twenty ſeſſions, when the grand affair was finiſhed, and the Biſhop deprived for irreverence to the King's authority; though but a few months before they had condemned the abuſe of that authority, by thoſe in whoſe hands it then was. It was added, that he was diſobedient to the King's orders and inſtructions in eccleſiaſtical affairs; tho' he twice ſubſcribed his approbation to all that was already done, and promiſed never to diſcloſe any future ſcruples he might have but to the Privy-Council. As a further aggravation of his offences, it was ſuggeſted that he refuſed to confeſs his faults, and this matter given by Biſhop Burnet, whoſe authority in theſe points muſt be deciſive, as nothing could induce him to treat theſe ſubjects as he does, but a due reſpect for truth, which every hiſtorical writer ought to prefer to every other conſideration; it is neceſſary to obſerve, that he is entirely miſtaken as to the time of the King's ſending to the Biſhop, in which he ſuppoſes Fox to have erred, and all this from a notion, that, upon his ſubmiſſion, the Protector might have been prevailed with to ſet him at liberty; whereas, in truth, the offers that were made him, came from the Protector's enemies, who, it has been ſuggeſted, made very great uſe of the Biſhop of Wincheſter's head and hand, in bringing their deſign to bear; inſomuch that a certain author ſays (50), the original of the articles againſt him which he confeſſed, and upon which he was depoſed, or rather the draught of thoſe articles, was in Wincheſter's own hand-writing. But be that as it will, the King's own Journal very fully ſhews (51), that the firſt meſſage ſent from him to Gardiner, was June the ninth, 1550, when the Biſhop had been, within a few days, two years in priſon. Theſe points being premiſed, let us hear our right reverend author.

(50) Mr Strype aſſerts this from his own acquaintance with the hands of theſe times.

'When the Book of Common-Prayer was ſet out, 'the Lord St John, and Secretary Petre, were ſent 'with it to him, to know of him, whether he would 'conform to it or not; and they gave him great hopes 'that if he would ſubmit, the Protector would ſue to 'the King for mercy to him. He anſwered, that he 'did not know himſelf guilty of any thing that needed 'mercy: ſo he deſired to be tried for what had 'been objected to him, according to law. For the 'book, he did not think that while he was a priſoner, 'he was bound to give his opinion about ſuch things; 'it might be thought he did it againſt his conſcience 'to obtain his liberty; but if he were out of priſon, he 'ſhould either obey it, or be liable to puniſhment according to law. Upon the Duke of Somerſet's fall, 'the Lord-Treaſurer, the Earl of Warwick, Sir William Herbert, and Secretary Petre, were ſent to him: 'Fox ſays this was on the ninth of July, but there 'muſt be an error in that; for Gardiner in his anſwer 'ſays, that upon the Duke of Somerſet's coming to the 'Tower, he looked to have been let out within two 'days, and had made his farewel feaſt; but when 'theſe were with him, a month, or thereabout, had 'paſſed, ſo it muſt have been in November the former 'year. They brought him a paper, to which they 'deſired he would ſet his hand. It contained, firſt a 'preface, which was an acknowledgement of former faults, for which he had been juſtly puniſhed: 'There were alſo divers articles contained in it, which 'were touching the King's ſupremacy, his power of 'appointing or diſpenſing with holidays and faſts; 'that the Book of Common Prayer, ſet out by the 'King and Parliament, was a moſt chriſtian and godly 'book, to be allowed of by all Biſhops and Paſtors in England; and that he ſhould, both in ſermons and diſcourſes, commend it to be obſerved; that the King's 'power was compleat now, when under age, and that 'all owed obedience to him now, as much as if he 'were thirty or forty years old; that the ſix articles 'were juſtly abrogated, and that the King had full authority to correct and reform what was amiſs in the 'Church, both in England and Ireland. He only excepted to the preface, and offered to ſign all the articles, but would have had the preface left out. They 'bid him rather write on the margent his exceptions to 'it, ſo he writ, that he could not, with a good conſcience, agree to the preface, and with that exception, he ſet his hand to the whole paper. The Lords 'uſed him with great kindneſs, and gave him hope, 'that his troubles ſhould be quickly ended. Herbert 'and Petre came to him ſome time after that, but 'how ſoon is not ſo clear, and preſſed him to make 'the acknowledgement without exception; he refuſed 'it, and ſaid he would never defame himſelf; for 'when he had done it, he was not ſure, but it might 'be made uſe of againſt him as a confeſſion. Two or 'three days after that, Ridley was ſent to him, together with the other two, and they brought him new 'articles. In this paper, the acknowledgement was 'more general than in the former: It was ſaid here in 'the preface, that he had been ſuſpected of not approving the King's proceedings, and being appointed 'to preach, had not done it as he ought to have done, 'and ſo deſerved the King's diſpleaſure, for which he 'was ſorry: the articles related to the Pope's Supremacy, the ſuppreſſion of abbies and chantries, pilgrimages, maſſes, images; the adoring the Sacrament; the communion in both kinds; the aboliſhing 'the old books, and bringing in the new book of ſervice, and that for ordaining of Prieſts and Biſhops; 'the compleatneſs of the ſcripture, and the uſe of it in 'the vulgar tongue; the lawfulneſs of Clergymens 'marriage; and to Eraſmus's Paraphraſe, that it had 'been on good conſiderations ordered to be ſet up in 'Churches. He read all theſe, and ſaid, he deſired 'firſt to be diſcharged of his impriſonment, and then 'he would freely anſwer them all, ſo as to ſtand by it, 'and ſuffer if he did amiſs, but he would trouble himſelf with no more articles while he remained in priſon, ſince he deſired not to be delivered out of his 'troubles in the way of mercy, but of juſtice.

'After that he was brought before the Council, and 'the Lords told him, that they ſate by a ſpecial commiſſion to judge him, and ſo required him to ſubſcribe the articles that had been ſent him. He prayed 'them earneſtly to put him to a trial for the grounds of 'his impriſonment, and when that was over, he would 'clearly anſwer them in all other things: but he did 'not think he could ſubſcribe all the articles after one 'ſort, ſome of them being about laws already made, 'which he could not qualifie; others of them being 'matters of learning, in which he might uſe more 'freedom: in concluſion, he deſired leave to take 'them with him, and he would conſider how to anſwer them. But they required him to ſubſcribe them 'all, without any qualification; which he refuſed to 'do. Upon this, the fruits of his Biſhoprick were ſequeſtred, and he was required to conform himſelf to 'their orders within three months, upon pain of deprivation; and the liberty he had of walking in ſome 'open galleries, when the Duke of Norfolk was not in 'them, was taken from him, and he was again ſhut 'up in his chamber.

'All this was much cenſured, as being contrary to 'the liberties of Engliſhmen, and the forms of all legal 'proceedings. It was thought very hard to put a man 'in priſon upon a complaint againſt him, and without 'any further enquiry into it, after two years durance, 'to put articles to him. And they which ſpoke freely 'ſaid, it favoured too much of the Inquiſition. But 'the Canon Law not being rectified, and the King 'being in the Pope's room, there were ſome things 'gathered from the Canon Law, and the way of proceeding ex officio, which rather excuſed, than juſtified this hard meaſure he met with.' The ſequel of this buſineſs ſhall be related in it's proper place.

and ſubmit himſelf to the King's mercy; tho' he alledged firſt his innocence, which entitled him to receive from the King's juſtice what it was ſuppoſed he ought to accept as his mercy; and next, that he was not ſure of this mercy if inclined to ſubmit, but had reaſon to fear this confeſſion might be made a ground for conviction, where he knew there was a defect of evidence. He complained that thoſe who committed him were to be his judges, and conſequently their own; that he was charged for diſobedience to ſome of them, who in this caſe were proſecutors as well as parties and judges; and that the whole was the contrivance of men who had been long his enemies, and who, after failing in many ſchemes, hoped to prevail in this, to his deſtruction (d). But as a particular detail of this matter would detain us too long, ſo ſome curious points, ſupported by unqueſtionable evidence, will be found at the bottom of the page [Y]. It is no wonder that the Romaniſts dwell ſo much on theſe proceedings, or that they are ſo ſlightly paſſed over by ſome of our own Hiſtorians, becauſe they are apparently indefenſible upon any conſtitutional principles, and can only be excuſed in the lump, by alledging that all was done to gratify a party; lay open the rich Biſhoprick of Wincheſter to be canton'd amongſt Clergy and Laity, ſo that Dr Ponet had only the title and two thouſand marks a year, inſtead of being poſſeſſed of the temporalities as his predeceſſors held them; and to keep an old man faſt in priſon, whom they knew not how to manage out. For this, if conſidered in any other light, was by no means reconcilable to law of any kind, much leſs to any notions of liberty; ſince in effect it was delivering up both Church and State into the hands of a few ambitious and avaricious men (e), who, when they had trampled on others, fell out amongſt themſelves about the ſpoil, and, by the natural conſequences of their irregular adminiſtration, made way for their own deſtruction in the iſſue; as at the very time it revived the cauſe of Popery, and the hopes of Papiſts [Z]. Biſhop Gardiner himſelf very prudently laid the [Y] Will be found at the bottom of the page.] It is very probable, that having once determined to deprived him of all his preferments for his contempt, they began to conſider what that contempt was, and framed an order about it, expreſſed in ſuch terms as they judged convenient, which was to paſs for the order upon which he was committed, and be made the foundation of all their ſubſequent proceedings. This is indeed a very ſtrange fact, and to which no credit could be given, if it was not reported by Biſhop Burnet, from the Council Book, where he diſcovered it by the orders being ſigned Bedford, amongſt other Counſellors; but that noble peer recollecting that he had not his title at the time the order was dated, ſtruck it out again, and ſubſcribed J. Ruſſel; we have from the ſame writer, a ſhort but very ſatisfactory account of the proceedings in that great cauſe, upon which though Collier makes ſome remarks, yet he does not treat the point ſo fairly or ſo fully as Biſhop Burnet, whoſe words are theſe.

(52) Hiſt. of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 165.

'There was a commiſſion iſſued out (52) to the 'Archbiſhop, the Biſhops of London, Ely, and Lincoln, Secretary Petre, Judge Hales, Griffith and Leyſon, two Civilians, and Goodrick and Gofnold, two 'Maſters of Chancery, to proceed againſt Gardiner, for 'his contempt in the matters formerly objected to him. 'He put in a compurgation, by which he endeavoured 'to ſhew there was malice borne to him, and conſpiracies 'againſt him, as appeared by the buſineſs of Sir Henry 'Knevet, mentioned in the former part, and the 'leaving him out of the late King's will, which he ſaid 'was procured by his enemies. He complained of his 'long impriſonment without any trial, and that articles of one ſort after another were brought to him, 'ſo that it was plain, he was not detained for any 'crime, but to try if ſuch uſage could force him to do 'any thing that ſhould be impoſed on him. He declared, that what order ſoever were ſet out by 'the King's Council, he ſhould never ſpeak againſt it, 'but to the Council themſelves; and that though he 'could not give conſent to the changes before they 'were made, he was now well ſatisfied to obey them, 'but he would never make any acknowledgement of 'any fault. The things chiefly laid againſt him were, 'that, being required, he refuſed to preach concerning 'the King's power when he was under age; and that 'he had affronted preachers ſent by the King into his 'dioceſe, and had been negligent in obeying the 'King's injunctions, and continued after all ſo obſtinate, that he would not confeſs his fault, nor aſk the 'King mercy, His crimes were aggravated by this, 'that his timely-aſſerting the King's power under age, 'might have been a great means for preventing the 'rebellion and effuſion of blood which had afterwards 'happened chiefly on that pretence, to which his obſtinacy had given no ſmall occaſion. Upon this, 'many witneſſes were examined, chiefly the Duke of 'Somerſet, the Earls of Wiltſhire and Bedford, who 'depoſed againſt him. But to this he anſwered, that 'he was not required to do it by any order of Council, 'but only in a private diſcourſe, to which he did not 'think himſelf bound to give obedience. Other witneſſes were alſo examined on the other particulars. 'But he appealed from the Delegates to the King in 'perſon. Yet his Judges on the (*) eighteenth of 'April, gave ſentence againſt him; by which, for his 'diſobedience and contempt, they deprived him of his 'Biſhoprick.'

(*) It ſhould be the 14th of Feb.

It is to be obſerved, that Gardiner always inſiſted, that theſe proceedings in the King's minority, would produce ſuch diſturbances; that the King's ſupremacy had been ſworn to, but that the Council's ſupremacy was a new point, and this it was which he declined preaching to the people. But it was not deprivation alone that would content Gardiner's enemies, more eſpecially ſince by his proteſtation he ſhewed plainly that he did not deſpair of having this matter reviewed, and therefore they went farther, as Strype tells us (53), and on the next day the Council made the following order, which he tranſcribed from the book. 'For as 'much as it appeared he had at all times before the 'judges of his cauſe, uſed himſelf unreverently to the 'King's Majeſty, and ſlanderfully towards his Council, 'and eſpecially yeſterday, being the day of his judgment given againſt him, he called his Judges hereticks 'and ſacramentaries, they being there the King's 'Commiſſioners and of his Highneſs's Council; it was 'therefore ordered by the whole board, that he ſhould be 'removed from the lodging he hath now in the Tower, 'to a meaner lodging, and none to wait upon him but 'one by the Lieutenant's appointment, in ſuch ſort, as 'by the reſort of any man to him, he have not the liberty to ſend out to any man, or to hear from any 'man. And likewiſe that his books and papers be 'taken from him and ſeen; and that from henceforth, 'he have neither pen, ink, nor paper, to write his deteſtable purpoſes, but be ſequeſtred from all conferences, and from all means that may ſerve him to practiſe 'any way.' But in proceſs of time, very probably the rigour of this order might be diſpenſed with.

[Z] Revived the cauſe of Popery, and the hopes of Papiſts.] This, though a matter little regarded by modern writers, is in reality a thing of great conſequence, in reſpect to the hiſtory of thoſe times. Contemporary writers on both ſides agree, that theſe proceedings of King Edward's Miniſters had this effect, and that thoſe who were bigotted Papiſts, ſhewed their joy the weight of the whole on the Delegates who deprived him, and, by proteſting and appealing to the King, ſhewed plainly that all the hopes of redreſs he had lay in the Crown, and muſt ſpring from the exerciſe of that ſupremacy to which they repreſented him as an enemy. He could not, however, avoid ſeeing, as he was a conſummate ſtateſman, that the Politicians made tools in this tranſaction of the Prelates, and were making large ſteps towards ſuch a depreſſion of the Church, as would make it entirely dependant on the Crown and it's Miniſters, with ſuch a ſhew of it's antient privileges as might enable thoſe who commanded it to have an uncontroulable power over the legiſlature, which, how plauſibly ſoever it may be defended by ſuch as have an intereſt in it at the time, will be ever eſteemed a dangerous thing by intelligent and impartial perſons. Our eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians have been moſt of them aware of this (f), but unwilling to own it, becauſe they were afraid it might reflect on ſome of the great men amongſt our firſt Reformers; whereas in truth nothing can do them ſo much ſervice as ſetting this fact right, and ſhewing they were outwitted by perſons who pretended zeal for the Reformation, and yet had no religion, or were Papiſts in their hearts. It is no wonder that they were not politicians, much leſs is it criminal; on the contrary, their ſimplicity, in this reſpect, is their true and beſt excuſe. All the blame that can be juſtly laid upon them, is, that they ever ſuffered themſelves to be drawn into ſchemes, the bottom of which they could not underſtand, or foreſee the conſequences (g) [AA]. All the remaining part of this reign Biſhop Gardiner remained in the ſame

joy and ſatisfaction at theſe proſecutions. They drove ſome of the ableſt and greateſt men out of the Church, as Gardiner, Tonſtall, and Day, who had ſhewn themſelves very well affected to ſome of the principal points of the Reformation; and who, if they had gone on complying as they would have done, would in time have both ſtrengthened themſelves and drawn in others (54). Gardiner particularly had declared himſelf on the point of Supremacy very fully; which they took the moſt effectual method to make him repent; he had acknowledged, that though men were married, they might continue Prieſts, though, for prudential reaſons, he thought that the marriages of Clergymen ſhould be diſcouraged, that they might live the better, and exerciſe greater hoſpitality out of their revenues. He was a ſtrenuous advocate for the real preſence in the ſacrament, yet diſclaimed Tranſubſtantiation, and was for the communion in both kinds. He wrote againſt treating images irreverently, but juſtified the taking them away upon due proof of their being abuſed. In reference to Juſtification, he declared himſelf clearly on his deathbed, but profeſſed it ought to be taught with caution to the people, to prevent their falling into fanaticiſm and running away with a notion, that if they believed in Chriſt. they might be ſaved, though they did not live like Chriſtians. Sir John Harrington (55) therefore had reaſon to ſay, that he was a Catholick Proteſtant, or a proteſting Catholic, that is, he had given ſuch proofs of his willingneſs to adhere unto and proceed in the Reformation; that if he had not been treated as he was, he might have been highly ſerviceable; whereas by theſe ſevere, and in ſome reſpects irregular, proceedings, King Edward's Miniſters actually provided inſtruments for Queen Mary, who otherwiſe might have found none, and furniſhed a colourable pretence for what was afterwards done againſt themſelves.

(54) This was once Archbiſhop Cranmer's opinion.

(55) Brief View of the State of the Church of Eng. p. 43.

Another injury that the Proteſtant Religion received, was in the ſpoiling the Biſhopricks, which were thus rendered vacant, which was either done under colour of the King's authority, or by the perſons who accepted them; and this countenanced the clamours of the Papiſts, that all was done out of temporal views, and that men pretended a quarrel to the doctrines, that they might get at the lands of the Church. If there had been no cauſe given for theſe complaints, if the Biſhop of Wincheſter had been encouraged to proceed as he did immediately after he came out of the Fleet, in officiating as the law directed (56), and preaching the King's authority to remove what was amiſs in the ceremonies and diſcipline of the Church, and the great men had ſhewn themſelves as zealous Proteſtants in their lives, as they were in their profeſſions, without carving for themſelves eſtates out of what belonged to the Biſhops ſees, which had not been done in the time of Henry the Eighth, and which it was both unwiſe and unſafe to do in the time of a minority, all the troubles the nation ſuffered might have been avoided; the young King's uncles, and perhaps the young King himſelf, might have lived much longer; the unjuſt attempt to alter the ſucceſſion, the conſequences of which were ſo fatal to many noble and not a few innocent perſons, would never have been thought neceſſary (57); and the Reformation would have been ſo effectually eſtabliſhed, that even the eccleſiaſticks would have been againſt alterations.

[AA] Or foreſee the conſequences.] There is not any period in the Engliſh Hiſtory, where one who ſearches for truth, finds himſelf more at a loſs which road to take, than in the ſhort reign of Edward the Sixth; and the reaſon is, becauſe moſt of our Hiſtorians have written ſyſtematically, and have laboured to reduce all the characters they met with, into ſuch forms as might make them beſt ſuit with their reſpective plans. In ſome we find the Protector Somerſet repreſented as one of the wiſeſt, beſt, and mildeſt governors this nation ever had (58), and brought to an untimely end by the artifices of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, who is made one of the greateſt monſters that ever lived. In others, that Duke is repreſented as a weak man, whom Dudley governed till he had made him do ſo many exorbitant and unpopular things, as ſhewed him unfit to be truſted longer with the adminiſtration, and then took the government upon himſelf (59). The truth of the matter is, they were both ambitious men, and both laboured to ſupport their power by gratifying their dependants.

(58) See Holinſh. d. Burnet, Stry.e,

(59) See Hayward's Edward VI.

As for theſe dependants, whatever there might be of piety and true religion in ſome few of them, yet the major part were governed only by their intereſts, and would ſupport any man or any ſcheme by which theſe might be promoted. Somerſet began to make free with the Church, and by that means raiſed fortunes for himſelf and his family, in which he perſiſted, when he came a ſecond time into favour, and took up the thread of the Biſhop of Wincheſter's proſecution, juſt where he dropped it when depoſed from his Protectorate. In this he was ſupported by Northumberland and the reſt of the Council, who had views of the ſame kind, and they ſhewed great reſpect to Cranmer and the Divines he brought into the Church, becauſe they found them men eaſily over-reached, and who thought they did no wrong in obeying whatever directions came to them from the Crown. Some likewiſe were really of opinion, that large revenues and a conſiderable meaſure of temporal power, were hindrances to their miniſtry, and were therefore the leſs uneaſy in making ſuch conceſſions as they apprehended would beſt bind the great men to keep out Popery; but it is certain they had no jealouſy that many of theſe potent courtiers, and particularly thoſe of Northumberland's faction, were very far from having any hearty concern for that faith which they profeſſed; and conſequently preferred getting eſtates at the expence of the Church, to the making proviſions for the ſecurity of the Church, which they pretended to leave to the management of Cranmer and his friends, only that they might ſerve themſelves of him and them at particular conjunctures, without troubling themſelves much about futurity.

One

ſame ſtate, that is, a cloſe priſoner in the Tower, and yet not ſo ſtrictly kept, at leaſt all the latter part of the time, as the order of Council ſeemed to require; for certain it is, that, in this ſpace, he not only wrote many controverſial pieces, but alſo compoſed variety of Latin poems, and tranſlated into verſe ſeveral beautiful paſſages in the books of Eccleſiaſtes, Wiſdom, Job, and other poetical parts of the Old Teſtament (b). He alſo kept up his ſpirits all that time, and was wont to ſay very confidently, as either believing it or deſiring to be thought to believe it, that he ſhould live to ſee another turn, and another Court in which he ſhould be as great as ever (i). On the death of King Edward no doubt he foreſaw that turn was near, notwithſtanding the new Court ſet up in his neighbourhood for that unfortunate Lady, Queen Jane. On the nineteenth of July 1553, Queen Mary was publickly proclaimed by that very Council which the day before owned the right of her competitor, and gave her the coarſe and injurious title of Baſtard of Henry VIII (k). On the third of Auguſt the Queen made her ſolemn entry into the Tower, when Biſhop Gardiner, in the name of himſelf and his fellow-priſoners, the Duke of Norfolk, the Ducheſs of Somerſet, the Lord Courtney, and others of high rank, made a congratulatory ſpeech to her Majeſty, who gave them all their liberties (l). On the eighth of the ſame month he performed, in the Queen's preſence, the obſequies for the late King Edward, whoſe body was buried at Weſtminſter, with the Engliſh ſervice, by Archbiſhop Cranmer, the funeral ſermon being preached by Biſhop Day (m). On the ninth, Biſhop Gardiner went to Wincheſter-Houſe, in Southwark, after a confinement of ſomewhat more than five years (n). On the twenty-third he was declared Chancellor of England, tho' his patent did not paſs till the twenty-firſt of September (o). On the firſt of October he had the honour of crowning the Queen (p), and on the fifth of the ſame month he opened the firſt Parliament in her reign (q). By this time he was in poſſeſſion again of his academical honours; for as at the beginning of his misfortunes the Univerſity of Cambridge elected in his place the Duke of Somerſet, and on his fall the Duke of Northumberland; ſo when he fell they rechoſe the Biſhop of Wincheſter for their Chancellor, and reſtored him alſo to his headſhip of Trinity-Hall, then poſſeſſed by Dr Mowſe (r). At this juncture, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, either thro' the Queen's eſteem for, and confidence in, him; or, as ſome ſuggeſt, tho' without any great evidence, thro' the recommendation of Charles V, was poſſeſſed of a larger compaſs of Civil and Eccleſiaſtical power, than any Engliſh Miniſter ever enjoyed, except Cardinal Wolſey; and in his management of this, in all it's various branches, tho' taken from ſo long an impriſonment, and labouring under the weight of ſo great an age as ſeventy, his bittereſt enemies muſt allow he gave indubitable marks of ſuperior talents (s). If contriving to accompliſh, and that in a ſhort time, things ſo great and difficult as to ſurpaſs

One cannot help looking with ſome ſurprize upon the conduct of Archbiſhop Cranmer in this buſineſs. Strype ſhews, from the Council Book, that he preſided, and was very active in the Biſhop of Wincheſter's deprivation, and for the trouble therein, received four hundred marks (60). He was particularly objected to by Wincheſter as his perſonal enemy, and both before and after, was engaged in a controverſy with him about the ſacrament. Biſhop Burnet, makes an apology for him, which deſerves to be conſidered. 'He was, 'ſays he, naturally a man of bowels and compaſſion, 'and did not love to drive things to extremities; he 'conſidered that men who had grown old in ſome errors, could not eaſily lay them down, and ſo were by 'degrees to be worn out of them. Only in the proceedings againſt Gardiner and Bonner, he was carried beyond his ordinary temper. But Gardiner he knew to 'be ſo inveterate a Papiſt, and ſo deep a diſſembler, 'that he was for throwing him out, not ſo much for the 'particulars objected to him, as upon the ill character 'he had of him. Bonner had alſo deceived him ſo 'formerly, and had been ſo cruel a perſecutor upon 'the ſtatute of the ſix articles, and was become ſo brutal and luxurious, that he judged it neceſſary to 'purge the Church of him. And the Sees of London 'and Wincheſter were of ſuch conſequence, that he 'was induced, for having theſe well ſupplied, to 'ſtretch a little in theſe proceedings againſt thoſe diſſembling Biſhops.'

(60) Hiſt. of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 163.

If theſe were really the maxims upon which he acted, they were certainly very indifferent ones, whether conſidered in the light of Chriſtian prudence, or of civil policy. For to aſſume a power of judging of men's hearts, contrary to their declarations and ſubſcriptions, which were all that the law required; and to think that ſuch a conſtruction could juſtify a legal deprivation, is not very reconcilable to religious principles, and with reſpect to maxims of policy, ſuch proceedings were ſtill worſe, becauſe they eſtabliſhed the moſt dangerous precedents, and left every thing open to the will and pleaſure of ſuch as were inveſted with power, as thoſe who abetted this proſecution afterwards felt to their coſt. But the truth of the matter ſeems to be, that Archbiſhop Cranmer was not either a great lawyer, or a profound politician, which induced him to follow the ſentiments of others, of whoſe abilities he had a good opinion, to which perhaps, he might be the more inclined from the rectitude of his own intentions, and from a charitable apprehenſion, that other men were as upright as himſelf, in which, not in this inſtance only, but in many others, he was ſadly deceived.

For, in reality, he was the dupe of the Great in this buſineſs, and while he flattered himſelf that they aſſiſted him in his views for the Church, he was in fact doing theirs at the expence of the Church. The Duke of Somerſet had beſides the Admiral, another brother, Sir Henry Seymour, to whom he was deſirous ſome good eſtate might come; and therefore Dr Ponet, who was raiſed to the See of Wincheſter upon the deprivation of Gardiner, was hardly warm in it, before he conveyed to this Sir Henry Seymour the ſtately palace of Marwel, with the lordſhip and park belonging thereto, and alſo that of Twyford. There was another nobleman too, the Earl of Wiltſhire, afterwards Marquis of Wincheſter, who had a good ſtroke at the lands of this See, Biſhop Ponet conveying to him the palace, park, and manor of Waltham, with ſome good farms in the neighbourhood (61). But unluckily for theſe able politicians, Gardiner ſurvived, recovered his dignity, and recovered alſo to his See, theſe and other lands granted away during the time it was taken from him. This ſcheme was carried ſtill farther, upon depriving Dr Cuthbert Tonſtall, of the Biſhoprick of Durham, the Biſhoprick itſelf being diſſolved (62), with intent to raiſe a vaſt temporal eſtate to the great man who then ruled all, but this likewiſe proved abortive by the death of King Edward.

paſs all mens expectations, be, as the world ſeems agreed they are, ſure ſigns of ſuperior talents [BB]. The Queen is ſaid, by moſt of our Hiſtorians, to have recommended three great points to the Biſhop of Wincheſter's care, with equal concern, all of which were attended with almoſt equal difficulties; the firſt was, the clearing the legitimacy of her birth, and annulling the divorce of her mother; tho' this was apparently baſtardizing her ſiſter, and preſumptive ſucceſſor. The next was, reſtoring the old religion, and reconciling the nation to Rome, in the ſame manner as before her father's deſertion. The third was, obtaining the conſent of Parliament to her marriage with Prince Philip; which was ſo unpopular, that the former Houſe of Commons prepared an addreſs to the Queen not to marry a foreigner (t). Amongſt all the ſecret and open obſtacles, which were not a few, that our Miniſter had to overcome in the proſecution of theſe meaſures, none probably gave him more trouble than getting over his own diſlike to every one of them. The procuring the divorce was the firſt ſervice he rendered the father; and now reverſing this divorce, and branding all who had been concerned in it, was the firſt ſervice required by the daughter. He [BB] Be ſure ſigns of ſuperior talents] It may perhaps be truly ſaid, that Gardiner was the wiſeſt and moſt fortunate, as Cecil was the worthieſt and moſt ſteady, of Engliſh Miniſters. The greater part of Queen Mary's reign was full of uneaſineſs and misfortunes, but neither began till after the death of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, whoſe adminiſtration was a perfect triumph, which muſt not be underſtood over his enemies, for that would be falſe as well as fulſome flattery; but over all the obſtacles he met with, and never Miniſter met with greater. Auguſt the third, 1553, he was diſcharged from his impriſonment, and took his ſeat in the Queen's Council, where he was Prime-Miniſter from the time he entered it, though he was not declared Chancellor till about three weeks after, and had not his patent before the time mentioned in the text. He was a man of ſuch comprehenſive parts, that every thing was preſent to him; and, which is ſtill more extraordinary, whatever he did, was ſo done, that it looked as if he attended to nothing elſe.

He ſaw the kingdom in great confuſion, and the Queen ſurrounded by an army, but he loved not ſtanding forces, and beſides her coffers would not afford it; he diſbanded them therefore, and provided for the Queen's ſecurity by paper. He penned firſt a proclamation for quieting people's minds in reſpect to the diſputes in Church and State, forbidding the abuſive words Papiſt and Heretick, ſpeaking fair to both parties, and prohibiting any raſh acts of loyalty, by injuring thoſe who had been concerned in ſupporting Queen Jane. To prevent deſpair, and to give a high idea of the Queen's clemency, a pardon was granted to the Duke of Suffolk, who had perſwaded his daughter to take the title of Queen, after he had been four days in the Tower. The Biſhop of Wincheſter had a conference alſo with the Duke of Northumberland, who it is ſaid told him, he was deſirous of living, if it were in a mouſe-hole; to which the Biſhop replied, that inſtead of a mouſe-hole, he would be glad to ſpare him one of his palaces, but that he would do well to prepare for the worſt; it is reported that he interceded for him to the Queen, but ſhe was not inclined to ſpare him, and indeed it could not be expected (63).

(63) Burnet, Strype, Echard. Father Perſons's Warn-word, P. 43

That the people might not be too much alarmed with the execution of that nobleman, and ſome of his followers, or conceive harſh ideas of the new reign, there iſſued about that time two proclamations, one for the regulation of the coin as far as it could be regulated, with a promiſe of what amendment ſhould follow in that reſpect; the other for remitting a tax granted to King Edward (64), and though in itſelf this was a very acceptable act of grace, yet it was ſenſibly hightened and improved by the manner of doing it; the Proclamation ſetting forth, that ſhe graciouſly conſidering the good wills, forwardneſs, and hearty diſpoſitions of her true loving ſubjects, always heretofore exhibited to the aid and ſuccour of the commonweal, with their proper ſubſtance and goods, when the ſervice, the neceſſity and honour of the realm had ſo required, as well in the times of her father and brother, but eſpecially ſince the time of her vocation to the crown, in the defence of her royal perſon, againſt the malicious force of the moſt arrant traytor Sir John Dudley, late Duke of Northumberland, and his complices: notwithſtanding it was well known to the multitude of her ſaid good ſubjects, how by the evil government of the realm in thoſe late years, eſpecially ſince the ſaid Duke had borne rule, the treaſure of the ſame was marvellouſly exhauſted; and ſhe now preſently charged with payment of notable great ſums, being the debts of her ſaid brother the King, partly due to divers of her ſervants and ſubjects, and partly to certain merchant ſtrangers and others; which for her own honour, and the honour of the realm, ſhe determined, by the help of God, truly to diſcharge, content, and pay in times convenient and reaſonable. That yet having a ſpecial mind to the weal of her ſubjects, and accounting their loving hearts and proſperity as her own weal, and the chiefeſt treaſure that ſhe deſired next the favour and grace of God; and having a full affiance in her ſaid ſubjects, that if the ſtate, the cauſe and honour of the realms ſhould ſo require, they would at all times hereafter, exhibit their ſemblable ſervice, though in the latter ſeſſion of the ſaid Parliament, holden in the time of the ſaid King Edward, towards the payment and diſcharge of the ſaid notable debts were granted, two diſmes and two fifteens, and one ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound, to be raiſed and levied of the manors, lands, and tenements; and two ſhillings eight-pence of the goods and chattles of her ſubjects, which grants were now due unto her by the ſame act, and would diſcharge one great piece of the ſaid debts. Her Majeſty of her mere grace and great clemency for the relief and ſuccour of her ſaid good ſubjects, had freely for her, her heirs and ſucceſſors, pardoned and remitted to them the ſaid ſubſidy of four ſhillings the pound, and two ſhillings eight pence the pound. Truſting her good ſubjects would have loving conſideration thereof, whom ſhe required heartily to bend themſelves wholly to ſerve God to his glory, with continual prayer for the honour and advancement of her grace and the common-weal. There is no doubt made, that theſe proclamations were drawn by the pen of Biſhop Gardiner, who by this means, in ſome meaſure, removed the jealouſies that had been conceived of Queen Mary, and eſtabliſhed in the minds of the common people at leaſt, a firm hope, that, in matters of property, the Queen would be both punctual and juſt to her ſubjects, and gentle and moderate in her demands from them.

(64) Copied from the Proclamation.

The ſame prudent dexterity was viſible in the conduct of the firſt Seſſion of the firſt Parliament in that reign, in which there paſſed but one publick and two private bills, all three acts of grace (65). The firſt was for aboliſhing thoſe laws paſſed in the reign of Henry the Eighth, by which new treaſons were enacted, and under colour of which, as this law for repealing them recited, ſeveral perſons of high rank had been condemned and put to death for words, or for very ſlight and doubtful offences. Of the two private bills, one was for reſtoring in blood, Lord Edward Courtney, whom the Queen had created Earl of Devonſhire; and the other for reſtoring in like manner, the Lady Gertrude Courtney, widow of the Marquis of Exeter, executed in the reign of King Henry, and theſe matters diſpatched, both houſes were prorogued on the twenty-firſt of October, for a few days, that it might be ſaid in this firſt Seſſion of her firſt Parliament, the Queen had done all for, without demanding any thing from, her people.

He had alſo aſſiſted, promoted, and defended, the King's ſupremacy, which made way for all that followed, as much or more than any in the kingdom, and had the reputation alſo of penning what was publiſhed in defence of that Prince's marriage with Anne Bolleyn, and all that happened thereupon, which was now to be condemned as null and illegal. Beſides, ſo far as we are guided by unqueſtionable authorities, this ſeems to have been going greater lengths than he intended; for hitherto he had not entered into correſpondence with the Pope, or done any thing in eccleſiaſtical affairs but in virtue of the Queen's ſupremacy, an authority more agreeable to his ſyſtem of Divinity than that of the Roman Pontiff; but in that particular the Queen was inflexible, and her paſſion as ſtrong to relinquiſh this title to the Pope, as her father's ambition was to take it from him (u). The Spaniſh match croſſed the mind of Wincheſter, as much as it did that of the nation; he foreſaw the many troubles would follow from it, and that the Queen would enjoy none of that felicity with which ſhe flattered herſelf in the proſpect. But he well knew what a temper ſhe inherited from her parents, and that ſhe would find miniſters enough to carry into execution all that ſhe propoſed; he knew of how great importance this was to the kingdom, and that the manner of doing theſe things was almoſt as material as the points themſelves, ſince, if any means could be found to mitigate their malignity, it muſt be by a proper regulation of the conditions attending them (w). Upon this conſideration therefore, joined to a ſenſe of his own danger from what was paſſed if a new revolution happened, he reſolved to remain where he was, and employ his utmoſt ſkill to render the meaſures of Queen Mary's reign as beneficial to herſelf, and as little burthenſome to her people, as in their nature they could be; tho' it is certain he was not able to prevent all the evil, or do all the good, he could wiſh (x). The Convocation being aſſembled, he procured ſuch queſtions to be moved there, as he judged conducive to the change he propoſed to make; yet went no farther than declaring the Real Preſence in the Sacrament, which made way for reviving the old ſervice on the twenty-firſt of December (y). In Parliament he went the ſame pace, repealing, by a ſingle law, nine acts paſſed in the reign of King Edward, all reſpecting religion; by which thoſe who were of that religion, countenanced by Henry VIII, became as ſafe as they could wiſh, and even the groſſeſt Papiſts were out of danger, yet not reſtored to power (z). The Queen's legitimacy was eſtabliſhed, the divorce declared null and void, the whole fault being thrown upon Archbiſhop Cranmer, againſt all truth and juſtice, ſince Gardiner had to the full as great a ſhare therein as he, tho' now Chancellor of England and Prime-Miniſter, while the other was attainted of high-treaſon, by a bill paſſed this ſeſſions; but to make that venerable Prelate ſome amends, upon an humble letter acknowledging his fault in the buſineſs of Queen Jane, he received a pardon (a). Theſe extraordinary changes were wrought rather by addreſs and fair ſpeeches, than by violence or corruption, though ſome of our writers ſay the contrary. As to force, the Queen, a few guards excepted, had none; and her caſe as to money was the ſame, tho' the Biſhop of Wincheſter was a frugal Miniſter (b). But what ſeems to put corruption out of the queſtion in this Parliament, is, that, after all, the members could not be brought to reliſh the Queen's marriage to Don Philip, and therefore, the Chancellor adviſed the diſſolving this Aſſembly before the cloſe of the year. And thus two of the three great points were accompliſhed [CC]. But much [CC] And thus two of the three great points were accompliſhed.] According to the character of Queen Mary, as it ſtands in Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory, we find zeal for religion was the ruling inclination of her mind; and that the firſt purpoſe after her acceſſion, was reſtoring the old worſhip, in which ſhe was ſure of being ſupported by many of the nobility, clergy, and gentry; and it is highly probable, that the Biſhop of Wincheſter ſhewed as much willingneſs thereto as any of the reſt. The queſtion however is, how far he meant to go, and whether his true deſign was to bring back the whole of Popery, or only to reduce things to the ſtate in which they were at the death of King Henry. If we truſt to what moſt authors have written, we muſt believe that the former was his great view, as well as that of his miſtreſs; but if we examine his actions, which is the ſureſt way of judging of a wiſe man's ſentiments, we ſhall ſee reaſon to conclude, that he aimed at the latter; it is acknowledged, that he diſliked the coming of Pole into England; it is certain that he procured nothing to be done, either in the Convocation or the Parliament, that went farther than his old maſter's regulations; and it is likewiſe owned, that when the Queen ſent Pole an account of the great things, which as ſhe apprehended had been carried for her in the ſecond ſeſſion of her firſt Parliament, he was far enough from ſeeing thoſe things in that light that ſhe did (66). He complained, that in the act for repealing her mother's divorce, there was no notice taken of the inſult offered to the See of Rome; nor in the other act, repealing the laws of King Edward, any proviſion made for returning again to the obedience of the See of Rome. May we not then doubt, whether Gardiner ever intended it?

Before this Parliament was called many things had been done, and the Queen had iſſued various commiſſions, as ſupreme head of the Church, and this title was alſo uſed in the writ for calling the Parliament, though afterwards laid aſide. It is alſo ſaid, that Biſhop Gardiner cauſed Pole's journey into England to be ſtopt, that he ſuggeſted receiving him with the title of the Pope's Legate, was hurrying on things too faſt, and that he procured from the Emperor Charles the Fifth, ſome intimations of the ſame kind, which diſpoſed Queen Mary to liſten altogether to his advice, inſtead of receiving Italian Counſels, againſt which ſhe had been cautioned by his Imperial Majeſty. Upon theſe motives, Pole became, and continued, his enemy, as long as they continued together in the world. It is however very true, that our Biſhop altered his conduct afterwards, that he received this Cardinal as the Pope's Legate, with the higheſt marks of honour, that he preached a famous ſermon at Paul's Croſs (67), upon the reconciling of the nation to the Pope; and if he was not the author, had at leaſt a great ſhare in that bloody perſecution which enſued againſt the Proteſtants. Againſt theſe accuſations there is no defending him, and yet ſome things may be ſaid in alleviation of his offences.

He made no great haſte in reſtoring Popery, or in calling Cardinal Pole as the Pope's Legate; he did not expreſs

(66) So he expreſſes himſelf in a Letter to the Queen, in which he warns her to beware of preferring motives of Policy to motives of Religion.

(67) Of which ſome account will be given.

much greater difficulties were to be ſurmounted before the third could be brought to bear. The marriage treaty was left entirely in the hands of Biſhop Gardiner, and it is allowed he managed it very dextrouſly. He made uſe of the great reluctance ſhewn by the laſt Parliament, to procure ſuch articles as might ſecure the nation againſt the ambition of Philip and his Spaniards; and foreſeeing expences might follow upon this match, notwithſtanding the hard bargain he had made, he procured, as is ſaid, half a million ſterling from the Emperor, to facilitate the approbation of a new Parliament. But while theſe preparations employed thoſe in the cabinet, ſuch as abhorred this match were contriving very formidable meaſures for it's diſappointment. Sir Thomas Wiat of Kent, and Sir Peter Carew of Cornwall, laid the plan of a deep and dangerous inſurrection, in which the unfortunate Duke of Suffolk had juſt ſhare enough to bring his own head, and, which was much more to be regretted, the heads of Lady Jane and her huſband Lord Guilford Dudley, to the block. The whole ſcheme miſcarried by the ill management, and, to ſay the truth, the want of honeſty in the Chiefs (c). Sir Peter Carew declared before the time fixed, and was eaſily ſubdued; this forced out Sir Thomas Wiat before he was ready. Yet he was very near carrying his point, and might have carried it if he had uſed leſs artifice; but he carried his declarations of duty to the Queen ſo high, that thoſe who were in the firſt digeſtion of his enterprize were afraid to join him; ſo that at length his forces were broken, and he ſurrendered. Sir George Harper betrayed the whole conſpiracy, and explained all the ſecret correſpondencies on which thoſe who embarked in it had depended (d). Sir Thomas alſo behaved meanly, and talked of diſcoveries to ſave his life. When he found that was impracticable, he recanted, and denied the truth of what he had ſaid. But, notwithſtanding this, ſome perſons of the higheſt rank ſuffered deeply, either by his perfidy or puſillanimity; and it is one of the heavieſt charges againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter, that he gave credit, or ſeemed to give credit, to theſe informations (e) [DD]. expreſs any great violence in the beginning of his adminiſtration, and is ſaid to have teſtified ſome indignation againſt Bonner, for the pleaſure he took in purſuing hereticks. We ſhall have occaſion hereafter to diſcuſs the point of his cruelty more at large, yet here it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that in the years 1553, 1554, when he was in the zenith of his power, here was not one burnt, and in the laſt year of his life, there were fewer burnt than in any year of that reign. That he did return to Popery again is not to be denied, but it ſeems to have been when he had no other choice to make, ſo that he took up with this, becauſe he could not get a better religion; for if there be any thing clear or certain with regard to his ſentiments in theſe matters, he thought the ceremonies and diſcipline of the Church ought to be under the direction of the State, and that Princes might wave their Supremacy if they thought fit, for the ſake of what was ſtiled unity in the Church.

That he had really no way to avoid doing what he did, will appear clearly from hence; that on the one ſide, he had the furious Papiſts, not his friends, who inſinuated that he was more a Statesman than a Biſhop, and to be eſteemed rather as a Politician than a Prelate; while the Proteſtants, and more eſpecially the exiles, took every poſſible method to expoſe him, inventing many things to his prejudice, as for inſtance, at the beginning of the Queen's reign, that ſhe was with child by him (63), which however improbable, as he was above ſeventy, and ſhe near forty, made much diſturbance; and by the tranſlating the piece he had written for the King's ſupremacy, and other treatiſes, not at all conſiſtent with the cauſe of the Church and the Court of Rome. He was therefore, with ſome of his brethren, obliged to ſwim with that ſtream to which they had given ſtrength enough to carry them out of their depth. In this reſpect therefore he deſerved to be ſtiled a diſſembler, and the more ſo, becauſe upon his death-bed, when he had leaſt reaſon to diſſemble, he ſhewed his repentance of many things, and declared for Juſtification by Faith, againſt works as will be ſhewn hereafter.

[DD] That he gave credit, or ſeemed to give credit, to theſe informations.] There was, as there commonly is againſt all Prime Miniſters, a very high ſpirit of reſentment againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter; he was repreſented as the author of the Spaniſh match, as the betrayer of his Queen and country, and as one who had ſold his country to ſtrangers. Whereas in making the match, he ſubmitted to the Queen's will, who thought ſhe could not be ſafe, even upon the throne, without the protection of ſome potent foreign Prince. In ſettling the terms, there is no doubt at all, that this prelate ſet them ſo high as that Philip himſelf, as great a Politician as he was, found it impoſſible to pick a hole in them; and in reference to the treaſure, the nation was at that time much exhauſted; the Spaniards in purſuit of their projects, were ſcattering their money through all Europe; and as the Chancellor had been obliged to cry Philip up for a great, a rich, and a magnificent Prince, he thought it not amiſs that ſome of the money ſhould be ſcattered here, and that with his perſon, the Engliſh ſhould ſee a little of his treaſure. Thoſe that roſe under Sir Thomas Wiat, when they came into Southwark, rifled the Biſhop's ſtudy, tore all his books to pieces, ſo that in Wincheſter Cloſe, people might walk up to their knees in papers (69). This however was an open teſtimony of reſentment; but William Thomas, Eſq; who had been Clerk of the Council to King Edward, and a great favourite of his, is ſaid to have formed a deſign againſt this Prelate's life; however that was, he was convicted and executed, as having been one of the principal conſpirators (70). A little before Sir Thomas Wiat died, he was examined by Secretary Bourn, before the Earl of Devonſhire, in reſpect to what he had charged him with, in reference to his deſign; but at his death, he declared him innocent (71). There were ſome aſperſions alſo very falſely thrown upon the Lady Elizabeth, who came into a great deal of trouble, was ſent priſoner to the Tower, and examined by the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who is reported to have been her great enemy, and to have let fall ſome ſtrange ſpeeches, which were thought to refer to her, ſuch as, We may ſhake off the leaves, and lop the branches; but if we do not deſtroy the root, the hope of Hereticks, we do nothing.

However, her innocence and her fortitude preſerved her, and after her ſiſter's marriage, King Philip is ſaid to have interpoſed on her behalf, in hopes, as ſome ſay, of marrying her after the deceaſe of her ſiſter; but as others with greater probability affirm, from a motive of policy; foreſeeing, that if ſhe was removed, the Crown, as things then ſtood, would deſcend to Mary Queen of Scots, who being married to the Dauphin of France, that muſt have proved a great check to the Spaniſh deſigns (72), and to the project of univerſal Monarchy which Philip had formed very early; yet theſe are but conjectures, and it is very remarkable, that Mr Camden, who no doubt had the beſt information, and could have no reaſon to conceal any thing he knew, refers the expreſſion about the root and branches, to Dr John Story (73), who was afterwards executed for High-Treaſon in Queen Elizabeth's reign; aſcribes her perſecution in it's greateſt violence, and when to ſecure her life, ſhe was forced to make profeſſion of the Popiſh religion, to Cardinal Pole, without ſo much as once mentioning the Biſhop of Wincheſter's name;

insurrections, when suppressed, are useful to those against whom they are raised, more especially when managed by men of parts and dexterity. None knew better how to procure, or to use, advantages, than the Bishop of Winchester; and he so well managed mens hopes and fears, with every other help he had, that when the Queen's second Parliament met, April the second 1554, it very soon appeared he might prevail on them to give a sanction to his measures, whatever they were. The terms of the Queen's marriage, as he settled them, met with very little opposition; and as for making severe laws against Hereticks, it is allowed the Bishop had no other trouble than to restrain them, which in several instances he did. His own and the wiser Bishops zeal, not flaming near so high as that of this House of Commons (f). In the whole of his conduct thro' this Parliament, over which he had as much influence as Minister ever had, there was nothing done that was either unworthy of his station, or injurious to his country; on the contrary, foreseeing that some who had access to the Queen might make an ill use of her confidence, and engage her, by plausible promises, to countenance things every way beneath her, and dangerous to her subjects, he procured this to be put out of her power, by a short law drawn by his direction, as may be seen more at large in the notes [EE]. But when the great measures name; so that notwithstanding what is said in Holinshed, and other writers; there is good reason to doubt whether this Prelate went any farther in these matters than his duty and the Queen's temper, who, as Camden very truly says, though a mild and benevolent Princess, bore her sister no good will, might require. In this however it is hard to decide, as there might be a great deal, and not without authority, alledged on both sides.

[EE] As may be seen more at large in the notes.] In the former part of his life, this Prelate, upon more occasions than one, had taken upon him to express a great zeal for the Laws, and a very warm concern for the constitution of his country. But it very often happens, that Patriots preferred forget their former professions, endeavour to explain them away, or, it may be, retract them, and act in direct opposition to them. This was not the conduct of Gardiner, the best and most candid of our Historians being his judges. They very fairly admit, that he shewed himself through the whole course of his administration, a good Englishman (74), and one as careful to preserve his country from becoming a province to foreigners, or his countrymen from being enslaved by an undue extension of the prerogative, as any minister we ever had; it would be easy to prove all this by a train of numerous quotations, but as these would necessarily take up a great deal of room, and as this article has already swelled into a great extent, we will content ourselves with producing two passages from a modern author (75), who has abridged within a narrow compass, what Bishop Burnet, and other Ecclesiastical Historians have written at large, from our records and other authentic testimonies.

(75) Echard's Hist. of Eng. p. 318, 320.

'In the managing of this treaty Gardiner had a 'principal share, for he was the oracle of the Council 'Board, as having thirty years experience in affairs, 'and a great knowledge of the Courts of Christendom 'and of the state of England. In drawing the articles 'of the marriage he had a double design, one was to 'have them so framed, as they might easily pass in Parliament; and the other was to exclude the Spaniards 'from having any share in the government of England, 'which he designed to hold in his own hands. Accordingly it was agreed, that the government and 'gift of places, should be entirely in Queen Mary; 'and though Prince Philip was to be called King, 'named in all writs, and his image put on the coin and 'seals, yet the Queen's hand alone was to give authority to every thing without his; no Spaniard was to 'be capable of any office; no change was to be made 'in the law, nor was the Queen to be required to go 'out of England against her will, nor might their issue 'go out of England, but by the consent of the nobility. The Queen was to have a jointure of forty 'thousand pounds a year out of Spain, and twenty 'thousand pounds out of the Netherlands. If the 'Queen had a son, he was to inherit Burgundy and the 'Netherlands, as well as England; and if Philip's 'son died, he was to inherit all the Spanish Dominions. 'If the Queen had only daughters, they were to succeed to her crown, and have such portions from 'Spain, as were usually given to Kings daughters. 'Prince Philip was to have no share in the government 'after her death, and the Queen might still keep up the 'League with France, notwithstanding this match.

'On the second day of April, a new Parliament met, 'which was the second in this reign, but the most 'considerable members were before corrupted by 'Gardiner (*), who gave them pensions, some two hundred, and others a hundred pounds a year for their 'voices. The first act that passed was declaratory, that 'all the prerogatives and limitations which by law belonged to the Kings of England were the same, whether the crown fell into the hands of a male or female. The real meaning of this was little known, 'some feared there was a pernicious design in it; and, 'that it being declared that she had all the authority of 'any of her progenitors, it might be inferred that she, 'by this, could pretend to a right of conquest, and 'like William the Conqueror, seize on the estates of 'the English. But it was so conceived, that the Queen 'was put under the same limitations, as well as acknowledged to have the same prerogatives with her 'predecessors.

(*) See note [MM].

'The secret of this Act was afterwards discovered: 'a projecting man, who had served Cromwell, and had 'been deeply engaged in the Lady Jane's affair, and 'the late insurrection, by making a timely application 'to the Emperor's Ambassador obtained his pardon; 'and for amends, he offered a project to the Ambassador, that the Queen should declare, that she succeeded to the crown by the Common Law, but was not 'bound by the Statute Law, which only obliged 'Kings, and not Queens, by which she might pretend 'to be a conqueror and rule at pleasure, and by that 'might restore both religion and the Abbey Lands 'without any restraint. This was brought to the 'Queen by the Ambassador, who begged of her to 'keep it very secret. She disliked the paper, yet she 'sent for Gardiner, and charged him to give her his 'opinion of it sincerely, as he would answer to God 'for it at the great day. He read it carefully, and 'told her, it was a most pernicious contrivance, and 'begged of her not to hearken to such platforms, which 'might be brought her by base sycophants. Upon that 'she burnt the paper, and ordered the Ambassador to 'bring her no more of such projects.

'This gave Gardiner sensible apprehensions of the 'mischiefs that Spanish counsels might bring upon the 'nation, and therefore he procured the forementioned 'Act to be made, by which the Queen was as much 'bound by the Statute Law as her predecessors. He 'also procured an Act to be passed, ratifying the articles of the marriage of the Queen, with very strong 'clauses for keeping the government entirely in the 'Queen's hands, so that Prince Philip might not take 'it upon him as Henry the Seventh had done, when 'he married the heiress of the House of York: for as 'that King set up a title in his own name, and kept 'the government in his own hands, so the Spaniards 'began now to derive a descent from John of Gaunt, 'father to Henry the Fourth, which caused Gardiner 'to be the more cautious in this matter; and it must 'be acknowledged, that the preserving the nation out 'of the hands of the Spaniards, was almost only owing 'to his care and wisdom (*). In this Parliament 'several meaſures aimed at were once adjuſted, the Chancellor ſuppoſing that what remained for accompliſhing the whole of the Queen's plan, might be compaſſed more effectually after the marriage, the Queen on the fifth of May came to the Parliament, and, having given her conſent to fifteen bills, diſſolved that Aſſembly (g). All obſtacles to the marriage being now removed, and the circumſtances of the Houſe of Auſtria making it neceſſary to haſten it, King Philip put to ſea, and arrived towards the cloſe of July at Southampton, eſcorted by a conſiderable fleet, which however was obliged to pay homage to that of England in the narrow ſeas; ſuch was the temper of thoſe times, and the vigour of that adminiſtration (h). He proceeded with a numerous train of nobility from Southampton to Wincheſter, where he was received, and ſplendidly entertained, by the Biſhop; on St James's day, the tutelary Saint of Spain, he was by that Prelate ſolemnly married to the Queen in the cathedral, the Emperor Charles V. reſigning to him the kingdom of the two Sicilies, and many nominal ſovereignties, upon the marriage (i). In his way to London the King took Windſor, where he was inſtalled Knight of the Garter, and made his entry into this capital on the eleventh of Auguſt 1554, with prodigious magnificence, and, like all new Princes, with univerſal acclamations (k). The Chancellor well knowing this fair weather would not continue long, reſolved to avail himſelf of it while it laſted, and therefore called a new Parliament about the middle of November the ſame year. A very little after the ſeſſion begun Cardinal Pole came into England, not much to the real good liking either of the King or Chancellor. But the Queen being ſet upon it, and the new Houſe of Commons having the ſame bigotted ſpirit with the old one, a ſolemn deputation was ſent to fetch him over, Lord Paget and Sir William Cecil being two of the Commiſſioners. His attainder, in the reign of the late King Henry VIII, was reverſed with as much facility as it was made, and with much the ſame conſideration (l). To prevent his falling into the ſame inconveniency that Wolſey had done, he had a licence, under the Queen's broad ſeal, to execute his functions as the Pope's Legate. When theſe advances had been gradually made, a ſupplication was preſented from both Houſes to the King and Queen, that the nation might be reconciled to the See of Rome; which being granted November 30, 1554, the requeſt of both Lords and Commons was ſignified, in the preſence of their Majeſties, to his Holineſs's Legate, by the Lord High-Chancellor the Biſhop of Wincheſter; when the Cardinal, after a long oration, ſolemnly abſolved them, and received the People of England once more into the boſom of the Catholick Church (m). By theſe gradations all things were brought back to their old ſituation; and the ſanguinary laws, for repreſſing what they called Hereſy, revived and carried into execution. Thus the Biſhop of Wincheſter paid the full price of his exaltation to the Miniſtry, and obtained, in ſpite of all difficulties, all that the Queen had deſired (n). But the joy enſuing on this was quickly troubled by the bloody perſecution ſet on foot in almoſt all parts of the kingdom (o), whether by the advice, and with the entire concurrence, of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, as many Hiſtorians affirm, it is but juſt ſhould be more largely diſcuſſed [FF] than the bounds of this [FF] It is but juſt, ſhould be more largely diſcuſſed] We have more than once touched this matter of the ſtrong imputations upon this Biſhop, for his cruelty to the Proteſtants, and promiſed to ſpeak of it more at large. It is fit this promiſe ſhould be executed, the rather, becauſe in moſt of our hiſtories, his character is repreſented as very odious in this reſpect. In the firſt place we ſhall obſerve, that there is a double charge againſt him, that he was the author of the Doctrine of Perſecution in Queen Mary's reign; and next, that he was active and zealous in carrying this doctrine into execution; with reſpect to the former it is very poſitively aſſerted, that when Pole adviſed the Queen to rely upon fair means for bringing men back to the Romiſh Church, to reform the lives of the Clergy, and to take other ſteps of the ſame mild nature; Biſhop Gardiner oppoſed this, and prevailed ſo far, as to bring the Queen to conſent, that the weapons of the Law, rather than the arguments of the Goſpel, ſhould be employed to reduce Hereticks to the Catholick Church. This, Biſhop Burnet having tranſcribed from others, adds, that this advice proceeded from his own abject and ſervile ſpirit (76).

With reſpect to particulars, he is charged to have condemned Dr Robert Farrar, Biſhop of St Davids, who was burnt with great cruelty in Wales; the like accuſation we find with reſpect to Dr John Hooper, Biſhop of Glouceſter, with this aggravating circumſtance, that it proceeded from private reſentment for what Hooper had done againſt him in the former reign. To him, is chiefly aſcribed the burning Father Latimer, once Biſhop of Worceſter, and Dr Nicholas Ridley, Biſhop of London; and he is farther ſaid to have been a perſecutor of Archbiſhop Cranmer, with a view of getting into his Archbiſhoprick; and that it was no better motive than this, which afterwards engaged him to protect and prolong that prelate's life, in order to defeat the views and expectations of Cardinal Pole, and thereby gain time for himſelf to equal him in one, to deprive him of another, and to ſupplant him in a third dignity, by procuring from Pope Paul the Fourth, a Cadinal's hat with the Legantine Power, and his nomination to the See of Canterbury, which would indeed have rendered him not equal only, but ſuperior to his maſter Wolſey. Beſides theſe, there are many lighter imputations, ſuch as his driving abroad the Ducheſs of Suffolk, and other Proteſtants of diſtinction, by his menaces, and threats; and his expreſſing the moſt violent reſentment againſt the exiles in general, though he well knew that they only fled to be out of the reach of his ſeverity.

After reporting fairly what has been aſſerted, in order to render the portrait of this great man as hideous and deformed as it is poſſible, we are obliged in juſtice to conſider what may be ſaid in extenuation, both of the general and particular charges, and in doing this, we ſhall content ourſelves with appealing to the common ſenſe and candour of the intelligent and attentive reader, and the authorities of Proteſtant writers; for as to the Papiſts, they exceed as much on the other hand, and beſtow upon him praiſes as little conſiſtent with truth, as the flaming invectives of ſome of his enemies, ſo that no man of an impartial diſpoſition, can ever prevail upon himſelf to give an implicit belief to either. It is this narrative will allow. Certain it is, that, to this time, our Prelate had not diſcovered any thing of this diſpoſition. He is indeed reputed, by many of our Hiſtorians, a great diſſembler ſtrange that the Biſhop of Wincheſter ſhould oppoſe the milder meaſures of Pole, when he came over veſted with legantine power, conſidering, that before he had this, that prelate himſelf was poſſeſſed of almoſt equal authority, which he exerciſed in quite another manner. We have obſerved in the text, that the Houſe of Commons in the ſecond Parliament of Queen Mary's reign, expreſſed a furious zeal for the old religion, and had actually prepared a bill for reviving the old Law of the ſix Articles, the paſſing which was prevented by the diſſolution of that Parliament when Gardiner was Prime-Miniſter (77). Of this law the Proteſtants in general were ſo much afraid, that John Fox, in the name of the exiles, penned an epiſtle in Latin to the Parliament, in which he told them they had a Queen, who, as ſhe was moſt noble, ſhe was ready to liſten to ſound and wholeſome counſel; and that they had a Chancellor too, who, as he was learned, ſo he was not of a rough nature, if uninfluenced by the counſels of others. His own words are very elegant and pathetick, Porrò, habetis ad hoc Reginam, ut Nobiliſſimam, ita ad ſana & ſalubria quæque obſequacem Principem. Habetis & Cancellarium, ut doctrina præſtabilem, ita natura non improbum, ſiquorum abſint concilia. He goes on to inſinuate, that as among animals there are ſome born to create trouble and miſchief to the reſt; ſo there wanted not of mankind, a race by nature turbulent and cruel, and formed to diſturb and deſtroy, by their intrigues, both Church and State. It was from them therefore that Fox and his aſſociates then dreaded thoſe miſchiefs that afterwards followed. But it is ſtrange logick to infer, that becauſe Biſhop Gardiner, by a haſty diſſolution of that Parliament, prevented that bill from paſſing, therefore he was the author of cruel counſels, and not the perſon, who by an Act of another Parliament, had the power of perſecuting put into his hands.

(77) Echard's Hiſt. of Eng. p. 320.

Before the proceedings of the Proteſtant Biſhops for religion, the Popiſh Prelates, who were to perſecute, went not to Weſtminſter, or Wincheſter Houſe, but to Lambeth (78), where they received their inſtructions, and all the bloody things that were afterwards done, were done by commiſſions from the perſon, who is ſaid to have given thoſe mild counſels; and it is acknowledged, even by Biſhop Burnet, who makes Gardiner the author of theſe cruelties, that he grew very ſoon weary of them, and refuſed to have any farther hand in them, reproaching Bonner for his butcher-like diſpoſition, in purſuing them as he did (79). Would it not have been natural in Bonner and his aſſociates to vindicate the Cardinal and themſelves, by recriminating; and if they had done ſo, is it poſſible that the world ſhould not have heard of it? beſides, in another proceeding, when the priſoner charged the Biſhops with miſleading the Queen, and drawing her againſt her will to theſe ſevere courſes, they very roundly aſſerted the contrary, and that themſelves were rather compelled by her (80).

Indeed whatever is ſaid from John Fox, of Gardiner's giving cruel advice, is in a good meaſure contradicted by what Strype delivers from the authority of records, and of the directions from Lambeth beforementioned, which it is neceſſary we ſhould produce for our own juſtification (81). 'In theſe inſtructions, there 'are ſeveral ſtrictures, that make it appear, Pole 'was not ſo gentle towards the Hereticks (as the pro-'feſſors of the Goſpel were then ſtiled) as is reported, 'but rather the contrary, and that he went hand in 'hand with the bloody Biſhops of theſe days. For it is 'plain here, that he put the Biſhops upon proceeding 'with them according to the ſanguinary laws lately re-'vived, and put in full force and virtue. What an 'invention was that of his, a kind of Inquiſition, by 'him ſet up, whereby, not a man might eſcape, that 'ſtood not well affected to Popery? I mean, his order-'ing books to be made and kept, wherein the names 'of all ſuch were to be written, that in every place 'and pariſh in England were reconciled; and ſo, who-'ſoever were not found in thoſe books, might be 'known to be no friends to the Pope, and ſo to be 'proceeded againſt. And indeed, after Pole's crafty 'and zealous management of this reconciliation, all 'that good opinion that men had before conceived of 'him vaniſhed, and they found themſelves much mi-'ſtaken in him, eſpecially ſeeing ſo many learned and 'pious Goſpel Biſhops and Miniſters impriſoned, and 'martyred under him, and by his commiſſion. Inſo-'much, that now people ſpake of him, as bad as of 'the Pope himſelf, or the worſt of his Cardinals.'

(81) Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. 346, 347.

We will now proceed to the particular charges. As to Dr Robert Farrar, the account given of him by Biſhop Godwin, who lived in thoſe times, and knew well what he wrote, is this (82). 'He was a man of a 'rigid temper and rough behaviour, which drew on 'him much trouble, even in King Edward's days, 'and was now perhaps his deſtruction: for having 'been preferred to that dignity by the Duke of Somer-'ſet, after his death, this good and learned man, by 'the unhappy moroſeneſs of his manners, which even 'bordered upon arrogance, raiſed againſt himſelf ac-'cuſers. Two of theſe, who were Biſhops afterwards 'under Queen Elizabeth, eaſily prevailed with the 'faction againſt Somerſet, to get Farrar impriſoned. 'Thus being in cuſtody at Queen Mary's acceſſion to 'the throne, he was brought before the Biſhop of 'Wincheſter, and 'tis very probable, that by a little 'temper in his anſwers, and a diſcreet regard to the 'times, he might have ſaved himſelf, without wrong 'to his integrity, from the hands of bloody men, as 'ſeveral had done, who were not engaged in the 'cauſe of Lady Jane, nor had any other way affronted 'the patrons of Popery, whoſe flight was therefore 'connived at, or if they were taken, they were 'ſoon diſcharged again, at the interceſſion of their 'friends. But Farrar, ſway'd by his natural ſeverity, 'and ungoverned paſſion, gave ſuch bold and provoking 'anſwers to the Biſhops, that it is not to be admired it 'went ſo hard with him.' It is therefore his commitment only, that is to be attributed to the Biſhop of Wincheſter; for as to his trial, conviction, and the terrible cruelties afterwards exerciſed on him, they are to be placed to the account of Dr Morgan, Biſhop of St Davids; however, from the foregoing account, it appears, that Biſhop Godwin, thought with John Fox that Gardiner was not naturally ill tempered, and that a little civility, which certainly is not incompatible with Chriſtianity, might have opened a paſſage to this Prelate to eſcape the flames.

(82) Life of Queen Mary, p. 349, 350.

In reference to Biſhop Hooper, we are told by Strype (83), that he was extreamly hated by Gardiner, not only as an earneſt reformer of religion, but for having been one of the witneſſes againſt him in the time of King Edward. For this, it is ſaid, that he was exceedingly ill uſed in priſon. Biſhop Godwin gives another account of this matter; he ſays, that he had been very inſtrumental in procuring Bonner's deprivation (84), and adds, which now probably proved his ruin; it is very likely from hence, that Mr Strype put Gardiner for Bonner, and though he tells us afterwards, that he tranſcribed the circumſtances he mentions from a letter of Biſhop Hooper, in which he ſtiles Gardiner, God's enemy and mine; yet as that letter is not placed in his appendix, we have no opportunity of ſeeing whether Gardiner is there mentioned by name, or whether the perſon to whom that character is given, is not left to be diſcovered from circumſtances, which point us not to Gardiner, but to Bonner. It cannot however be denied, that the Biſhop of Wincheſter ſat in judgment upon this Prelate, in the church of St Mary Overs, near his own houſe, but then he ſat as a Commiſſioner, with twelve other Biſhops; and though Mr Strype does not inſiſt upon what was ſaid by any of the reſt, yet he admits that Wincheſter both offered a pardon, and laboured all he could to convince Hooper, that nothing dangerous to his conſcience, was expected from him; which propoſition he rejected with great diſdain, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, as his commiſſion obliged him, pronounced ſentence.

(83) Memorials, Vol. III. p. 179.

(84) Life of Queen Mary, p. 349.

In this, without doubt, he acted ſeverely, and againſt the ſentiments of humanity; but as things were circumſtanced, it is not eaſy to ſee how he could act otherwiſe, or how the blood of Biſhop Hooper, lay more at his door, than that of the other Biſhops, or the blood of dissembler (p); but in this acted quite another part. In all publick transactions he professed himself always of the same opinion with the Council, and did not aim at screening himself from popular odium, by putting on a cloke of moderation. But, in all the trials, where, by virtue of Cardinal Pole's commission, he was obliged to be, he was exceedingly assiduous to shew the prisoners, that, in the matter of the Real Presence, which was most insisted on, they might easily save their lives, by complying with subscriptions drawn in very general terms; till, by foul language, they convinced him that he had to do with men who were as little to be wheedled as frighted out of their principles (q). This surely proves that he was not desirous of severities, or persecuted for the sake of gratifying a cruel temper, or to revenge past injuries (r). And that such Protestants as were of milder natures, and content to reserve themselves for better times, when driven to distress were well received by him, and not barely screened but encouraged and protected, without offering any violence to their consciences farther than locking them up, and committing the key to the custody of their own discretions, I may very safely affirm is a point out of dispute (s) [GG]. But now, after the coming of Cardinal Pole, it is not impossible that the

of others put to death under colour of Heresy, in the time of Henry the Eighth; at the doors of such Bishops, as afterwards changed their sentiments, and became Martyrs for the same opinion that those held, whom they formerly condemned. These were dismal and dreadful times, when a zeal, that was certainly not according to knowledge, prevailed strongly in the minds of men, and induced them, under the colour of promoting the Gospel, to act exactly in the same manner as the Jews did against those who first preached it. It may however be inferred from hence, that being a vice of the times, it ought not, with peculiar vehemence, to be ascribed to any particular man. Bishop Gardiner, to be sure, had his share in these barbarous proceedings, yet he had but his share, and ought not therefore to bear all the reproach.

Bishop Burnet says, that by this time he was convinced, severity would not do, and that refusing to meddle any more with condemnations, he left them to Bonner (85), Yet it was some months after this, that Latimer and Ridley were burnt at Oxford; with which, the Bishop of Winchester, is by the same writers, reported to be highly pleased, and to have been so eager to receive the news, that he delayed his dinner till the post came in (86); which how well founded a report it is, we shall hereafter have occasion to enquire. In the mean time let it be observed, how the same writers vary this man's character, he had borne five years imprisonment in the reign of King Edward, besides the loss of his Bishoprick and all his other preferments, rather than stoop to make a submission; and yet his advising these cruelties, is ascribed to his servile and abject temper, apt to be wrought on by the same means. Then he becomes a brutal persecutor, taking pleasure in the miseries and misfortunes, not only of his fellow creatures, but of some who had been his intimate acquaintance; yet the acts, or judicial proceedings, plainly prove, that he took all the pains in his power to perswade those who were tried before him to accept of pardon. At length, it is said, he was thoroughly disgusted at persecution, because he saw it did not answer his end; but instead of drawing the people to, drove them from Popery; and yet we find him some months after, having a better stomach to the blood and slaughter of men, with whom he had lived before in intimacy, than to his dinner: this is not only to make him a bad man, but a beast, and those who would be inclined to believe him ever so wicked, will find it hard to reconcile this to his weakness, or that again to the great things which he performed, or the character he had with some of the best and wisest amongst the Protestants.

(85) Hist. of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 304.

(86) Echard's Hist. of Eng. p. 323.

In respect to Cranmer, all that is said of the Bishop of Winchester's conduct toward him, is upon a supposition of the original author's sagacity, in judging of that Prelate's thoughts, and penetrating into the secrets of his heart; for no body has the confidence to say, that he owned he preserved Cranmer's life to spite Pole, or to get possession of his See, to which, by the way, Bishops of Winchester rarely aspire. Let us now hear a few things on the other side. Very soon after King Edward's death, a rumour prevailed, as if the Archbishop had changed his sentiments (87); in answer to which, he drew up a kind of Manifesto, which was published without his consent, by the indiscretion of his friends. Upon this, he was brought before the Council where Gardiner presided, there he boldly owned the paper, said, he meant to have enlarged and strengthened it, and to have posted it upon the gates of St Paul's. He was, notwithstanding this, discharged, contrary to all men's expectations, but by the Bishop of Winchester's advice; and if the Archbishop had followed the counsel of his friends he might then have withdrawn; we are farther assured, that Gardiner proposed removing him from his dignity, and allowing him a pension for his support in a private state of life. When he was attainted of High-Treason by Parliament, for the share he had in Queen Jane's business, he had a pardon granted him. Such was the treatment of this great Prelate, while Gardiner had the sole direction of affairs; and after this, when the supreme power in Ecclesiastical affairs was transferred to Cardinal Pole, he had still authority enough to preserve the Archbishop's life, and it is allowed that he did preserve it, and there let the matter rest.

(87) Strype's Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 304, 305.

As to the Duchess of Suffolk, what is related concerning her, runs thus (88). 'This lady being most 'zealous for the Reformation in the reign of King 'Edward the Sixth, Stephen Gardiner, after that he 'was restored to his Bishoprick of Winchester, by 'Queen Mary, sent for her husband in the first year of 'her reign, and amongst some questions touching his 'religion, asked, Whether the Lady, his wife, was 'now as ready to set up Mass, as she had been to pull it 'down, when in her progress, she caused a dog in a 'rocket, to be carried, and called by his name? whereupon, being advertised by his friends, that the Bishop 'meant to call the Duchess, his wife, to an account of 'her Faith; and foreseeing danger, he procured the 'Queen's licence to travel beyond sea, under colour 'of such debts as were due from the Emperor, 'to the late Duke of Suffolk, his Lady's former husband. And having obtained it, passed the seas at 'Dover, in June the same year, leaving her behind, 'who in January following, went disguised from her 'house in Barbican, and passing to Leigh in Essex, 'privately took shipping, and after much danger met 'her husband in the Duchy of Cleves.' If there was any thing harsh in what the Bishop said to Mr Bertie, it must consist in putting him in mind of an action no ways suitable to that great Lady's quality. It is not pretended, that the Bishop of Winchester, either impeded their retreat, or persecuted them after they were abroad; it is true, that some injuries were afterwards offered them, which obliged them to fly, with some hazard to their lives, but this was after the Bishop of Winchester was in his grave.

(88) Holinshed's Chronicle, p. 1143, 1144.

We are also told, that the Bishop frighted the famous John Fox (89) out of England, at a time, when he was tutor to the Duke of Norfolk's grand-children; but as in this matter, all is ascribed to Fox's own suspicion, though it might be a reason why he did not easily forgive that Prelate, yet it ought not to reflect any stain upon his character. After all, what is here collected remains entirely under the censure of the reader, who in every case, without question, will distinguish which are facts, and which are conjectures.

(89) See the Life of John Fox, written by his son, prefixed to the 3d. Vol. of his Acts and Monuments.

[GG] Is a point not to be disputed.] There was, without doubt, very great confusion amongst those that had made a figure in the court of King Edward the Sixth, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury being deprived, and he nominated to that See (t), with the legantine authority in his hands, Gardiner might have leſs weight in eccleſiaſtical affairs, more eſpecially if, as ſome ſay, Queen Mary conſidered him rather as a Stateſman than a Prieſt, and looked on Pole as a Confeſſor for religion, and a Saint in morals (u). If this was at all the caſe, Biſhop Gardiner did wiſely not to contend with him; for, beſides the privilege of his high birth, and his dignity, it was viſible enough that he would be ſupported by a great party amongſt the Clergy, and the hot men in the Houſe of Commons, who, by reſtoring the Pope's ſupremacy, and reviving the laws againſt Hereſy, had made that cauſe their own. At leaſt there is ſomething ſo probable in this, and it accounts ſo well

Sixth, and who were ſincerely Proteſtants, when they ſaw Queen Mary fixed upon the throne, and how ſtrong her inclinations were to the Popiſh Religion. But however, there were ſome very eminent men, who by behaving with great moderation and decency, preſerved themſelves from trouble, without making ſhipwreck of their conſciences; and of theſe, not a few ſtood indebted for their ſafety, and ſomething more, to the protection afforded them by the Biſhop of Wincheſter. Amongſt theſe was Sir William Cecil (90), afterwards the great Lord Burleigh, who had been twice Secretary of State, and of whom it was ſuggeſted, that he furniſhed the reaſons of policy ſet forth in his maſter's will, in favour of Queen Jane. Some troubles he met with, which were not very ſharp, but lived afterwards, not only in peace and honour, but might alſo have been Secretary again if he would have complied; and tho' he declined this, becauſe of the condition, yet it was without incuring the Queen's diſpleaſure, or the loſs of Gardiner's friendſhip, with whom he went over to Calais, in the laſt year of that Prelate's life, and remained upon perfect good terms with him to the laſt.

(90) From Cecil's own Diary.

Sir Thomas Smith, who was alſo Secretary to King Edward, was, by the favour of Gardiner, permitted to live in a ſtate of learned privacy, which he affected, without any enquiry into his religious principles, and with a penſion of one hundred pounds a year, which in thoſe times was a conſiderable ſum, for his better ſupport (91), though he had a good eſtate of his own. Yet both Cecil and Smith had formerly oppoſed the Biſhop one at Court, and the other at the Univerſity, but without any thing of rudeneſs or aſperity; which Gardiner was ſo far from remembring, that he treated them both with the utmoſt kindneſs and reſpect. We may add to theſe, the celebrated Mr Aſcham, another Secretary for the Latin tongue, continued in his office, as indeed he well deſerved, and his ſalary increaſed by this Prelate's favour, which he fully repaid, by thoſe grateful and elegant epiſtles to him, that are extant among his works, which do equal honour to both, and which will be read with pleaſure, as long as there continues any taſte for ſtile or ſentiment. But let us hear how honeſt Mr Strype repreſents this matter, with reſpect both to Smith and Aſcham, his words are theſe (92).

'This muſt be remembred to this Biſhop's commendation, among the many evil things that aſperſe and blacken his name to this day. Nor muſt the like favour, or a greater, be forgotten by him, ſhewn to ſuch another learned and grave Proteſtant, friend, and contemporary with Smith, I mean Roger Aſcham, which I muſt have leave to mention here. Whom the Biſhop of Wincheſter did not only ſpare, but called to Court, and preferred to be Secretary of the Latin tongue to Queen Mary. Whom for his learning in the languages, and incomparable faculty of a clean ſtile and beautiful writing, he greatly loved, and obliged with many benefits. And when Sir Francis Engfield, Maſter of the Wards and Liveries, a fierce Papiſt, had often cried out upon Aſcham to the Biſhop, as an Heretick, and fit to be rejected and puniſhed as ſuch; he never would hearken to him, either to puniſh him, or remove him from his place. Thus lived two excellent Proteſtants, under the wings, as it were, of the ſworn enemy and deſtroyer of Proteſtants, Aſcham and Smith, to whom we now return again.'

The ſame plain ſpoken writer, in an account he gives us of the adventures of one Underhill, a gentleman of the Band of Penſioners, and a zealous Proteſtant, has the following paſſage, which happened when the Queen was going to be married (93). 'Then was there preparing, ſays he, to go with the Queen to Wincheſter: and all the books of the ordinaries were peruſed by the Biſhop of Wincheſter and the Earl of Arundel, two great Papiſts, to conſider of every man, And one would think Underhill ſhould have hardly eſcaped now. Sir Humphry Radcliff, Lieutenant of the Band, brought unto them the book of the Penſioners. Which when they overlooked, and came unto Underhill's name, what doth he here, ſaid the Earl of Arundel? I know no cauſe why he ſhould not be here, ſaid Radcliffe, who alſo was ſecretly a favourer of the Goſpel. He is an honeſt man, and hath ſerved from the beginning of the Band, and was as forward as any to ſerve the Queen, in the time of Wyat's rebellion. Let him paſs then, ſaid the Biſhop. Well, ſaid the Earl, you may do ſo, but I aſſure your Lordſhip, he is an arch-heretick. Thus he paſſed the brunt.'

(93) Memorials, Vol. III. p. 65.

This is a ſtrange proof of our author's poſition, that Biſhop Gardiner was a great, that is, a bigotted Papiſt; and the ingenious Dr Fuller, has no leſs ſtrange a proof of his being a moſt invenomed perſecutor; perhaps the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee that too, thus then our Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian writes (94).

(94) Church Hiſt. of Britain, cent. XVI. b. viii. p. 17.

'In the dioceſe of Wincheſter, conſiſting of Hantſhire and Surrey, I find no great impreſſion from Stephen Gardiner the Biſhop, and much marvel thereat. It may be, this Politician, who managed his malice with cunning, ſpared his own dioceſe, fox like, preying fartheſt from his own den; indeed he would often ſtay behind the traverſe, and ſend Bonner upon the ſtage; free enough of himſelf, without ſpurring, to do miſchief, to act what he had contrived. Yea, I may ſay of Gardiner, that he had an head, if not an hand, in the death of every eminent Proteſtant; plotting, though not acting, their deſtruction. And being Lord Chancellor of England, he counted it his honour to flie at ſtout game indeed, contriving the death of the Lady Elizabeth, and uſing to ſay, that it was vain to ſtrike at the branches, whilſt the root of all Hereticks doth remain. And this good Lady was appointed for the ſlaughter, and brought to the ſhambles, when the ſeaſonable death of this butcher, ſaved the ſheep alive.

'However, as bloody as he was, for mine own part I have particular gratitude to pay to the memory of this Stephen Gardiner, and here I ſolemnly tender the ſame. It is on the account of Mrs Clarke, my great-grand-mother, by my mother's ſide, whoſe huſband rented Farnham-Caſtle, a place whither Biſhop Gardiner retired, in Surry, as belonging to his See. This Biſhop, ſenſible of the conſumptionous ſtate of his body, and finding phyſick out of the kitchen, more beneficial for him than that out of the Apothecaries ſhop, and ſpecial comfort from the cordials ſhe provided him, did not only himſelf connive at her hereſy, as he termed it, but alſo protected her, during his life, from the fury of others. Some will ſay, this his curteſie to her, was founded on kindneſs to himſelf. But however, I am ſo far from detaining thanks, from any deſerved on juſt cauſe, that I am ready to pay them, where they are but pretended due on any colour.' Our Hiſtorian is certainly in the right, a good thing done (upon whatever motive) ought to be remembred; men, can judge of men, only by their actions, as to their intentions, they belong to a higher tribunal, and conſequently not to us. If once we deſert this rule, the reader is at the mercy of the author, it is but ſuggeſting right motives for wrong deeds, and the malefactor becomes a hero, or giving foul colours to fair facts, and the hero is turned into a malefactor.

well for the ſubſequent behaviour of the Chancellor, that it certainly deſerves to be impartially conſidered [HH]. Towards the cloſe of the year, it was ſtrongly reported, and indeed generally believed, that the Queen was with child, for which rejoicings were made, and prayers appointed for her ſafe delivery. The Chancellor made a right uſe of this wrong notion; he perſwaded her Majeſty to ſet ſeveral priſoners at liberty, that had been near a year in confinement, and for that purpoſe went in perſon to the Tower (w), January the eighteenth 1555, and diſcharged the Archbiſhop of York, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir James Croſts, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Sir Edward Warner, Sir George Harper, Sir William Saintlow, Sir Gawin Carew, Sir Andrews Dudley, William Gibs, Cuthbert Vaughan, John Harrington, Eſqrs. Mr Tremain, and others. One of theſe had a little before taken the liberty of expoſtulating with him very freely, notwithſtanding which he had (beyond his expectations perhaps) his liberty amongſt the reſt. His ſon has given us, an account of this adventure, ſome paſſages (x) relating to Biſhop Gardiner very well worth notice [II]. The [HH] Deſerves to be impartially conſidered] There is nothing more manifeſt in this reign, than the great change of meaſures which followed, after the coming over of Cardinal Pole, and the nation's ſubmitting again to the Papal authority. It was upon this, that the perſecution began, in virtue of a law paſſed the ſame ſeſſion, with that for reverſing the Cardinal's attainder, and reſtoring the Pope's ſupremacy. Cardinal Pole has the credit of abſolving the Parliament, and the nation, as it were freely, and at the firſt word; but the truth is, that it was againſt his will. He was deſirous, that the kingdom ſhould remain under an interdict, till all who had received holy orders irregularly, or had otherwiſe offended the Church, ſhould be reconciled, which Gardiner over-ruled; and in conſequence of this, ſuch of the Clergy as complied, continued in their functions, without any new ordination; this does not very well agree, either with Pole's propoſing moderate meaſures, or Biſhop Gardiner's oppoſing them (95).

(95) Burnet's Hiſt of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 401.

Whoever looks cloſely into the Hiſtory of that reign, and depends only upon facts, will find that the Biſhop of Wincheſter's authority, was very far from being uncontrouled after the coming of Cardinal Pole, and his having the Queen's ear, and of this he gave himſelf ſome intimations, and that too in publick. He obſerved at one of the trials, that returning to the obedience of the See of Rome, was almoſt the unanimous act of the Houſe of Commons, one member only oppoſing it, and that was Sir Ralph Bagnall, who publickly and plainly declared, that it was a thing to which he could never conſent (96). Biſhop Gardiner, by doing this, gave the Parliament the credit of thoſe proceedings, which were the natural conſequences of being reconciled to Rome, and which, in juſtice, ought to be aſcribed to that reconciliation. At Rogers's tryal, when the priſoner imputed his ſufferings to the advice the Biſhops had given the Queen, Biſhop Gardiner ſaid, as has been before obſerved, that the Queen went before him in thoſe counſels, appealing for the truth of this to all the reſt, who affirmed it likewiſe. Rogers ſaid, they might well vouch one for another (97), which was boldly and ſenſibly ſpoken. Yet from hence it appears, that the Chancellor had no inclination to paſs for the author of thoſe meaſures; and it is acknowledged, that he began to grow quickly weary of being the inſtrument of them, at the time, it is very probable, that the generality of the world aſcribed them to him; for we are told, that Philpot conceived ſome hopes of life, upon the demiſe of this Prelate (98), which occaſioned Bonner's ſaying, What, now the Chancellor is dead, you think there will be no more burning, but you'll find the contrary, which proved very true. Yet ſome ſay, that Bonner himſelf grew tired; however, the proſecutions went on to the very laſt week of the Queen and Cardinal's lives. Who then were the inſtigators?

King Philip took care to purge himſelf, and a Spaniſh Friar, who preached publickly before him, told the people, the Biſhops did not extract this doctrine of fire and faggot from the Goſpel. It is not eaſy to conceive upon what motive the Biſhops ſhould be general in their inclinations to theſe ſeverities, and in truth, many of them were not; thoſe that were, did it in compliance with the Court and the Queen, certainly ſhewed what ſhe miſunderſtood to be zeal for the Catholick Religion, and from which ſhe might have been diverted, as well as ſhe had been in the beginning of her reign, if thoſe who had her ear then, had been of the ſame ſentiments with the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who is allowed to have conducted all things in the firſt years of her government, when there were none of theſe ſeverities.

Beſides, Biſhop Burnet is very expreſs, that the Emperor was averſe to the Cardinal's coming, and hindered it as long as he could; he aſſigns the reaſon, for that he was afraid of precipitating things, and having recourſe to harſh meaſures, which were entirely againſt that Monarch's inclinations (99). While theſe ſuggeſtions had weight with the Queen, moderate meaſures were purſued; after the Cardinal came over, they were laid aſide, one would think this ſhould confirm the Emperor's opinion (100). But Pole made a great ſhew of moderation, affected to ſpeak with much tenderneſs and compaſſion, and never took any ſhare himſelf in this perſecution, except iſſuing the commiſſions, under which all thoſe ſeverities were acted. Let us then conſider what are the maxims of Italy in ſuch caſes; let us remember, that after Gardiner's death, at leaſt, none had ſo much influence with the Queen as he, and let us reflect, that in the Court of Inquiſition, that court which is the moſt dreadful, and therefore the moſt deteſted, the language is as merciful and mild, as the practice bloody and cruel. If we look into all theſe circumſtances attentively, and weigh them maturely, we ſhall find, that they afford a kind of evidence at leaſt as ſtrong as that of one writer's tranſcribing another, with reſpect to the Biſhop of Wincheſter's advice, without producing ſo much as one private paper, or publick record to prove it.

He complied with the Queen in compaſſing the reconciliation with Rome, that reconciliation produced a perſecution; in that light, he was the author of it, but perhaps in no other, and though at firſt ſight this may be conſidered as very favourably ſpoken of the Biſhop of Wincheſter's memory, yet it will be found, and ſo it ought to be underſtood, a very indifferent excuſe at bottom; he knew, from reaſon and experience, the ſpirit of that Church, and he ought, in pity to his countrymen, and in juſtice to his country, to have kept the Queen his miſtreſs from that ſtep, which put her into a road of ſtumbling, from whence it was impoſſible for her to recover.

[II] Very well worth notice.] The perſon hinted at in the text, is Sir John Harrington, of Kelſton, who wrote for the uſe of Henry Prince of Wales, a kind of ſupplement to Biſhop Godwin's Catalogue of Engliſh Biſhops, and gives us therein an account of Biſhop Gardiner's ſending his father to the Tower, for carrying a letter to Queen Elizabeth, and obliging that Princeſs to diſcharge his mother for being a Heretick; but notwithſtanding this, the reader will find he was no bitter enemy to that Prelate, but rather inclined to treat him, as a gentleman ſhould, with impartiality and candour. Thus he writes (*), after tranſcribing ſome of the hard things that had been ſaid of Gardiner, by the Martyrologiſt Fox and others.

The three months next enſuing, Biſhop Gardiner was employed in carrying the laws lately revived againſt Hereticks into execution, and ſat often (to his eternal diſgrace), by virtue of a commiſſion from Cardinal Pole as the Pope's Legate, at Wincheſter-Houſe in Southwark, to examine ſuch as were brought before him (y). Yet we are told that he ſoon grew weary, and would proceed no farther; upon which this cruel and invidious taſk was put upon Bonner; neither was it long before he grew relax, till quickened by orders from the Council, and other meaſures (z). The Queen, or it may be the Chancellor, foreſeeing that ſooner or later the nation might be obliged to take part in the war between the Emperor and the French King if it continued, it was reſolved to ſend over Commiſſioners, of the higheſt rank, to a ſort of congreſs that was to be held at Calais, in order to mediate a peace (a). Cardinal Pole went over on behalf of the Pope; the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Lord Arundel, and Lord Paget, on the Part of the Queen of England (b). They departed May the eighteenth 1555, and while they were employed in this negotiation the Pope died, and the Queen wrote moſt preſſing letters to her Commiſſioners, to engage the powers with whom they were treating to conſent that Cardinal Pole ſhould be raiſed to the Papal Dignity (c). But neither in this, or any thing elſe, could her Miniſters ſucceed; and therefore, after a fruitleſs ſtay of ſome weeks, at a great expence, returned upon the twenty-ſixth of June (d). During the Chancellor's abſence, the great ſeal was put into the hands of William Marquis of Wincheſter (e); and from the Council-books it appears, good uſe was made of it for ſtirring up the Perſecution; for quickening of which, writ after writ was iſſued, and letters directed to the Nobility and Gentry, as well as Clergy, exciting them to give their attendance, with their ſervants, at the burning of Hereticks (f); ſo that we ſee this cruel flame raged moſt when the Biſhop was abroad, and grew ſtill higher after his death. Upon his coming home he declared plainly he would have no farther hand in ſeverities, and therefore thoſe apprehended in his dioceſe were removed into that of London, and ſo put under the juriſdiction of Bonner (g), who in a ſhort time fell off again, and had freſh reprimands from the King and Queen for his relaxation and lenity. We may, from theſe inſtances, perceive that ſome made their court to the Queen by promoting thoſe cruel proceedings, and that they were neither preſſed, nor could be impeded, by the Biſhop of Wincheſter (h). In matters of government his influence was ſtill without diminution, and according to his advice a Parliament was ſummoned to meet in October (i); for it was one of his maxims, to have ſhort ſeſſions and frequent Parliaments. He had projected ſome additional ſecurity for Church and Abbey lands, which, by a well-timed addreſs were beholden to him, with the Houſe of Stanhope's, and the Lord Arundel of Warder; and I have heard old Sir Mathew Arundell ſay, that Bonner was more faulty than he, and that Gardiner would rate at him for it, and call him aſs, for uſing poor men ſo bloodily; and when I would maintain the contrary, he would ſay, that my father was worthy to have lain in priſon a year longer, for the ſaucy ſonnet he wrote to him from out of the Tower; which ſonnet, both becauſe it was written in defence of Queen Elizabeth, and becauſe, if I be not partial, it is no ill verſe for thoſe unrefined times, and toucheth the matter I enforce; I will here ſet down, pre-ſuppoſing, that in the eleven months before, he had ſent him many letters and petitions full of reaſon, that could not prevail for his liberty. The diſtreſſed priſoner writeth this rime:'

I.

At laſt withdraw your cruelty,
Or force the times to work your will;
It is too much extremity,
To keep me pent in priſon ſtill.
Free from all fault, void of all cauſe,
Without all right againſt all laws.
How can you doe more cruel ſpight,
Than proffer wrong and promiſe right?
Nor can accuſe nor will acquight.

II.

Eleven months paſt and longer ſpace,
I have abid your diveliſh drifts;
While you have ſought both man and place,
And ſet your ſnares with all your ſhifts;
The faultleſſe foot to wrap in wile,
With any guilt by any guile:
And now you ſee that will not be,
How can you thus for ſhame agree,
To keep him bound you can ſet free?

III.

Your chance was once as mine is now,
To keep this hold againſt your will;
And then you ſware you know well how,
Though now you ſwearve, I know how ill.
But thus the world his courſe doth paſſe,
The Prieſt forgets a Clerk he was;
And you that then cry'd juſtice ſtill,
And now have juſtice at your will,
Wreſt juſtice wrong againſt all ſkill.

IV.

But why doe I thus coldly plaine,
As if it were my cauſe alone;
When cauſe doth each man ſo conſtraine,
As England through hath cauſe to moane?
To ſee your bloody ſearch of ſuch,
Whom all the earth can no way touch,
And better were that all your kind,
Like hounds in Hell with ſhame were ſhrin'd,
Then you had might unto your mind.

V.

But as the ſtone that ſtrikes the wall,
Sometimes bounds back on th' hurler's head;
So your foul fetch, to your foul fall,
May turn and noy the breaſt that bred.
And then ſuch meaſure as you gave,
Of right and juſtice look to have.
If good or ill, if ſhort or long,
If falſe or true, if right or wrong,
And thus till then I end my ſong.

dreſs from the Convocation to the Cardinal, which he put into his hands himſelf, he had in ſome meaſure preſerved to all who poſſeſſed them; and this project was afterwards brought to bear by his friend Mr Secretary Petre (k). October the twenty-firſt 1555, he opened the ſeſſion with a judicious ſpeech, and was there again on the twenty-third, which was the laſt time of his appearing in that Aſſembly (l). Towards the cloſe of this month he fell ill, and continued to grow worſe and worſe to the thirteenth of November 1555, when he departed this life, about the age of ſeventy-two (m). As to the time of his deceaſe the diſpute is not great about it, but the manner of it is far from being ſettled [KK]. He [KK] But the manner of it is far from being ſettled.] In thoſe times, ſuch was the eagerneſs and heat of moſt writers, that ſcarce any extraordinary perſon went to his grave without a prodigy. In that great Chronicle which goes under the name of Holinſhed (101), tho' in the latter editions there was much added by Abraham Fleming, we have the following paſſage inſerted from John Fox, and the reaſon that we take it from thence, is becauſe this Chronicle being chiefly conſulted by the abridgers of Engliſh Hiſtory, the ſubſtance of this paſſage has been often retailed to the world for an undoubted truth.

(101) Holinſhed's Chronicle, Vol. II. p. 1130.

'During this ſeſſion of Parliament, Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Chancellor of England, died at his houſe called Wincheſter-Palace, beſide St Mary Overies in Southwark, the ninth day of November, whoſe corpſe was ſhortly after ſolemnly thence conveyed to his church of Wincheſter, and there buried. The manner of whoſe death why ſhould I bluſh to blaze as I find it by report. One Miſtreſs Monday, being the wife of one Maſter Monday, Secretary ſome time to the old Lord Thomas Duke of Norfolk, a preſent witneſs of this that is teſtified thus, openly reported in the houſe of a worſhipful citizen, bearing office in this city, in words and effect as followeth. The ſame day when as Biſhop Ridley and Maſter Latimer ſuffered at Oxford, being about the nineteenth day of October, there came to the houſe of Stephen Gardiner the old Duke of Norfolk, with the aforeſaid Monday, his Secretary above named, reporter hereof. The old aged Duke there waiting and tarrying for his dinner, the Biſhop being not yet diſpoſed to dine, deferred the time till three or four of the clock at afternoon. At length, about four of the clock, cometh his ſervant poſting in all poſſible ſpeed from Oxford, bringing intelligence to the Biſhop what he had heard and ſeen, of whom the ſaid Biſhop diligently enquiring the truth of the matter, and hearing by his man that fire moſt certainly was ſet unto them, cometh out rejoicing to the Duke. Now, faith he, let us go to dinner; whereupon they being ſet down, meat immediately was brought, and the Biſhop began merrily to eat: but what followed: The bloody tyrant had not eaten a few bits, but the ſudden ſtroke of God his terrible hand fell upon him, in ſuch ſort as immediately he was taken from the table, and ſo brought to his bed, where he continued the ſpace of fifteen days, in ſuch intolerable anguiſh and torments, that all that mean while, during thoſe fifteen days, he could not avoid, by ordure, or urine, or otherwiſe, any thing that he received; whereby his body being miſerably inflamed within, who had inflamed ſo many good martyrs before, was brought to a wretched end. And thereof, no doubt, as moſt like it is, came the thruſting out of his tongue, ſo ſwoln and black with the inflammation of his body. A ſpectacle worthy to be noted, and beholden, of all ſuch bloody burning perſecutors. But whatſoever he was, ſeeing he is now gone, I refer him to his Judge, to whom he ſhall ſtand or fall. As concerning his death, and manner thereof, I would they which were preſent thereat would teſtify to us what they ſaw. This we have all to think, that his death happened ſo opportunely, that England hath a mighty cauſe to give thanks to the Lord therefore; not ſo much for the great hurt he had done in times paſt, in pervertiug his Princeſs, in bringing in the ſix articles, in murthering God's Saints, in defacing Chriſt's ſincere religion, &c. as alſo, eſpecially, for that he had thought to have brought to paſs in murthering alſo our noble Queen that now is. For whatſoever danger it was of death that ſhe was in, it did no doubt proceed from that bloody Biſhop, who was the cauſe thereof. And if it be certain, which we have heard, that her Highneſs being in the Tower, a writ came down from certain of the Council for her execution, it is out of controverſy that wilie Wincheſter was the only Dedalus and framer of that engine. Who no doubt in that one day had brought this whole realm into woful ruin, had not the Lord's moſt gracious Council, thorough Maſter Bridges, then the Lieutenant, coming in haſte to the Queen, certified her of the matter, and prevented Achitophel's bloody devices. For the which thanks be to the ſame our Lord and Saviour, in the congregation of all Engliſh churches, amen.'

There are many exceptions to the truth of this account, which, in common juſtice to this Prelate's memory, ought to be mentioned. Mr Strype very juſtly obſerves, that both the time and place of his death are miſtaken; ſince he did not die on the ninth, but on the thirteenth of November, at two in the morning; neither did he die at Wincheſter-Houſe, but in Weſtminſter (102). Yet Mr Strype does not obſerve another miſtake, which is that of the day when Latimer and Ridley ſuffered at Oxford, which was not on the nineteenth of October, but on the fixteenth; ſo that here is at leaſt a week gained towards making the judgment more probable. Then the ſuppreſſion of urine is expreſsly ſaid to have continued fifteen days; whereas, according to his manner of ſtating it, it muſt have laſted one and twenty at leaſt; and had the ſtory been true, and the dates rightly placed, it muſt have laſted twenty-ſeven.

(102) Memorials, Vol. III. p. 270.

This, however, is not all; the Biſhop of Wincheſter, as Chancellor, opened the new Parliament on the twenty-firſt of October, and was there again on the twenty-third, a week after the death of the two martys; at whoſe death it is not likely he ſhould rejoice, if what Heylin ſays be true, that he ſtudied to prevent it (103). One of the exiles abroad, who laboured to expoſe Gardiner all in his power, charges him with ſtraining his authority, in offering Latimer a pardon without the knowledge of the Queen or Council (104). But to come cloſer to the point, the old Duke of Norfolk, who waited ſo long for his dinner, as his Secretary reported, who waited with him, died in the month of September 1554, that is, thirteen months before this tranſaction happened (105). His death was a thing of great notoriety, the Queen and Court, out of reſpect to his memory, going into mourning. One would think that Fox might have known this as well as another, ſince he lived long in that Duke's family, and went abroad but a very little before his death.

In reference to the latter part of this account, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the honeſt and impartial Hiſtorian John Speed, who was furniſhed with the beſt materials from ſome of the moſt conſiderable perſons in this kingdom, aſcribes the ill uſage of the Princeſs Elizabeth, and the advice given to take her off, to the Lord Paget (106); and aſſerts, that King Philip was ever after diſſident of him, and thoſe of his party. A certain Popiſh writer does indeed pretend to let us into the ſecret of the affair; he ſays, that Sir Thomas Wiat's plan for an inſurrection, was ſent to the Lady Elizabeth in a bracelet; that this was diſcovered by the Biſhop of Wincheſter, but that he puſhed it no farther than to perſwade her to ſubmit herſelf to the Queen. But the ſilence of Camden, in the account he gives of her ſufferings before her acceſſion to the Crown, as to all theſe facts, leaves them not a little doubtful.

(106) Chronicle, p. 823.

It muſt be acknowledged, that Fox is not the only author that has given the manner of his death the air of a judgment, for John Bale (107) goes even farther than he, affirming that he was informed by a letter wrote

(107) Strype's Memorials, Vol. III. p. 281,

He died at the royal palace of Whitehall, about one in the morning; and about three the ſame morning, his body was carried over to Wincheſter-Houſe, from whence the funeral was performed (n). His death was a great loſs to the Queen his miſtreſs, who found no Miniſter that could manage her affairs ſo well, or keep her on ſo good terms with her Parliaments, from whom, during his adminiſtration, ſhe received nothing, but lived upon the ſettled ordinary revenue of the Crown, with ſome help it may be from the treaſure brought over by King Philip. But this courſe was ſpeedily altered, and from that hour diſſatisfaction and complaints began (o). The Clergy had alſo a great loſs in him; they depended much on his wiſdom, and no leſs on his experience, but moſt of all on his caution and due regard for the law, by which they might be kept out of the reach of a præmunire; nor did he deceive their expectations in this, taking care while he lived that Cardinal Pole ſhould do nothing within this realm, but by authority under the broad ſeal of England as well as that of St Peter (p). Thoſe who were affectionate to that government had a great loſs in him, for he kept things together; and, by ſteering ſteadily and keeping a good countenance, preſerved a degree of reſpect which can never be preſerved where there is a fluctuation of Councils. His pen alſo was of no ſmall uſe, ſince in polemical writings he was inferior to none of his contemporaries, and with one party (few have it with more) had a high reputation for learning from the many books he had penned, of which ſomething will be ſaid at the bottom of the page [LL]. wrote out of England, 'that his diſeaſe was hydrops 'acidus & prodigioſus ſcabies, a ſharp dropſy and pro-'digious leproſy, taken, as was commonly reported, 'by drinking or whoredom. For he had indulged 'much to both thoſe vices in his life-time. In his ſick-'neſs he ſtunk like a jakes, his breath not to be en-'dured, his body diſtended, his eyes diſtorted and 'turned inwards; during his illneſs he ſpake little but 'blaſphemy and filthineſs, and gave up the ghoſt with 'curſes in his mouth, in terrible and unexpreſſible tor-'ments, &c.' He likewiſe adds, that he left thirty thouſand pounds in ready money behind him, beſides plate and rich furniture.

Dr Thomas Cooper, who was himſelf Biſhop of Wincheſter in Queen Elizabeth's time, and publiſhed his Chronicle within five years after Gardiner's death, ſets it down ſimply, and without any of theſe ſtrange circumſtances (108). He charges the death of Latimer and Ridley expreſsly upon Cardinal Pole; and tho' he gives a very particular account of the ill uſage of the Lady Elizabeth, yet he does not aſcribe it in the leaſt to Gardiner. Dr Francis Godwin, Biſhop of Hereford (109), aſſures us that he died of the Gout. Dr Fuller (110), as we have ſeen, aſcribes his end to a conſumption. In a book compiled by the direction of Archbiſhop Parker (111), he is alſo ſaid to have died of the gout or rheumatiſm; the lower parts of his body being mortified, ſmelt very offenſively. We are told by Biſhop Burnet (112), 'he had great remorſe 'for his former life; and Day, Biſhop of Chicheſter, 'coming to him, and comforting him with the aſſu-'rance of juſtification through the blood of Chriſt, he 'anſwered him he might ſpeak of that to him, or 'others in his condition, but if he opened that gap 'again, and preached that to the people, then farewel 'all together. He often repeated thoſe words, Erravi 'cum Petro, ſed non flevi cum Petro; I have erred with 'Peter, but I have not wept with Peter.'

[LL] At the bottom of the page] It is, without doubt, a very difficult taſk to attempt giving the reader an account of the writings of this Prelate; ſome few of them indeed were publiſhed with his name, and concerning them there is no diſpute. Others are without any name, and yet there are good reaſons to induce us to believe they fell from his pen; and others again have the names of other men ſet before them, tho' they were in reality penned by this Biſhop. We will, however, handle the matter as well as we can, and give the reader as juſt and as correct a catalogue of his writings, as the beſt enquiry we could make has put in our power.

The firſt piece made publick by our author, was his treatiſe De vera Obedientia, i. e. Of true Obedience, Loud. 1534, 1535, 4to. at Hamburgh in 1536, 8vo. with Biſhop Bonner's epiſtle prefixed, in which ſeveral ſtrong things are contained againſt the Pope's ſupremacy, and in ſupport of the King's divorce from Queen Katherine. We have before told the reader the nature of this work, which induced the author to ſpeak rather as an Orator than as a Logician; yet ſome of his arguments are not eaſily anſwered, tho' delivered with great plainneſs and moderation. He ſuggeſts, that the policy of the Church, in every kingdom, was partly ſpiritual and partly temporal; that, with reſpect to the former powers, they came from God; and for the latter, ſince they could not be executed without the conſent, ſo it is impoſſible they ſhould come but from the Civil magiſtrate. He urges, that Princes loſe their ſovereign dignity if they are not ſupreme in all cauſes over their ſubjects, and that therefore their ſupremacy makes a part of their ſovereignty; when therefore novelty is objected to this doctrine, he ſays it goes no farther than this, that a new term is employed in ſpeaking of an old right. He poſitively aſſerts, that St Peter's ſupremacy cannot be proved by Scripture; that the Biſhoprick of Jeruſalem was yielded by him, and the reſt of the Apoſtles, to St James, the brother of our Lord; and that if, on particular occaſions, St Peter acted as chief of the Apoſtles, it was owing to the deference they had for his extraordinary conduct and courage, which being perſonal qualities, could not convey any right to his ſucceſſors. In the cloſe he puts an objection againſt himſelf, it might be ſaid there was no agreement between his book and his practice; he had undertaken to preſs obedience, and failed notoriouſly in that branch of his duty. He had engaged his ſubjection to the Court of Rome, ſworn ſubmiſſion to the Pope and his ſucceſſors, and ſolemnly obliged himſelf to defend the privileges and juriſdiction of the Apoſtolick See. He received his epiſcopal character by the Pope's conſent, and was conſecrated by his mandate; and yet, after all theſe ties and aſſurances, he has ventured to write againſt his ſupremacy, and renounce him in the moſt publick manner. To take off the imputation of falſhood and perjury, he obſerves, that an engagement againſt right is by no means binding. For an oath was never intended a bond of iniquity, and a bar againſt repentance. He illuſtrates his caſe by a huſband's marrying a ſecond wife, living the former, whom after the beſt enquiry he concluded dead. Thus he continued undiſturbed in his ſecond marriage: and when his firſt wife returned from a foreign country, and challenged him for her huſband, he denied the relation. But after ſhe had made out her claim by legal proof, he lived with her again, and diſmiſſed the ſecond. This inſtance the Biſhop applies to his own caſe. He thought the Pope's authority unqueſtionable at firſt, and ſubmitted accordingly. But when truth appeared he found himſelf miſtaken, and therefore ought not to be charged with breach of faith for altering his meaſures. There were many other editions of this work, and a tranſlation into Engliſh, printed abroad in Queen Mary's time, by one Dr Turner, with a moſt vindictive preface before it; as alſo ſome additions, with intent to expoſe the Biſhop's inconſtancy, who had now ſubmitted again to the Pope.

character from the evidence of facts, and ſupporting what is advanced by the cleareſt authorities, might in ſome degree diſpenſe with our offering to ſum up at the cloſe what has been

A neceſſary Doctrine and Erudition for any Chriſtenman, ſet furthe by the Kynges Majeſtie of England, &c. Lond by Thomas Berthelet, 1543; this, as we have ſaid before, was publiſhed with royal authority; and Mr Strype, in giving us the hiſtory of this piece, which was the ſyſtem of religion in King Henry's time, allows the Biſhop of Winchelter but a very ſmall ſhare in it; yet, in King Edward's time, Archbiſhop Cranmer was for yielding him the whole merit of the work; and his report was ſo much credited, that John Bale put it into the catalogue of our author's writings, in which he has been followed by Biſhop Tanner; yet there is a paſſage in the declaration, concerning the life and actions of the Archbiſhop, written by his Secretary Mr Morris, ſtill preſerved in Bennet College Library at Cambridge (113); which is not very conſiſtent with this account, and which is reported here only to ſhew how very difficult a thing it is to come at certainty, with reſpect to matters of fact, even from thoſe who one would think muſt have been beſt acquainted with them.

(113) This Declaration is a very curious piece, and deſerves to be printed entire.

'At what time, ſays he, the book of articles of our 'religion was new penned. For even at that ſeaſon, 'the whole rabblement, which he took to be his 'friends, being Commiſſioners with him, forſook him, 'and his opinion and doctrine. And ſo leaving him 'poſt alone, revolted altogether on the part of Stephen 'Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter. As by name, Bi'ſhop Hethe, Shaxton, Day, and all other of the 'meaner ſort. By whom theſe ſo named were chiefly 'advanced and preferred unto dignities. And yet this 'ſudden inverſion, notwithſtanding God gave him ſuch 'favour with his Prince, that book altogether paſt by 'his aſſertion againſt all their minds. More to be 'marvelled at, the time conſidered, than by any rea'ſon to compaſs how it ſhould come to paſs. For then 'would there have been laid thouſands of pounds to 'hundreds in London, that he ſhould, before that Sy'nod had been ended, have been ſhut up in the Tower, 'beſide his friend the Lord Cromwell. Howbeit, the 'King's Majeſty having an aſſured and approved affi'ance, both of his deep knowledge in religion, and 'fidelity both to God and him, ſuſpected in that time 'other men in their judgments, not to walk uprightly 'nor ſincerely. For that ſome of them ſwerved from 'their former opinions in doctrine: and having great 'experience of the conſtancy of the Lord Cranmer, 'it drove him all along to join with the ſaid Lord 'Cranmer, in the confirmation of his opinion and doc'trine againſt all the reſt, to their great admiration.' When the Biſhop of Wincheſter was in Germany, with the title of Ambaſſador from King Henry VIII, he had ſeveral conferences with the learned Bucer, upon different points, which afterwards occaſioned warm writings on both ſides, ſome of which were publiſhed, and others not.

In the year 1550, Archbiſhop Cranmer publiſhed a book intituled, 'A Defence of the true and Catholick 'Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood 'of our Saviour Chriſt, with a Confutation of ſundry 'Errors concerning the ſame: grounded and eſtabliſh'ed upon God's holy Word, and approved by the 'Conſent of the moſt antient Doctors of the Church.' In this book he mentioned the Biſhop of Wincheſter by name, as one of the greateſt writers amongſt the Papiſts; with which this Prelate was ſo much offended, that he thought himſelf obliged to write an anſwer, as he did under this title, An Explication and Aſſertion of the true Catholick faith, touching the moſt bleſſed Sacrament of the altar, with the Confutation of a book written againſt the ſame: which was printed abroad in 1551, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter endeavoured to make the world believe, that his writing this book was one great cauſe, or rather the principal cauſe, of the ſevere proceedings againſt him; which, however, was peremptorily denied by the Archbiſhop, who not long after publiſhed another piece, under the following title, 'An Anſwer, by the Reverend Father in God Thomas 'Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, 'and Metropolitan, unto a crafty and ſophiſtical Ca'villation, deviſed by Stephen Gardiner, Doctor of 'Law, late Biſhop of Wincheſter, againſt the true and 'godly Doctrine of the moſt holy Sacrament of the 'Body and Blood of our Saviour Chriſt. Wherein is 'alſo, as Occaſion ſerveth, anſwered ſuch Places of 'the Book of Dr Richard Smith, as may ſeem any 'thing worthy the anſwering. Alſo a true Copy of 'the Book written, and in open Court delivered, by 'Dr Stephen Gardiner; not one Word added or di'miniſhed, but faithfully in all points agreeing with the 'Original.' To this, Gardiner replied in Latin, under the feigned name of Marcus Antonius Conſtantius, a Divine of Lovain, giving his book the following title, Confutatio cavillationum, quibus, ſacroſanctum Euchariſtiæ Sacramentum, ab impiis Capernaitis impeti ſolet. Printed at Paris 1552. This piece he compoſed while a priſoner in the Tower, which is the reaſon of our affirming that the order for debarring him the uſe of pen, ink, and paper, muſt have been relaxed; and to this the Archbiſhop, during his own confinement, wrote a large and copious anſwer, which he did not live to finiſh.

Biſhop Gardiner managed this controverſy alſo againſt Peter Martyr, and others who eſpouſed Cranmer; and it was for theſe writings of his, that he was in thoſe days magnified by the Papiſts, as a moſt zealous Catholick; and diſliked and dreaded by thoſe of the Church of England, as a warm and irreconcileable enemy; whereas, in truth, he admitted the Communion to be given in both kinds, and, being allowed to put his own ſenſe upon the words, would have ſubſcribed to what was eſtabliſhed about the Sacrament. After the accеſſion of Queen Mary, finding himſelf attacked with the utmoſt violence and virulence by ſeveral of the exiles abroad, and particularly by Dr Turner (114), who wrote ſeveral treatiſes on purpoſe to expoſe and abuſe him; as Dr Poynet likewiſe did, who ſucceeded him in the title of Biſhop of Wincheſter, when he was deprived, to which he wrote replies, and is alſo ſaid to have corrected at leaſt, if he did not compoſe, Dr Martyn's book againſt the married Clergy.

(114) See his article in Bale and Tanner.

He likewiſe preached two very remarkable ſermons in that reign: the firſt, November the thirtieth 1554, at Paul's Croſs, to a very numerous audience, in which he placed the new opinions, as he called them, in a very bad light, attributing to them all the extravagant and unjuſt things that had been done under the reign of King Edward. In this ſermon he took ſhame to himſelf, and acknowledged that he had erred too as well as the reſt, with a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe. In the ſecond part of his ſermon he gave a high character of King Philip, whom he repreſented as a prudent, gentle, and temperate Prince, exhorting the people to behave well towards him, by which they might gain him, and all that he had brought with him; which ſome ſay alluded to his money that had been carried publickly to the Tower, in order to ingratiate him with the populace. Thus much is certainly true, that, by the marriage articles which Gardiner framed, that Prince was allowed to bring what riches he pleaſed into the kingdom, but was reſtrained from carrying out ſpecie, bullion, or jewels.

The Biſhop's ſecond ſermon was likewiſe preached at Paul's Croſs, on the the ſecond of December following, on account of the nation's returning to communion with the See of Rome. His text was (*), Knowing the time that it is now high time to awake out of ſleep, &c. From theſe words, amongſt other things, he obſerved that when King Henry VIII. was preſſed with a rebellion in the North, he reſolved to return the Pope his Supremacy. But this reſolution came to nothing. The hour was not yet come. For had the matter gone forward under ſuch circumſtances of difficulty, ſome would have ſaid the King had been over awed into juſtice. After this, Gardiner and Knevet were ſent Embaſſadors to the Emperor, to requeſt his mediation for bringing the Pope and the King to a good underſtanding, and to ſmooth the way for renewing the former correſpondence between them: But the time was not yet come: For the juncture might have made the King's meaſures miſunderſtood, and interpreted his compliance to reaſons of State. In the beginning of King Edward's reign been in a great meaſure inſiſted on thro' the whole article. But the length of it (how abſurd ſoever that may ſeem) will not ſuffer ſuch an omiſſion, leaſt an unwary reader ſhould take his ſenſe from a part, and not from the whole; which on that account it is neceſſary, as well as expedient, ſhould be contracted into one point of view, and therefore in the notes, his conduct in different ſtations is clearly and candidly, tho' not copiouſly, ſtated [MM].

The

reign the buſineſs of reconciliation was moved, but neither was that a proper time: For the King being then a child, he could not have had a ſhare in the ſubmiſſion. In ſhort, he told them this was the time which Providence ſeemed to have reſerved for ſo great a bleſſing.

There are likewiſe extant, in the firſt edition of Fox's Acts and Monuments, ſeveral letters of the Biſhop of Wincheſter's to the Duke of Somerſet, Lord Protector, with the Duke's anſwers to ſome of them; as alſo other letters of his, to different perſons; we might add to theſe, ſeveral other little pieces; but to avoid prolixity, and in order to bring this long article to a ſpeedy cloſe, we will refer the curious reader to Biſhop Tanner's accurate catalogue, with this obſervation only, that whereas he mentions two penitent letters to Archbiſhop Cranmer, publiſhed by Strype, as if they were written by the Biſhop; that is plainly a miſtake, for they were written by William Gardiner, one of the Prebendaries of Canterbury, who, about the year 1543, was engaged in a baſe deſign of aſperſing the Archbiſhop, for which he ſeems to have been very penitent (115). It is not impoſſible that this man's name might occaſion other miſtakes, and prove the handle for objecting to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, his being ſo deeply concerned in the ſeveral plots formed about that time againſt the Archbiſhop.

(115) Tanneri Biblioth. Britannico-Hibernica, p. 309. Strype's Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, in the Appendix, p. 69, 70, 71.

The letters of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, to Sir Thomas Smith and Sir John Cheke, againſt the new pronunciation of the Greek language, are moſt of them extant; in which it was Roger Aſcham's opinion, that tho' theſe learned Knights ſhewed themſelves better criticks than our Prelate, yet his letters manifeſted a ſuperior genius, and were chiefly liable to cenſure, from his affecting to enter farther into a diſpute of this kind than was neceſſary for a perſon of his dignity. On the whole it may be truly affirmed, that if he had not entered into buſineſs ſo early, or had not been ſo much employed as he was in political affairs, he might have eſtabliſhed a great reputation for his knowledge in polite literature, which was certainly very extenſive; and ſo much a maſter he was of foreign affairs, that in the latter part of King Henry's reign they were compelled to conſult him, tho' unwilling to confide in him.

Under Queen Mary he ſhewed his great abilities in this ſcience ſo highly uſeful to Miniſters, by his maſterly conduct in the management of the Spaniſh match, and by his keeping the friends of King Philip, ſo long as he lived, from involving the Engliſh nation in a war with France, againſt which he had expreſsly provided in the laſt article of the marriage treaty. It is alſo believed, that notwithſtanding he could not prevail with Queen Mary to retain the title of Supreme Head of the Church, or prevent her ſubmitting to the See of Rome; yet he gave her ſuch notions of her own rights, and of the neceſſity of oppoſing Papal encroachments, as induced her, after his death, to act with ſo much ſpirit as ſhe did, when an attempt was made to ſend over a Legate who was unacceptable to her, merely becauſe her politicks happened not to be very conſiſtent with thoſe of the Court of Rome at that juncture; tho' in all probability, had he ſurvived, that quarrel would have been prevented, ſince it was owing to the Queen's deſerting his maxim, and embracing her huſband's foreign intereſts againſt her own.

[MM] Clearly and candidly, though not copiouſly, ſtated.] The only certain way of collecting men's characters, is from their actions; it is true, theſe are not always uniform, but neither is the mind of man, we muſt take them as we find them, and be content to follow the evidence they give, inſtead of ſuborning them to teſtify to the notions we have conceived. If we conſider Stephen Gardiner in this light, we muſt allow him great parts, ſince he raiſed himſelf, and that to the higheſt ſtations. We muſt alſo own, that he had many good qualities, not only becauſe it is impoſſible that he ſhould have roſe without them, but becauſe the proofs we have ſeen, are ſuch, as will not ſuffer it to be diſputed. He was learned himſelf, and a lover of learning and learned men; he was grateful to his maſter Wolſey in diſtreſs; to the memory of his royal maſter Henry VIII, when he was dead; to the Duke of Norfolk, when himſelf was exalted to power. He was of a generous and liberal diſpoſition, kept a good houſe, and brought up ſeveral young men, ſome of which, became afterwards Stateſmen, Peers, and Privy-Counſellors, Secretaries of State, and Chancellors, He had courage, which enabled him to ſtand againſt all his enemies, in the time of King Henry, and bore him up through a long courſe of miſery and misfortunes in the ſucceeding reign, neither did it forſake him in the laſt period of his life, ſince, in point of vigour, as well as prudence, his adminiſtration is as conſpicuous as any in our records, and the more ſo, ſince from the day of his death his miſtreſs's affairs went wrong, and the publick confuſion became ſo great, as to break that Princeſs's heart, the force and credit of the nation being long before broken.

He had great addreſs in conciliating the minds of men, which plainly appeared by that attachment which ſome of the greateſt Stateſmen in all reſpects, had to his perſonal advice for almoſt forty years together, as well as by his intereſt with foreign Princes, of which he availed himſelf upon all occaſions. But his greateſt virtue was publick ſpirit, which he ſhewed in maintaining the rights of his College, preſerving the revenues of his See, and, above all, in preventing the projects of Philip from taking place, circumſcribing the power of the Queen, when he found it might be dangerous to the conſtitution, and obliging Cardinal Pole, to accept a commiſſion under the Great Seal, for executing his Legantine Power, by which the Papal authority, when reſtored, was ſtill in a condition of reſtraint.

He had his vices, and his bad qualities too, for what man, what Miniſter, has them not? His envy appeared in his croſſing the deſigns of Cranmer, in the reign of King Henry, and if he really drew the articles againſt the Protector Somerſet, it is a proof that he was vindictive. He had certainly a great meaſure of pride, and his ambition was boundleſs, to which, if we add what moſt writers beſtow upon him plentifully, a refined diſſimulation, we ſhall perhaps have a tolerable notion of the dark, as well as the bright ſide of this character. As to his religion, he ſeems to have been more a Proteſtant than a Papiſt in his principles, but with a great regard to the authority of the Church, from whence aroſe his unwillingneſs to reform haſtily; he conſidered the maſs of the people as groſsly ignorant, and therefore he thought that ſome allowances were to be made them, from an apprehenſion, that if they were ſuddenly taught to contemn what they had long revered, it might render it very difficult to make them revere any thing; Cranmer was honeſt and open, hated prieſtcraft and ſuperſtition; Gardiner was cloſe and circumſpect, afraid of novelties, and ſuſpicious that anarchy would enſue from affording a premature countenance to forcign opinions; this difference in their ſentiments, had, as might well be expected, a ſtrong influence on their fortunes, expoſed Cranmer to ſufferings, and Gardiner to miſrepreſentations.

To enter more thoroughly into his merit, let us conſider him in the Univerſity, the Church, and the Court, ſince in the different ſcenes of his life, he was in ſome meaſure ſupreme in all. He loved an academical life, had a true notion of it's advantages, and was very deſirous of promoting them to the utmoſt extent of his power. Dr Fuller, ſpeaking of Trinity-Hall (116), ranges the great men produced by that foundation, in four claſſes, Maſters, Benefactors, Writers, Biſhops, and we find Gardiner's name in every one of them. The Duke of Somerſet, when Protector, would have had him reſigned that houſe into the hands of the crown,

The fashion of those times allowed more to exterior expressions of funeral sorrow than ours, and by entertaining the eyes of the vulgar with a lugubrious spectacle (q) of a great man's last journey, impressed on their minds a greater degree of reverence than could be wrought by giving out, that from his affection to the Civil Law, he was inclined to erect a College for promoting that study, and to endow it with the revenues of that foundation, and of Clare-Hall. 'Most politick Gardiner, 'says my author, not without cause, suspecting some 'design or casualty might surprise the interval between 'the dissolution of the old, and the erection of this 'new foundation, civilly declined the motion, informing his Grace, that the way to advance the study of 'the Law, was by promoting the present professors of 'that faculty (now so generally discouraged) and not by 'founding a new College for the future students thereof, seeing Trinity-Hall alone, could breed more Civilians than all England did prefer according to their 'deserts.' This, as the same writer observes, cost Gardiner his mastership, but saved the foundation.

He was no less tender of the privileges of the University as Chancellor, than of the welfare of that Hall of which he was Master; this fully appears from Ascham's letters to him, even when the Protector had supplanted him in that office, so much the University depended upon his friendship, when necessity obliged them to deprive him of his power (117). Upon the turn of the times, and his coming again into that office, he purged it thoroughly, turning out all the masters except two, yet some kind things made amends for this, if there was any injustice in it, for Queen Mary made a considerable grant to Trinity College, and the Chancellor, by the help of his Vice-Chancellor, and another famous instrument of his, Dr Andrew Perne, preserved that seat of the Muses from the flames of persecution. Cardinal Pole, who succeeded Gardiner, and was Chancellor at once of both Universities, began his administration at Cambridge, by burning the dead bodies of Martin Bucer, and Paul Fagius, which had remained quiet in their graves during Gardiner's time, though Bucer was his old opponent; yet our Historians say, Gardiner was a furious persecutor, and Pole a very moderate man, to which we should have no exception, if he had burnt only dead bodies.

(117) Aschami Epistolæ.

As Bishop of Winchester, we find him always very considerable; he was able to do much in Convocation, and more in Parliament. Such as are disposed to see with their own eyes, and not trust to the reports of Historians, will find abundant proofs of this, by resorting to the remains of the journals of both assemblies that are still preserved; and the further evidence of this is the extraordinary care that was taken to exclude him from both, during the whole reign of King Edward. In this those who loved the Reformation concurred, as fearing his abilities, and the courtiers assisted them therein, as being thoroughly acquainted with his resolution. They knew that no See in England afforded richer plunder than Winchester; and they knew in that point, that no Bishop in England was more inflexible than Gardiner, but being once heaved out, they made no doubt of cutting many pretty estates out of the lands of this Bishoprick; and we have elsewhere shewn that in this they were not mistaken; but as this is a point of very great consequence, and as at the beginning of this article, we gave the reader Gardiner's picture drawn by the hands of his successor, Bishop Poynet; so here we will give a detail of Bishop Poynet's administration, as Mr Strype (118) has drawn it from records, which will shew what those apprehensions were, that made Bishop Gardiner so stiff in his opposition, and what concessions the great men in power exacted for the countenance they gave to the Reformation, to which we may in a great measure ascribe the turn that happened upon the accession of Queen Mary.

(118) Strype's Memorials, Vol. II. p. 272, 273, 274.

'In the month of May, 1551, when Ponet was 'made Bishop of Winchester, after the deprivation of 'Gardiner, a great alienation was made of the lands 'and revenues antiently belonging to that Bishoprick, 'according as it was required of the said Ponet, when 'he first came to the See, or rather conditionally to 'his preferment thither. Then he passed away to the 'King, the manors of Marden, Twiford, Marwel, 'Waltham, &c. in the county of Southampton, and 'divers other lands, lordships, tenements, rents, &c. 'and, in effect, all the temporalities of that rich Bishoprick. And to make all sure, letters were dispatched 'to the Dean and Chapter, to confirm the grant of the 'said Bishop, by their full consent and seal of the 'Chapter, as in that case, by the order of the 'laws, is required and accustomed. Then did the 'King give to the Bishop and his successors, in consideration of the said Bishop's surrender, a great many 'rectories, as that of Bremmer, and of the Chapel of 'Charford and Hale, and the rectory of Regborn, in 'the county of Southampton, and divers other lands, 'to the value of two thousand marks, to be held in 'liberam elemosynam, and to take the profits from 'Michaelmas last. He granted him moreover, for 'some recompence for all this taken away, that his 'first fruits, which before were charged in the King's 'books, at three thousand eight hundred eighty-five 'pounds, three shillings, three-pence half-penny farthing, should be now reduced to two thousand marks, 'and that for his tenths, from henceforth he should be 'taxed at two hundred marks and no more, to be paid 'yearly; that he should have ten years space to pay 'his first fruits in; that bonds should be taken for payment from the Bishop only, without sureties to be 'bound with him: and that all the bonds and writings 'for the first fruits of his former Bishoprick, viz. of 'Rochester, should be delivered him up, which the 'King forgave him. And for the putting all this into 'effect, a warrant was issued out to the Chancellor, 'Treasurer, and Council, and to all others being officers of the court of First Fruits and Tenths. The 'King also gave him a licence to enter into his Bishoprick, and to take the profits thereof, without paying any thing therefore, notwithstanding a statute 'made in that behalf, in the twenty-sixth of Henry 'the Eighth, the import whereof was, that no spiritual person should enter upon his benefice before he 'had paid the first fruits, or given bond and security to 'pay them. A pardon also was granted him of all 'pains, penalties, and sums of money that might be 'forfeited and due to the King, for entring into the 'Bishoprick of Rochester, contrary to the said statute. 'The King soon gratified his servants with the lands 'and manors of this Bishoprick, viz. To Sir John 'Gates, the manors of Sutton, Ropley, &c. in Southampton and Surry, of the yearly value of one 'hundred forty five pounds, nineteen shillings, nine-pence half-penny. To Sir Philip Hoby, the manors 'of Marden, &c. in the county of Southampton, of 'the yearly value of eighty-seven pounds, eighteen 'shillings, seven-pence. To Sir Andrews Dudley, the 'manor of Witney, &c. of the yearly value of one-hundred eighty pounds, seven-pence half-penny farthing. To Sir Henry Seymour, lands to the yearly 'value of one hundred eighty-six pounds, four-pence. 'To William Fitz-Williams, the manor of High Clere, '&c. to the yearly value of eighty-four pounds, seventeen shillings, three-pence. To Henry Nevyle, the 'manor of Margrave, &c. to the yearly value of one-hundred fourteen pounds, eighteen shillings, ten-pence. Sir Thomas Wroth, had also an annuity of 'one-hundred pounds. And for the further confirmation of this alienation made by the Bishop of Winchester, it was thought requisite to have it allowed 'and consented to by the Dean and Chapter under 'their seal. Whereupon, in August, a letter was sent 'to Sir John Mason, Knight, that he should repair to 'Winchester, and to agree with the Bishop to meet 'them there at a certain day, and to cause all the 'Canons, Prebendaries, and others whom it concerned, 'to assemble in the Chapter-House, for confirming the 'said lands before Michaelmas next, and to advertise 'the Council the next day, that order might be given 'to the King's learned Counsel to be there at the same 'time. And a letter was sent to this Bishop, in behalf 'of the City of Winchester, namely, to take order, 'that the city and citizens, and their successors, might 'be freed from their suits and services heretofore made 'to that court, called the Palm Court, and all other 'liberties he had to the same, clearly exonerated and by words. As this is a point not altogether unworthy of obſervation, and as we rarely find ceremonies of this kind ſo clearly, ſo circumſtantially, and ſo methodically ſet down as theſe are, we judged it not altogether amiſs to give them a place in the notes, as a ſort of feature of that age, when there was more attention paid to Sight than to all the reſt of the Senſes, and more money beſtowed, and more diligence uſed, in ſetting out ſuch a ſolemnity, than without ſuch a detail as this could be eaſily imagined [NN]. Many intrigues were

We ſee that it was not either doctrine or ceremonies that produced Gardiner's deprivation, he would have conſented to the one, and complied with the other, though at the ſame time he profeſſed, that more alterations were made than he could approve; but ſpoiling his Biſhoprick was a thing to which he would never have yielded. He judged the Chriſtian Church with the ſupremacy placed in the crown, to be a neceſſary part of the Engliſh conſtitution, and for that reaſon was for preſerving it; and when he afterwards recovered this See, he made uſe of the law to recover it's revenues. But how right ſoever his conduct might be in this reſpect, his compliances were certainly wrong in the reign of Queen Mary, becauſe he acted contrary to his own knowledge. However he might ſolve to himſelf the reſtoring the Papal power, and reviving the ſanguinary laws, without which, it could not be ſupported; it is impoſſible to juſtify him, nor will any honeſt and ingenuous man attempt it; but that he acted in many things unwillingly, and under that neceſſity which he had brought upon himſelf and the nation, by complying with Queen Mary's bigotry, is apparent enough from his actions, which though they excuſe him in ſome inſtances from cruelty, yet that very excuſe demonſtrates, that he acted againſt his principles, in procuring that power for others, which was executed with ſuch unchriſtian rigour and ſeverity.

Some of our Hiſtorians urge in favour of Cardinal Pole, that he was under no neceſſity of putting Cranmer to death, in order to come at the Archbiſhoprick, ſince that was conferred upon him by the Pope (119), before the burning of his predeceſſor. If this was really ſo, then the ſuggeſtion that Biſhop Gardiner preſerved Cranmer's life out of ſpleen to Pole, and from private views, muſt be alſo ill-founded, and his preſervation of him as long as he lived, may be therefore referred to a better motive. But ſtill, his reconciling the Engliſh nation to the obedience of the See of Rome, which was plainly his act and deed, is as indefenſible as ever. Whatever compaſſion he might have as a man, he ſhewed little of the piety or prudence of a Chriſtian Biſhop in that action, the worſt without all doubt of his whole life, though not the worſt ſpoken of, even by Proteſtant Hiſtorians.

(119) Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. Vol. II. p. 391.

His behaviour as a Miniſter of State in the reign of Henry, is far from being unexceptionable. His ſolliciting the divorce from Queen Katherine, at home and abroad; his carrying Cranmer to the King, applauding his advice, and taking upon himſelf to carry it into execution at Cambridge, if done contrary to his ſenſe of things, as there is great probability it was, cannot be either defended or excuſed. His reverſing all this, by an Act of Parliament, and throwing the whole odium upon Cranmer; Biſhop Burnet ſays (120), ſhewed he had loſt all ſenſe of ſhame, and a man muſt want either conſcience or underſtanding, who does not think ſo. His adviſing Queen Mary to acts of lenity at her entrance on the government, was certainly very commendable. His ſolliciting her to reſtore what the crown had taken from ſeveral noble families, ſuch as Norfolk, Arundel, Stanhope, and Hungerford, and the proviſion for reſtoring in blood, the Earl of Devonſhire, and the ſon of the Duke of Somerſet, highly laudable; his excluding foreign influence from Engliſh Councils, and his preventing a Spaniſh Prince from being placed on the Engliſh throne, were eſſential ſervices to his country; his attention upon all occaſions to the ſpirit of the conſtitution, in preference to every thing, and particularly, both to royal and miniſterial power, is worthy of praiſe and of imitation.

(120) Hiſt. of the Reformat. Vol. II. p. 254.

It might be thought a ſtrange omiſſion, if we ſhould ſay nothing of the charge that was brought againſt him of corrupting Parliaments, as it is mentioned by ſeveral eminent Hiſtorians, but the aſſerting boldly, or tranſcribing a fact, often is no kind of evidence. We find nothing of it in the earlieſt Hiſtorians, who wrote in the ſucceeding reign; and there is nothing brought to juſtify it, excepting what has been ſaid of King Philip's bringing over a large ſum in ready money. As to the Parliament, particularly inſiſted upon, which is the ſecond of the Queen's reign, and as to which it is ſurmiſed, that he gave penſions to ſeveral of the members; there is a matter of fact that ſtrongly contradicts it, and it is this, that this Parliament did not continue full two months, meeting on the ſecond of April, and being diſſolved on the twenty fifth of May. Now it is natural to believe, that if this Miniſter's influence, which was indeed very great, had been built upon corruption, he would have continued that Parliament; for it is not the cuſtom of thoſe who give wages, to be content with ſuch ſhort ſervice, more eſpecially when a Parliament was again called the very ſame year. Beſides the Spaniſh money was not then arrived.

We may add to all this, that our Prelate had leſs occaſion to bribe, becauſe he aſked no ſupplies. It is uſual to wet the ſucker, before the hand is applied to the pump, but it would be a mere waſte of water, if there was no intention of pumping. The Miniſters who followed him in that reign, ſtood in need of that vile expedient, and practiſed it, but they ſteered by other maxims than Gardiner had done, and knew not the art of managing Parliaments, by beginning with Conſtitutional Bills, and thereby putting them in a good humour, or of being contented with a moderate ſhare of ſucceſs, and not puſhing too many government points at once, which were the principal arts he uſed.

In this reſpect he was perfectly happy, that he died before he found himſelf under the neceſſity of altering his conduct, or of forfeiting the reputation he had acquired by unwarrantable compliances. We are now at ſuch a diſtance from the time in which he lived, and are poſſeſſed of ſo many publick and private papers, that open to us the whole circle of his conduct, at the ſame time that all partiality or prejudice is, or ought to be, removed, that we may look on ourſelves as free, as well as competent judges of it. To this, if the pains taken in the preſent article, ſhall any way contribute, it will fully anſwer the only end for which they were taken, by recommending a critical examination of our Hiſtory, with an unbiaſſed regard to truth and the conſtitution.

[NN] Could be eaſily imagined.] In all probability, the reaſon of removing the Biſhop's corps ſo haſtily, was to have it in the proper place where theſe funeral honours might be paid, ſince at the Court, where he died, it would have been very improper. By five o'clock in the afternoon of the ſame day, his bowels were buried before the high-altar, in the pariſh church of St Mary Overy's; at ſix, the knell began, and a Dirge and Maſs, all the bells continuing to ring till ſeven at night. November the fourteenth, began the knell again; there was then a hearſe adorned with four branches of gilt candleſticks, two white branches, and three dozen of ſtaff torches. The choir was hung with black, and coats of arms and eſcutcheons, Dirge ſung that evening; the next day, Maſs of Requiem was ſung by Dr Bonner, Biſhop of London, many Prelates, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen being preſent; after which Dr White, Biſhop of Lincoln, aſcended the pulpit, and preached the Funeral Sermon, this over, they went to Wincheſter palace to dinner. The ſame day in the afternoon, was Dirge ſung in every pariſh in London, with a hearſe and ringing of bells, and the next day a Maſs of Requiem and prayers, according to the faſhion of thoſe times. On the twenty-firſt of the ſame month, about noon, began the knell, when the body was brought to the church of St Mary Over's, attended by all the Biſhops who were in town, and by a great number of the Clergy; the Biſhop of London performed the funeral Service, and wore his Mitre; were ſet on foot at Court, on this great Prelate's death, about filling his places, which occaſioned ſome delay in diſpoſing of them. The great ſeal was in the mean time put into the hands of Sir Nicholas Hare, Maſter of the Rolls, and on Newyear's-day following given to Dr Nicholas Heath, Archbiſhop of York (r). In the Chancellorſhip of Cambridge he was ſucceeded by Cardinal Pole (s), who had ſome inclinations to have held his Biſhoprick of Wincheſter too in commendam; but at length it was given to Dr White, Biſhop of Lincoln, the modeſt Cardinal contenting himſelf with a penſion of one thouſand pounds a year out of the revenue, for the ſupport of his dignity (t). As to the Maſterſhip of Trinity-Hall, Dr Mowſe, who took it as a good Proteſtant in King Edward's time, was now become ſo good a Catholick as to take it again in Queen Mary's time; and in the days of Elizabeth had a Prebend of York beſtowed upon him, being once more become a Proteſtant (u). As to the private eſtate of Biſhop Gardiner, he diſpoſed of it by will, of which his two old friends (w), Sir Anthony Brown, Viſcount Montacute, and Dr Thomas Thirlby, Biſhop of Ely, were the executors.

Mitre; before the corps, went the King at Arms in his coat, and five banners of his arms, and four images wrought with gold and jewels. On the morrow were ſaid three Maſſes; one of the Trinity, one of our Lady, and one of Requiem; after which, the company repaired to dinner at Wincheſter Palace, and the body was depoſited in a vault, till it could be carried to Wincheſter. On the twenty-fourth of February following, were the obſequies of this Prelate celebrated after the following manner. In the afternoon, began the knell at St Mary Overies and ringing. After that began the Dirge. A pall of cloth of gold, and two white branches, and two dozen of ſtaff torches burning, and four great tapers. The Lord Montacute, the chief mourner, and the Lord Biſhop of Lincoln, Sir Robert Rocheſter, Comptroller, and divers other attendants in black, and many black gowns and coats. And the morrow, Maſs of Requiem and offering done, began the Sermon; and ſo Maſs being done, all repaired to a dinner at Lord Montacute's. At the gate, the corps was put into a chariot with four horſes all covered with black. Over the corps, an image reſembling the deceaſed, with his mitre on his head, with five gentlemen, bearing five banners of his arms. Then followed an hundred men in gowns and hoods. Then two Heralds in their coat-armour; Mr Garter and Rouge Croix. Then came men riding, carrying of torches burning, in number ſixty, about the corps all the way. Then came the mourners in gowns and coats, to the number of two-hundred, afore and behind; and ceaſing, and there they had a great torch given them. And ſo through every pariſh till they came to Wincheſter. And as many as came to meet them, had money given them. And a Dirge and Maſs at every lodging (121). All theſe needleſs ceremonies being over, the corps was interred according to the Biſhop's laſt will, as Biſhop Godwin tells us, on the north ſide of the high altar in the Cathedral, in a tomb anſwerable to that of Biſhop Fox, on the other ſide (122). Many poetical compoſitions, both in Latin and Engliſh, were publiſhed on the demiſe of this great Prelate; the moſt bitter invectives againſt him, may be found in Bale, who ſeems to have taken particular pleaſure in the abuſe of him; on the other hand, Mr John Morwen, who was fellow of Corpus-Chriſti College in Oxford, wrote an elegant Latin Poem in honour of his memory, in which there are many facts, as well as much panegyric. Sir John Harrington, whom we have before mentioned, deals very fairly by him and the publick, by preſerving a poem highly in his commendation; and that piece, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, reverſed into a moſt outrageous ſatire. It had been well, if authors on both ſides had confined their partiality and their prejudice, to poetical compoſitions only, and left hiſtory untainted with them, we ſhould then have been able to have made this article much ſhorter, as well as more ſatisfactory. GARTH (Sir SAMUEL), a genuine ſon of Apollo, as he was at once an excellent Poet, and a very learned as well as ſucceſsful Phyſician. He was deſcended from a good family in Yorkſhire, and after he had paſſed through his ſchool education, he was removed to Peter-Houſe in Cambridge, where he is ſaid to have continued till he was created Doctor of Phyſick, July the ſeventh 1691 (a). His firſt examination before the Royal College of Phyſicians, was on the twelfth of March 1691-2, and he was admitted Fellow June the twenty-ſixth 1692 (b). In 1696, he zealouſly encouraged the ſpeedy erecting the Diſpenſary, being an apartment in the College for the relief of the ſick poor, by giving them advice gratis, and diſpenſing medicines to them at low rates (c). This work of charity having expoſed him, and many other of the moſt eminent Phyſicians, to the envy and reſentment of ſeveral perſons of the ſame Faculty, as well as Apothecaries, he ridiculed them with peculiar ſpirit and vivacity, in his admirable poem called THE DISPENSARY, in ſix canto's; which, tho' it firſt ſtole into the world a little haſtily and incorrect, in the year 1699, yet bore in a few months three impreſſions, and was afterwards printed ſeveral times, with a dedication to Anthony Henly, Eſq; and commendatory verſes by Mr Charles Boyle, afterwards Earl of Orrery, Colonel Chriſtopher Codrington, Thomas Cheek, Eſq; and Colonel Henry Blount (d). This poem raiſed our author a very juſt, as well as prodigious, reputation (e) [A]. This poetical character, together with his great learning and

[A] As prodigious reputation] There are two things remarkable with reſpect to this admirable poem of our author's, the firſt, that it is in itſelf a moſt beautiful and elegant compoſition; the ſecond, that it was written to ſupport a moſt generous and charitable deſign. In order to make the reader perfectly maſter of the reaſons upon which that ſcheme was founded this poem was written to recommend: the judicious author in his preface, adviſes him to read a little piece, written by the directions, and publiſhed by the order, of the College of Phyſicians, then common, and in every body's hands, though now become very ſcarce and hard to be met with, which cannot therefore but be very acceptable to the reader, as without it, one of the beſt poems in our language, can be but very imperfectly underſtood. The title of this performance was,

Since it hath been the fate of many good undertakings, though in themſelves highly beneficial to the publick, to miſcarry and come to nothing, not ſo much by the open oppoſition of intereſted and deſigning perſons, as by their private inſinuations and miſ-repreſentations, whereby they prepoſſeſs the people to their own great hurt and damage; that the like misfortune may not befal the charitable deſign now ſet on foot by the College of Phyſicians, LONDON, for the relief of the poor ſick in and about this great city and ſuburbs; we have thought it neceſſary to give a ſhort hiſtorical account of the riſe and progreſs of this matter, whereby we hope it will appear, that this undertaking, as it was ſeveral years ſince begun, before there were any differences or miſunderſtandings, either amongſt ourſelves, or with the Apothecaries, upon no other ground but the commiſeration of the deplorable condition of the poor ſick, eſpecially poor houſe-keepers, not uſually taken care of by the pariſhes; ſo alſo, that the ſame hath been ever ſince carried on with the ſame honeſt intention: and we doubt not, but a work ſo advantageous to the ſick poor, and ſo honourable to this city, will in the ſame manner be ſhortly finiſhed, and brought to it's utmoſt perfection.

To omit therefore what has in former times been attempted of this nature by our predeceſſors, of whoſe early charity we have ſeveral inſtances recorded in our annals; the firſt ſtep we find tending directly to this purpoſe, is a vote of the College in their publick meeting, July the twenty-eighth, 1687, to this effect. 'It 'was this day appointed and ordained, by the unani- 'mous vote of the college, that all the members there- 'of, whether Fellows, Candidates, or Licentiates of the 'ſaid college, ſhall give their advice gratis, to all their 'ſick neighbouring poor, when deſired, within the 'city of London, or ſeven miles round.'

This order being carried by ſeveral of the Members of the College to the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen; they, Auguſt the twenty-third, 1687, did by Dr Betts, one of our Elects, return the College thanks, for this their charitable order, with this farther requeſt to the College, that they would explain themſelves, as to whom they meant by poor? which they did, by declaring, that all thoſe ſhould be eſteemed poor, that brought certificates under the hand of the Rector, Vicar, or Curate of the pariſh wherein they dwelt, of their being ſuch.

An account of this was by the reſpective Aldermen ſent to each ward. But partly by the induſtry of ſome perſons, with whoſe private gain it was not ſo conſiſtent, and eſpecially by reaſon of the high prices of medicines, above the purchaſe of poor houſe-keepers, it was for that time ſtifled. Which the College perceiving, and deſirous that ſo good an intention to ſo many poor people might not be fruſtrated, ſeveral methods for the removing this obſtruction, were propoſed at their general meetings, as the expending all the fines of the College, in providing phyſick for the poor, and the like: and at laſt they came to this reſolution, which was paſt into an order, Auguſt the thirteenth, 1688, viz.

'The College having conſidered, that the charita- 'ble vote, which formerly paſſed for preſcribing to the 'poor gratis, hath not had the effect intended, by 'reaſon of the great prices they are obliged to pay for 'their medicines, have this day unanimouſly voted, 'that the laboratory of the College be forthwith fitted 'up, for preparing medicines for the poor, and alſo 'the room adjoining for a repoſitory.' And the College further gave a power to thoſe members who would ſubſcribe to this charitable work, to chooſe a committee from among themſelves, who ſhould order what compoſitions and ſimples ſhould be kept at the College for the benefit of the poor, and manage the whole affair as they thought fit.

It was expected, that upon this order, the Apothecaries, (rather than the College, ſhould make medicines themſelves) would have ſo far concurred in this charitable work, as to have borne their part therein: and that as we had freely offered our pains to preſcribe for the poor for nothing, ſo they would have given them their pains alſo in furniſhing them with neceſſary medicines at the intrinſick value, or at leaſt, for ſome ſmall profit. But inſtead of that, ſeveral amongſt them ſet themſelves, by all the art and induſtry they were capable of, to fruſtrate the whole deſign; and finding no method ſo promiſing, as to ſtir up a party among ourſelves to oppoſe our proceedings, they fell to intriguing with ſeveral of our own members, who were too eaſily lured off to ſerve the Apothecaries intereſt, for their own private advantage. And from this cauſe, as we have too much reaſon to believe, have chiefly ſprung the unhappy differences that are ſtill fomented among us.

But notwithſtanding all the diſcouragements we met with from thoſe of our own members, who contrary to all the obligations of honour and conſcience, conſtantly diſcovered to our adverſaries, whatſoever paſſed in the College relating to this deſign, and expoſed to them, the names of ſuch as were promoters thereof, that they might be kept out, as far as in them lay, from all patients, where they ſhould be propoſed, and themſelves brought in; theſe, and ſeveral other difficulties, were, though after a conſiderable time intervening, at laſt broke through, and the College proceeded to enforce their former order, by another of the eighteenth of March, 1694, to this effect. 'Whereas in the year '1687, there was an order made, by the unanimous 'conſent of the College, obliging every member there- 'of to give his advice gratis, in their reſpective 'pariſhes in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and 'ſuburbs thereof, to all poor ſick, as ſhould be recom- 'mended to them for ſuch, by the Rector, Vicar, or 'Curate of the ſaid pariſhes, by certificate under their 'hands, which ſaid order was preſented to the city: 'now we judge it neceſſary, that the ſaid order be 'again preſented to the Lord-Mayor, Court of Alder- 'men, and Common-Council, and do hereby again, 'require ſtrict obedience from all our members, to the 'aforeſaid order.' And a committee was then choſen by the College, to take care of the managing this matter to the beſt advantage of the deſigned charity, conſiſting of the Elects, Cenſors, and eight Fellows, whereof five to be a committee.

This order was accordingly preſented to the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and Common-Council, June the eighteenth, 1695. Upon which, the Common-Council did nominate, appoint, and chooſe Sir John Moor, Sir William Hedges, and Sir Joſeph Smart, Aldermen; Mr Darvile, Mr Ballow, Mr Eggleſtone, Sir Edmund Wiſeman, Mr Richer, and Mr Palfreman, Commoners; whereof, any one of the ſaid Aldermen, and two of the ſaid Commoners to be a committee, to return the thanks of that court to the College of Phyſicians for ſuch their order, and with them, to conſult how to improve the advantage propoſed by the ſaid college, for the relief of the ſaid poor inhabitants.

July the twenty-fourth. The Committee of the city and College met, where the thanks of the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and Common-Council, were returned to the College of Phyſicians, for their charitable order.

The Committee of the College, delivered in a liſt of the names of all their members, with the places where they lived, which was deſired by the city to be printed.

Then the committee of the city made ſeveral propoſals or queries, as firſt, who ſhould be recommended as fitting objects of this charity? ſecondly, who ſhould be the perſons that ſhould make up the Phyſicians preſcriptions in the ſeveral wards and pariſhes of the city? thirdly, who ſhould prize the medicines preſcribed by the Phyſicians bills?

After which, they, with the College Committee, paſſing over the firſt propoſal, which was ſufficiently anſwered by the College's order, proceeded to debate the ſecond and third, and came to this reſolution, that ſome Apothecaries ſhould be found out, who ſhould ſupply the poor with medicines, at ſuch rates as ſhould be adjudged reaſonable by the Phyſicians in or near the ſeveral pariſhes, which the committee of the city earneſtly recommended to the Phyſicians to take care of, and promiſed that they would do the ſame on their part.

Upon

and gentry, and indeed of all ranks, of both ſexes. Within the ſame period he gave a diſtinguiſhing inſtance of his profound knowledge in his profeſſion, his perfect acquaintance with Antiquity, and correct taſte in Roman eloquence, by a moſt admirable Latin oration, pronounced before the Faculty in Warwick-Lane, September the ſeventeenth 1697 (f), to the great ſatisfaction of the audience, and his own reputation, as the College Regiſter teſtifies. Pieces of this kind are often compoſed with peculiar attention to the phraſe, the turn of the periods in the ſpeaking, and their effect upon the ear; and tho' theſe advantages were by no means neglected in Dr Garth's performance, yet the ſentiment, the ſpirit, the ſtile, manifeſted all their beauty in print, and the applauſe with which it was received by it's hearers, was echoed by thoſe who peruſed it [B]. Upon the death of the famous Dryden, (f) Oratio laudatoria, in Æde libri Collegii Regalis Med. Lond. 17° Septembris, habita à Sam. Garth, C. L. Reg. Med. Lond. Soc. Lond. 1697, 4to. p. 16.

Upon this, the Committee of the College, applied themſelves with great diligence to anſwer the ſaid deſire of the City committee; and after ſome time, found out ſeveral honeſt and charitable Apothecaries, who very chearfully and readily embraced the offer, and at the ſollicitation of the Phyſicians, entered into this following ſubſcription. We whoſe names are here under written, are willing to furniſh the poor within our reſpective pariſhes, with medicines, at ſuch rates as the Committee of Phyſicians ſhall judge reaſonable, witneſs our hands. Which ſubſcription we have now by us, but for the ſubſcribers ſakes, do not divulge their names.

When the Committee of the College had got a ſufficient number of Apothecaries to furniſh all the Wards of London, they acquainted the Committee of the City therewith, requeſting them at the ſame time, that they would, for their encouragement, endeavour to have an act paſſed in the Common-Council, to excuſe thoſe charitable Apothecaries from any troubleſome office.

Then the Committee of the City, did deſire the College Committee to get a farther addition to their former order, whereby the Churchwardens and Overſeers of the poor, or any of them, might, as well as the Miniſters, recommend, by certificate, fit objects of charity; as alſo, that all hired ſervants, and apprentices to handicraftmen, ſhould be reckoned as objects of charity, which the Committee of the College promiſed to endeavour.

Now the College thought they had ſurmounted all difficulties, and had attained their end: but the Apothecaries Company having got knowledge of our meeting with a Committee of the City, did not only draw up and preſent a paper to the Committee of the City, tending wholly to fruſtrate the charitable ends of our deſign, which was ſufficiently anſwered article by article, by the Committee of the College, (copies of both which are annexed to this piece) but alſo hearing that the Committee of Phyſicians had gotten Apothecaries enough to ſupply this charity, they were extreamly alarmed, and preſently called a Hall, wherein, partly by threatening to impoſe upon them the moſt troubleſome and expenſive offices of their company, and partly by charging them upon this compliance with the Phyſicians, with breach of their oaths to their company, they affrighted moſt of theſe Apothecaries from this undertaking, as if their oath obliged them not to do any thing charitably.

September the fourth, 1695. The College made ſuch addition to their order, as the City Committee had deſired. At which meeting, the College did likewiſe approve and confirm all that had been done by their Committee, giving them thanks for the care and trouble they had already taken, and deſiring them to proceed and perfect this charitable work, owning and declaring all that the Committee had done, to be the act of the College, and not the act of ſix or ſeven men, as ſome had induſtriouſly, though falſely, given out; and that the College would accordingly ſtand by their Committee in what they had done.

At the next meeting of the Committees, the addition by the College to their former order, deſired by the City Committee, was delivered to them, who were much pleaſed therewith. Then they proceeded to conſider who ſhould prize the medicines. And the College Committee was content, becauſe they would avoid every thing that might obſtruct this deſigned charity, that the Maſter and Wardens of the Apothecaries Company ſhould do it every year, and afterwards bring it to the Preſident and Cenſors of the College for their approbation, but even this was alſo oppoſed by the Apothecaries Company.

Thus it appearing, that the Apothecaries were reſolved to obſtruct this charity in every particular, the City Committee aſked the Phyſicians then preſent, whether their College would provide medicines for the poor at reaſonable rates, if the Apothecaries ſhould refuſe ſo to do? to which they anſwered, that they believed, rather than ſo charitable a deſign ſhould fail, the College would undertake it, and promiſed that they would propoſe it at their next publick College meeting.

Hereupon, the City Committee being fully ſatisfied with the Phyſicians anſwers to their propoſals, and with their ſincerity in tranſacting this whole affair with them, as alſo, that the methods offered by them, were the moſt proper for obtaining the end propoſed, drew up a report accordingly of the whole matter, which the Chairman, Sir William Hedges, offered to read at the next Common-Council; but ſome affair that required a quicker diſpatch intervening, it was put off for that time, and this happening at the latter end of the year, the Common-Council was not long after of courſe diſſolved, and another choſen, in which, ſeveral of the then Committee were left out, which probably was the cauſe that this report was never after called for.

The matter reſting thus, and the College being in expectation to hear from the City, they did nothing farther in it till December the twenty-ſecond, 1696, when a propoſition was made in the publick College, for a ſubſcription by the Fellows, Candidates, and Licentiates, for carrying on this charity; which being therein approved, about nine or ten only diſſenting, a ſubſcription to the effect following, was immediately made.

Whereas the ſeveral Orders of the College of Phyſicians, London, &c.

But this order being annexed to the preface to the Diſpenſary, it is unneceſſary to tranſcribe it here.

[B] By thoſe who peruſed it.] There is ſo great a difference between the harmony of Proſe and Verſe, and that turn of thought which makes a great Poet or an accompliſhed Orator, that it rarely happens the ſame genius inſpires both, at leaſt in an equal degree. Cicero, who was not heard by his contemporaries with greater applauſe than his works are now read with admiration, attempted Poetry without ſucceſs; and the ſame thing might be ſaid of others, if it were decent to name them after Tully. Yet it muſt be confeſſed, that ſome of our own Poets have written Proſe with equal ſkill and delicacy; as for inſtance, Dryden, Pope, and Garth. But it was the peculiar excellence of the latter, that not in his own language only, but in that of antient Rome, he delivered himſelf with equal eloquence and ſpirit. A ſhort inſtance of this, from the oration of which we are ſpeaking, ſhall ſuffice (1).

Dryden, in May 1701, by a very ſtrange accident his burial came to depend on the piety of Dr Garth, who cauſed the body to be brought to the College of Phyſicians, propoſed and encouraged, by his generous example, a ſubſcription for defraying the expence of the funeral (g); and, after pronouncing over the corps, before it ſet out from Warwick-Lane, a ſuitable oration, attended the ſolemnity to Weſtminſter-Abbey, where at laſt the remains of that great Man were decently interred. For this moſt memorable act of tenderneſs and reſpect, thoſe who loved the perſon, or who honoured the parts of that excellent Poet, expreſſed much gratitude to Dr Garth. He was one of the moſt eminent members of a famous ſociety called the Kit Kat Club, which conſiſted of above thirty noblemen and gentlemen, diſtinguiſhed by their excellent parts, and their very zealous affection to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the Houſe of Hanover (h). October the third 1702, he was elected one of the Cenſors of the College of Phyſicians. In reſpect to his political principles, he was open and warm; and, which was ſtill more to be valued, he was ſteady and ſincere. In the time of Lord Godolphin's adminiſtration, no body was better received of his rank than Dr Garth, and no body ſeemed to have a higher opinion of the Miniſter's integrity and abilities, in which he had however the ſatisfaction of ſpeaking with the publick. But in 1710, when things began to wear another aſpect, and that noble perſon had an opportunity of diſtinguiſhing his own friends from thoſe of his power, it could not fail of giving him ſenſible pleaſure to find Dr Garth amongſt the firſt, and to receive the tribute of his MUSE on that ſituation of his affairs, which would have ſtruck a flatterer dumb (i). But there wanted not ſome to whom this remarkable teſtimony of gratitude was by no means pleaſing, and therefore the Doctor's lines were ſeverely criticized (k), in a certain paper engaged in the ſervice of the new Miniſtry; but inſtead of ſinking the credit either of the verſes or the Poet, they added to the reputation of both, by exciting the judicious Joſeph Addiſon, Eſq; to write in their defence (l) [C]. He was alſo in particular favour and eſteem with the Duke of Marlborough, whoſe diſgrace, and voluntary exile abroad, he lamented in a fine copy of verſes (m). In 1711, he wrote a dedication for an intended edition of Lucretius, addreſſed to his late Majeſty, then Elector of Brunſwick, which has been juſtly cioſâ, non pyrio, ſed pulvere neſcio quo exotico certat, non globulis plumbeis, ſed pilulis æque lethalibus interficit. O genus hominum, ſi quod aliud ſceleratiſſimum! totam urbem invadunt iſti homicidæ, ſed an imperitiâ an impunitate majori incertum; pro pudore, audacia, pro ſagacitate inſcitia, pro integritate improbitas hodie, ut olim viget. Huic peſti ut occurreret Henricus octavus regum auguſtiſſimus, & ſanitati ſubditorum religioſè conſulens, collegium hoc quamplurimis immunitatibus ad rem medicam moderandum ſtabiliendamque donavit. Henrici ad exemplum Edvardus ſextus, Maria & Eliſabetha reginæ, Jacobi, Caroliqui duo, nullum officii genus ad emolumentum noſtrum ſpectans, omiſere: multa inſuper Mariæ & Arabellæ Stuartæ ex regio ſanguine oriundis debemus; Lumleio Baroni, ſummæ, eo tempore, authoritatis etiam multa; nec minora marchioni Dorceſtriæ, Collegii hujuſce regalis ſocio, viro etiam animi dotibus quam natalium ſplendore clariori. Neque nos fugiant ſocietatis noſtræ & alia ornamenta, Linacrus nemque Atkinſius, Readus, Meverellus, Foxus, Gulſtonus, Pagettus, Bidgodſius, Pamannus, precipuè vero Harvæus & Hamæus: ingenti virtute & doctrinâ fuere ambo, ſed indole paulum diverſâ: Harvæus benignitate clarus habebatur, morum ſimplicitate Hamæus: ille humanitate feſtivâ probatus fuit, huic auguſta gravitas dignitatem dedit; Alterius lenitas, alterius ſtabilitas celebratur.

Which has been tranſlated thus,

'More I might ſay, as there is no want of materials, 'in commending Apollo's art; but I omit them, that 'I might not ſeem on this occaſion to affect delivering 'ſuch things as were not ſufficiently known before. Of 'the dignity and titles of Phyſicians, let thoſe who 'would know more conſult Foeſius and others. But 'at preſent, let us ſpeak of places and times in which 'medicine itſelf is ſick. This art, of all others the 'moſt uſeful, knows not how to help itſelf; while rather from mock Phyſicians, than diſeaſes, this country ſuffers. What, and what ſort of people they are, 'the rubrick'd walls at the corner of every ſtreet will 'inform you. Here an Operator, mounted on his 'pyed horſe, draws teeth in the ſtreets; another is ſo 'obliging, as to be at home at certain hours to receive 'fools; another pores in urinals, and if he finds no 'diſeaſe there, he makes it; another ſtill, draws together a crowd by the help of rope-dancing; he 'comes, he ſees, then ruſhes forth upon the multitude, 'and murders without mercy. Yet not with weapons 'do theſe ſwarms of mountebanks inflict wounds, but 'with ſome noſtrum more dangerous than any weapon; not with plain gun-powder, but with ſome 'ſtrange foreign duſt they charge their packets; not 'with leaden bullets, but with pills as mortal, they do 'their buſineſs. O race of men, of all others the moſt 'wicked! thro' the whole city theſe homicides ſpread 'their terror, whether with more ignorance or impunity it is hard to determine; inſtead of modeſty, impudence; inſtead of ſagacity, ſtupidity; inſtead of integrity, wickedneſs; now, as of old, flouriſhes. To check this plague, Henry VIII, a moſt auguſt Prince, and religiouſly tender of the health of his ſubjects, eſtabliſhed this College, and fortified it with many privileges, that it might regulate and preſerve the art of Phyſick. Moved by the example of Henry, Edward VI, the Queens Mary and Elizabeth, James, and both the Charles's, omitted nothing that might prove beneficial to the Faculty; much alſo we owe to Mary and Arabella Stuart, whoſe veins were enriched with royal blood; much to the Lord Lumley, in his time a perſon of great authority; nor leſs to the Marquis of Dorcheſter, himſelf a Fellow of this Royal College, and a man ſtill more diſtinguiſhed by the virtues of his mind than by the ſplendour of his birth. Neither are we to ſeek for many other ornaments in this our Society, ſuch as Linacre, Atkins, Read, Meverel, Fox, Gulſton, Pagett, Bidgod, Paman; but above all, Harvey and Hames, both of great virtue and learning, but of different diſpoſitions, Harvey diſtinguiſhed by benignity of mind, Hames by ſimplicity of manners; the former was endeared to all by his chearful humanity, the latter attracted reſpect by a becoming gravity; the one juſtly celebrated for his lenity, as the other for his firmneſs.'

The whole of the oration is equally beautiful, but more eſpecially the warm, pathetick, and ſublime panegyrick on King William, too copious to be tranſcribed, and too fine to be curtailed in an abſtract; in a word, tho' all the orations ſpoken before this learned body do honour to the learning of this nation, yet none, in point of ſentiment or of eloquence, ever exceeded this of which we are ſpeaking.

[C] To write in their defence.] In order to judge both of the Criticiſm and of the Defence, it will be requiſite firſt of all to read the Poem to which they refer, juſtly admired as one of the fineſt pieces of Latin written in our times. On the acceſſion of that Prince to the throne, he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by his Majeſty, with the Duke of Marlborough's ſword (n). He was likewiſe made Phyſician in Ordinary to the King, and Phyſician-General to the army. As his known ſervices procured him a great intereſt with thoſe in power, ſo his humanity and good nature inclined him to make uſe of that intereſt rather for the ſupport and encouragement of men of letters who had merit, than for the advancement of his own fortune, his views in that reſpect having been always very moderate. He lived with the Great in that degree of eſteem and independency, and with all that freedom which became a man poſſeſſed of ſuperior genius, and the reſer, more eſpecially as it is very ſhort, and as it may be very well ſuppoſed written ſuddenly, and at leaſt as much from the author's propenſity to Patriotiſm as Poetry.

To the Earl of Godolphin.

While weeping Europe bends beneath her Ills,
And where the ſword deſtroys not famine kills.
Our iſle enjoys by your ſucceſsful care,
The pomp of peace amidſt the woes of war.
So much the publick to your prudence owes,
You think no labours long for our repoſe.
Such conduct, ſuch integrity are ſhown,
There are no coffers empty but your own.
From mean dependence, merit you retrieve;
Unaſk'd you offer, and unſeen you give.
Your favour, like the Nile, increaſe beſtows;
And yet conceals the ſource from whence it flows.
So poiz'd your paſſions are, we find no frown
If funds oppreſt not, and if commerce run, Taxes diminiſh'd, liberty entire,
Theſe are the grants your ſervices require.
Thus far the ſtate-machine wants no repair,
But moves in matchleſs order by your care.
Free from confuſion, ſettled and ſerene;
And, like the univerſe, by ſprings unſeen.
But now ſome ſtar, ſiniſter to our prayers;
Contrives new ſchemes, and calls you from affairs.
No anguiſh in your looks, nor cares appear,
But how to teach th' unpractis'd crew to ſteer.
Thus like ſome victim no conſtraint you need,
To expiate their offence by whom you bleed.
Ingratitude's a weed in ev'ry clime;
It thrives too faſt at firſt, but fades in time.
The God of day, and your own lot's the ſame;
The vapours you have rais'd, obſcure your flame.
But tho' you ſuffer, and a while retreat;
Your globe of light looks larger as you ſet.

The criticiſm upon theſe verſes was publiſhed in a letter to the Examiner, for Thurſday September the ſeventh 1710; and the author of it obſerves (z), that there does not appear either Poetry, Grammar, or deſign, in the compoſition of this poem. 'The whole, 'ſays he, ſeems to be, as the ſixth edition of the Diſ- 'penſary happily expreſſes it, a ſtrong unlabour'd impo- 'tence of thought. If we examine it by the new teſt of 'good Poetry, which the Doctor himſelf has eſtabliſh- 'ed pleaſing at firſt bluſh, has this piece the leaſt 'title even to that? Or if we compare it with the only 'pattern, as he thinks, of juſt writing in this kind, 'Ovid, is there any thing in De Triſtibus ſo wild, ſo 'childiſh, ſo flat? What can the ingenious Doctor 'mean? Or at what time could he write theſe verſes? 'Half of the poem is a panegyric on a Lord Treaſurer 'in being, and the reſt a compliment of condolance to 'an Earl that has loſt the ſtaff. In thirty lines his pa- 'tron is a river, the primum mobile, a pilot, a victim, 'the ſun, any thing, and nothing. He beſtows in- 'creaſe, conceals his ſource, makes the machine move; 'teaches to ſteer, expiates our offences, raiſes vapours, 'and looks larger as he ſets. Nor is the choice of his 'expreſſions leſs exquiſite than that of his ſimilies. For 'commerce to run, paſſions to be poiz'd, merit to be 'retrieved from dependance, and a machine to be ſe- 'rene, is perfectly new. The Doctor has a happy ta- 'lent at invention, and has had the glory of enriching 'our language by his phraſes, as much as he has im- 'proved medicine by his bills.

(z) Examiner, No. VI.

And where th' ſword deſtroys not (ſays our Panegyriſt) famine kills.

'I could wiſh the verſe would have allowed of the 'word plague or peſtilence, for I ſuppoſe that is what 'the author means. I have heard of the plague at 'Dantzick, but what part of Europe famine rages in I 'know not. Why won't phyſick ſtand here? It is bet- 'ter ſenſe, runs as well. What the pomp of peace is, 'I as little comprehend as how it can be enjoyed a- 'midſt the woes of war.

Such conduct, ſuch integrity are ſhown;
There are no coffers empty but your own.

'Since there is little poetry in this couplet, I wiſh 'there were more truth in it. Some coffers I have 'heard were empty three weeks ago, and if they are 'not ſo ſtill, the nation is more obliged to the 'Doctor's unpractiſed crew than to the experienced 'pilot.

Unaſk'd you offer.

'A great diſcovery! I always thought, till now, he 'that was aſked might be ſaid to give, but not proper- 'ly to offer. The malicious part of the world, will, 'I doubt, be apt to obſerve, that this ſentence, as it 'ſtands here, is as true in fact as it is exact in lan- 'guage.

Your favour, like the Nile, increaſe beſtows.

'If the beauty of the ſimile is to be judged of by the 'frequent uſe which the Poets of all ages have made of 'it, ſcarce any can come in competition with the Doc- 'tor's river. The Nile on theſe occaſions, is as trite 'as the ſtories of Icarus and Phaeton. I remember I 'uſed it when I was about twelve in a new-year's-gift 'to my uncle, and was heartily aſhamed of it a year 'after. A ſchool-boy can no more miſs the Nile, than 'a French author when he dedicates to the Grand 'Monarch can live without the ſun, that other ſimile 'in which the Doctor rejoices.

——— ſome ſtar, ſiniſter to our prayers,
Contrives new ſchemes.

'Alii legunt, five ſtars which makes this paſſage in- 'telligible. I have often heard Aſtrologers talk of a 'ſort of influence that ſtars have upon human affairs, 'but I know of no ſtars but thoſe in Mr Bickerſtaff's 'conſtellation that ever contrived ſchemes, and thoſe 'too were erected under no very benign aſpect.

'My Lord's care, he tells us, is to teach the un- 'practiſed crew to ſteer. By crew we are to under- 'ſtand the Lords of the Treaſury. A very civil ex- 'preſſion! But as to the ſenſe of it, what affinity is 'there between crew and ſteering. Is ſteering the bu- 'ſineſs of the whole ſhip's crew? This is a true image 'of the whig ſcheme, where every man is his own 'pilot.

'If we read the next two lines, we ſhall find theſe 'people have wounded him; and yet, like the beſt 'natured victim imaginable, he needs no conſtraint to 'expiate the moſt valuable talents. He was not ſo haughty as to be above being obliged, and he had a fund of gratitude and good ſenſe, which induced as well as enabled him to oblige them in return.

' expiate their offences. All this is what the French ' call gallimatias, and what the Engliſh critics term ' nonſenſe. But what follows? For whom you bleed. ' Bleed? What is the Devil in the Doctor, to mention ' ſuch a word, and give ſo unlucky a hint? I hoped ' that this point had been ſo well guarded, that here ' could be no farther need of an act of ſecurity.

The God of day, and your own lot's the ſame.

' A hundred pound for a genitive caſe, as old Buſby ' uſed to cry out upon ſuch an occaſion.

' But to go on from Grammar to decency. Of this ' happineſs of Great Britain, is any part aſcribed to ' the Queen? To this machine, which moves ſo like ' the univerſe, does the royal hand give any turn? ' Methinks he might at leaſt allow her Majeſty as much ' as his friends did in the coronation medal, Vicem ge- ' rit illa. But, as the Poet obſerves, Ingratitude's a weed of ev'ry clime.

' He will give me leave, in my own turn, to ob- ' ſerve, that in Don Sebaſtian it is Ingratitude's the growth of ev'ry clime.

' What occaſion was there of altering a verſe he ' thought fit to ſteal? This is being a mere Banditti ' in Poetry, to rob and murder too. But who is to be ' charged with this ingratitude? The whole body of ' the nation did indeed wiſh the Treaſurer out, but it ' was her Majeſty only that could diſplace him. Such ' are the compliments which the Crown receives from ' this anti-monarchical academy. Excellent Poets! duti- ' ful Subjects!

' I could give you many more obſervations upon the ' beauties of this ſublime panegyric, if I had my Lon- ' ginus by me. It has been corrected, I find, twice ' or thrice already; and if the author corrects it once ' more, I am ſo well acquainted with his lucky per- ' formances that way, that I do not doubt but I ſhall ' be tempted to write to you again upon the ſame ſub- ' ject. He will not be like himſelf, if he does not ' ſhift his patron as well as his phraſes; and it will ' not ſurprize me at all, if the next edition the ' poem ſhould come out inſcribed to the late Treaſurer ' of Ireland.'

In the Medley, or Whig Examiner, publiſhed September 14, 1710 (3), this criticiſm was roundly replied to, with all the wit and ſpirit, and with all the critical ſkill and judgment, for which it's excellent author was ſo famous. ' The deſign, ſays he, of this ' work, is to cenſure the writings of others, and to give ' all perſons a re-hearing, who have ſuffered under any ' unjuſt ſentence of the Examiner. As that author has ' hitherto proceeded, his paper would have been more ' properly intituled the Executioner, at leaſt his exami- ' nation is like that which is made by the rack and ' wheel. I have always admired a critic that has diſ- ' covered the beauties of an author, and never knew ' one who made it his buſineſs to laſh the faults of other ' writers, that was not guilty of greater himſelf; as the ' hangman is generally a worſe malefactor, than the ' criminal that ſuffers by his hand. To prove what I ' ſay, there needs no more than to read the annota- ' tions which this author has made upon Dr Garth's ' poem, with the preface in the front, and a riddle at ' the end of them.'

(3) No. I. Or ſee Addiſon's Works, Vol. IV. P. 331.

Mr Addiſon concludes that paper with theſe words. ' Before I take my farewel of this ſubject, I ſhall ad- ' viſe the author for the future to ſpeak his meaning ' more plainly. I allow he has a happy talent at dog- ' grel, when he writes upon a known ſubject; where ' he tells us in plain intelligible language, how Syriſca's ' ladle was loſt in one hole, and Han's Carvel's finger ' in another; he is very jocular and diverting; but ' when he wraps a lampoon in a riddle, he muſt conſi- ' der that his jeſt is loſt to every one but the few merry ' wags that are in the ſecret. This is making darker ' ſatires than ever Perſius did. After this curſory view ' of the Examiner's performance, let us conſider his ' remarks upon the Doctor's. This general piece of ' raillery, which he paſſes upon the Doctor's conſider- ' ing the Treaſurer in ſeveral different views, is, that ' which might fall upon any poem in Waller, or any ' other writer who has diverſity of thoughts and allu- ' ſions; and, tho' it may appear a pleaſant ridicule to ' an ignorant reader, is wholly groundleſs and unjuſt. ' I do likewiſe differ from the Examiner upon the ' phraſes of paſſions being poiſed, and of the retrieving ' merit from dependence, which are beautiful and po- ' etical.

' It is the ſame cavilling ſpirit that finds fault with ' that expreſſion of the pomp of peace, among woes of ' war, as well as of offering unaſk'd. As for the Nile, ' how Icarus and Phaeton came to be joined with it, ' I cannot conceive! I muſt confeſs they have been ' formerly uſed to repreſent the fate of raſh ambitious ' men, and I cannot imagine why the author ſhould ' deprive us of thoſe particular ſimilies for the future. ' The next criticiſm upon the ſtars, ſeems introduced ' for no other reaſon but to mention Mr Bickerſtaff, ' whom the author every where endeavours to imitate ' and abuſe. But I ſhall refer the Examiner, to the ' Frog's advice to her little one that was blowing it- ' ſelf up to the ſize of an ox.

Par eris ———

' The alluſion to a victim may be a gallimatia in ' French politics, but is an apt and noble alluſion to a ' true Engliſh ſpirit. And as for the Examiner's re- ' marks on the word bleed, tho' a man would laugh to ' ſee impotent malice ſo little able to contain itſelf, ' one cannot but obſerve in them the temper of the ' Banditti whom he mentions in the ſame paper, who ' always murder where they rob. The laſt obſervation, ' is upon the line ingratitude's a weed of ev'ry clime. ' Here he is very much out of humour with the Doc- ' tor, for having called that the weed which Dryden ' only terms the growth of ev'ry clime. But, for God's ' ſake, why ſo much tenderneſs for ingratitude? But I ' ſhall ſay no more. We are now in an age wherein ' impudent aſſertions muſt paſs for arguments, and I ' do not queſtion but the ſame who has endeavoured ' here to prove that he who wrote the Diſpenſary was ' no Poet, will very ſuddenly undertake to ſhew that ' he who gained the battle of Blenheim was no Gene- ' ral.'

It is not impoſſible that our author himſelf might have in view this criticiſm, and ſome other compliments of the like nature, when, at the cloſe of his preface to the tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, he takes occaſion to deliver himſelf in a manner equally ſuitable to the caſe of that Roman Poet, and of his own. His words will bear reading, even after thoſe of Mr Addiſon's.

With all thoſe wond'rous talents, he (Ovid) was libell'd in his life-time, by the very men who had no other excellencies but as they were his imitators. Where he was allowed to have ſentiments ſuperior to all others, they charged him with theft; but how did he ſteal, no otherwiſe than like thoſe that ſteal beggars children, only to cloath them the better.

'Tis to be lamented that gentlemen ſtill continue this unfair behaviour, and treat one another every day with moſt injurious libels. The Muſes ſhould be ladies of a chaſte and fair behaviour; when they are otherwiſe they are Furies. 'Tis certain that Parnaſſus is at beſt but a barren mountain, and it's inhabitants contrive to make it more ſo, by their unneighbourly deportment; the authors are the only corporation that endeavour at the ruin of their own ſociety. Every day may convince them, how much a rich fool is reſpected above a poor wit. The only talents in eſteem at preſent, are thoſe of Exchange-Alley; one tally is worth a grove of Bays; and 'tis of much more conſequence to be well read in the tables of intereſt, and the riſe and fall of ſtocks, than in the revolutions of empires.

return. His poem intituled CLAREMONT (o), addreſſed to the preſent Duke of Newcaſtle, will ſurvive the noble ſtructure it celebrates, and remain a perpetual monument of it's author's learning, taſte, and great capacity as a Poet, ſince in that ſhort work there are innumerable beauties, and a vaſt variety of ſentiments eaſily and happily interwoven, the moſt lively ſtrokes of ſatire being intermixed with the moſt courtly panegyric, at the ſame time that there appears the true ſpirit of enthuſiaſm, which diſtinguiſhes the works of one born a Poet, from thoſe of a witty or learned man, that has arrived at no higher art than that of making verſes. His knowledge in Philoſophy, his correct taſte in Criticiſm, and his thorough acquaintance with Claſſical Literature, appear with all the advantages that can be derived from an exact but concealed method, an accurate tho' flowing ſtile, and a language pure, natural, and full of vivacity, in the preface that he prefixed to a tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, which would have been ſufficient to have raiſed him an immortal reputation, if it had been the only product of his pen [D]. It has been attributed by ſome

(o) Printed in the fifth Vol. of Dryden's Miſcellanies.

[D] The only product of his pen.] It is generally allowed by the critics, that Ovid is the moſt learned of the Latin Poets, perhaps we might be juſtified in ſaying, that he is not exceeded in this by any of the authors in his own language, either in verſe or proſe; but with all this learning, he has a moſt lively imagination, and writes with wonderful harmony and perſpicuity. Theſe ſingular and ſurpriſing excellencies joined perhaps to his tender inclinations, and that inimitable manner, in which he has deſcribed the ſofteſt paſſions, recommended him peculiarly to our author's ſtudy and regard. There was a great reſemblance in their humours, their manners, and their poetry, and perhaps, it was from a conſciouſneſs of this, that Sir Samuel intereſted himſelf ſo much on behalf of this Roman bard. He dedicated to the Lady Louiſa Lenos, afterwards Counteſs of Berkeley, an Engliſh tranſlation of his epiſtles; he addreſſed likewiſe, his Art of Love, to the Earl of Burlington; and now, after tranſlating a part, he prefixed a preface to the whole of his Metamorphoſes.

A preface, which may be conſidered as a model in it's kind, ſince it ſerves not only to give an idea of the work which follows it, and points out it's principal beauties; but ſhews farther, the uſes of his poem, and how it may be read to moſt profit. If we regard it in this light, his preface is in reality, a ſhort but excellent commentary, which enables the reader to enter into the ſpirit and genius of his author, to underſtand his meaning, to apprehend the moral of his fables, and to feel the force of thoſe fine reflections which are every where ſcattered through his writings. In the very opening of that ſhort piece, he vindicates his author and himſelf, from an imputation that has fallen but too commonly upon Phyſicians and Poets. He obſerves, that Ovid had a diſcerning notion of the gravitation of bodies, and that there can be no arbitrary principle in mere matter; it's parts cannot move, unleſs they be moved, and cannot do otherwiſe when preſt on by other parts in motion; and therefore, ſays he, it is evident from the following lines, that Ovid ſtrictly adhered to the opinion of the moſt diſcerning Philoſophers, who taught, that all things were formed by a wiſe and intelligent mind:

> Juſſit, & extendi campos ſubſidere valles,
> Fronde tegi ſylvas,

It may be, he carries it a little too far, in ſaying, that the Fiat of the Hebrew law-giver, is not more ſublime than the Juſſit of the Latin Poet. After explaining his philoſophy with much learning and judgment, he comes next to conſider him in his poetical capacity; and to ſhew how far he has been juſtly cenſured by the critics, and how much he has been frequently injured for want of being underſtood. He ſuggeſts, and he brings the author's own authority from another of his works to prove it, that this great performance never received his laſt hand, but went into the world, even in his own opinion, in ſome meaſure unfiniſhed; but as he very juſtly remarks, the variety with which he feaſts his reader, ought certainly to compenſate for ſome trivial inaccuracies. 'Here, ſays he, are the hurries of 'battles for the heroe; tender emotions of ſoul for the 'lover; a ſearch and penetration into nature, for the 'Philoſopher; fluency of numbers, and moſt expreſ-'ſive figures for the Poet; morals for the ſerious, and 'pleaſantries for admirers of points of wit.' Where an author labours to pleaſe all, all ought in juſtice, to come with an inclination to be pleaſed. He compares this writer with Virgil, and though he confeſſes the compariſon very unequal, yet he ſhews, that tho' Ovid be moſtly, he is not always inferior. In reference to many ſubjects, his education and breeding enabled him to enter deeply into them, and with theſe advantages, his genius gave him a power of treating them with ſuch ſtrength, and yet with ſuch facility, as perhaps leave him without any rival.

Ovid deſerves as much praiſe for ſaying a great deal in a little, as cenſure for ſaying a little in a great deal. None of the claſſic Poets had the talent of expreſſing himſelf with more force and perſpicuity. Sir Samuel gives ſome inſtances of this, and goes on. Ovid never excels himſelf ſo much, as when he takes occaſion to touch upon the paſſion of love, all hearts are in a manner ſenſible of the ſame emotions, and like inſtruments tuned uniſons, if a ſtring of any of them be ſtruck, the reſt by conſent vibrate. The fable of Byblis, ſhews how touchingly the Poet argues in love affairs, as well as thoſe of Medea and Scylla.

The two laſt are left by their heroes, and their reflections are very natural and affecting. Ovid ſeemed here to have had Virgil's paſſion of Dido in his eye, but with this difference, the one had converſed much with ladies, and knew they loved to talk a great deal; the other conſidered no leſs, what was natural for them to ſay, than what became them to ſay. Virgil has through the whole management of this rencounter, diſcovered a moſt finiſhed judgment. Æneas, like other men, likes for convenience, and leaves for greater. Dido, like other ladies, reſents the neglect, enumerates the obligations the lover is under; upbraids him with ingratitude; threatens him with revenge; then by and by ſubmits, begs for compaſſion, and has recourſe to tears. Nor does the genius of Ovid more exert on the ſubject of love, than on all others.

In the contention of Ajax, Ulyſſes's elocution is moſt nervous and perſuading. Where he endeavours to diſſuade mankind (Book xv. of his Metamorphoſes) from indulging carnivorous appetites in his Pythagorean Philoſophy, how emphatical is his reaſoning. Through the whole texture of this work, Ovid diſcovers the higheſt humanity, and a moſt exceeding good nature. The virtuous in diſtreſs are always his concern, and his wit contrives to give them an immortality with himſelf. He ſeems to have taken the moſt pains in the firſt and ſecond book of the Metamorphoſes, though the thirteenth abounds with ſentiments moſt moving, and with calamitous ſentiments introduced with great art. The animated thoughts, and lively images of this poem are numerous. None ever painted more to the life than our author, though ſeveral groteſque figures are now and then ſeen in the ſame group. The moſt plentiful ſeaſon that gives birth to the fineſt flowers, produces alſo the rankeſt weeds. Ovid has ſhewn in one line the brighteſt fancy, ſometimes in the next, the pooreſt affectation.

Ovid was much too fond of trivial witticiſms, which are more to be wondred at, becauſe they were not the faſhion of that age, as puns and quibbles are of this. Virgil, as I remember, is not found trifling in this manner above once or twice. With regard to Ovid's diction, he obſerves, that a great many of his lines end with monaſyllables, and more indeed than ſeems conſiſtent ſome to a certain indolence of temper, but with more juſtice certainly may be referred to his prudent and ſound judgment, that he did not write more, but choſe rather to reſt his reputation upon a ſmall number of fine things, than to riſque it by undertaking many. Yet tho' all his works would ſcarce make a moderate volume, it may be truly affirmed that we find in them a greater variety of ſentiments than in almoſt any writer of his time (p). His epigrams for the glaſſes of the Kit Kat Club, are bold, lively, and free, abounding with that vivacity which conſtitutes extempore wit; whereas the DISPENSARY and CLAREMONT, ſhe whim to have poſſeſſed a cool and regular judgment, which enabled him to make a proper uſe of his warm imagination. His poems to the Earl of Godolphin, and the Duke of Marlborough, are ſerious and ſententious; and yet his epilogue to Cato, and many other lighter pieces, ſhew that he was a great maſter of humour. One circumſtance might very probably contribute to the real value of his works, as well as to his univerſal reputation; and that circumſtance was this, that his hand and his heart went always together. He became very early acquainted with ſome of the wiſeſt and wittieſt, as well as ſome of the ableſt and greateſt, men in the kingdom, to whom he ſteadily adhered in all their fortunes; which, as it did him deſervedly great honour, ſo it turned, in the end, as it uſually does, not a little to his advantage. But in juſtice to his memory it muſt be obſerved, that tho' he was zealous for and conſtant to his party, yet he was very far from having that narrow and malignant ſpirit which induces men to hate thoſe who differ from them in ſentiments. He was indeed, and his writings ſpeak it, as free from this pernicious quality as any man that ever lived; and he felt the juſt conſequences of it, ſince he was beloved, eſteemed, and admired, by the beſt men of all parties [E]. The truth is, that he had as many amiable ſiſtent with the majeſty of heroic verſe. When lines, (continues he) are deſigned to be ſermoni propriores, this liberty may be allowable, but not ſo, when the the ſubject requires more ſonorous numbers. Virgil ſeems to endeavour to keep up his verſification to an harmonious dignity; and therefore, when fit words do not offer, with ſome eaſe he'll rather break off in an hemiſtich, than that the line ſhould be lazy and languid. He well knew how eſſential it was in poetry to flatter the ear, and at the ſame time was ſenſible, that this organ grows tired by a conſtant attention to the ſame harmony, and therefore he endeavoured now and then to relieve it by a cadence of pauſes, and a variation of meaſures.

Thoſe that are moſt converſant in claſſic poetry, muſt be ſenſible that Virgil has been much more ſollicitous than Ovid, to keep up his lines to an eaſy and muſical flow; but though the criticks charge the latter with breaking through proſody and grammar, and allowing himſelf too often the licence of græciſms. I take this cenſure to be only an arrogant pedantry in the grammarians, and groundleſs in itſelf; but though it were true, I dare be confident, it is full as juſt upon Virgil. Certainly no-body can imagine, but that theſe two celebrated authors underſtood their own tongue better than the ſcrupulous grammarians of after-ages, who are too dogmatical and ſelf-ſufficient, when they preſume to cenſure either of them for not attending ſtrictly enough to Syntax and the meaſure of verſe. The Latin tongue is a dead language, and none can decide with confidence on the harmony or diſſonance or the numbers of theſe lines, unleſs they were thoroughly acquainted with their pauſes and cadence. They may indeed pronounce with much more aſſurance on their diction, and diſtinguiſh where they have been negligent, and where not finiſhed. There are certainly many lines in Ovid, where he has been downright lazy, and where he might have avoided the appearance of being obviouſly ſo, by a very little application.

Ovid's allegories are either phyſical or natural, moral or hiſtorical. Of the firſt kind, is the fable of Apollo and Python: in the explanation of this, all the Mythologiſts agree, exhalations and miſts, being the conſtant effects of inundations are here diſſipated by the rays of the Sun. Of the ſecond kind, are Acteon torn to peices by his own pack of dogs; and Eriſichton ſtarved by the diſeaſe of hunger. Theſe two allegories ſeem to ſignify, that extravagance and luxury end in want. Of the third, is the ſtory of the rape of Europa. Hiſtory ſays, ſhe was daughter to Agenor, and carried by the Candians in a gally, bearing a bull in the ſtern, in order to be married to one of their Kings, named Jupiter. As to Ovid's being cenſured for being too free with the characters of his Gods, it muſt be conſidered, that what appeared an abſurdity in our Poet, is not ſo much his own fault, as that of the times before him.

The character of the Gods in the old heroick age, repreſented them unjuſt in their actions, mutable in their deſigns, partial in their favours, ignorant of events, ſcurrillous in their language; ſome of the ſuperior hierarchy, treating one another with injurious brutalities, and are often guilty of ſuch indecencies and miſbehaviour, as the loweſt of mortals would bluſh to own. The commentators may endeavour to hide ſome abſurdities in the Iliad, under the veil of allegories; but the reader, that conſiders the whole texture of that poem, will find that the author's meaning, and their interpretations, are often as unlike, as the imaginary heroes of his time are to the real ones of ours. Ovid was ſo far from paying a blind difference to the venerable name of his Greecian predeceſſor, in the character of his Gods; that when Jupiter puniſhes Andromeda for the crimes of her mother, he calls him injuſtus Ammon (Metamorph. Book iv.) and takes commonly an honourable care of the decorum of the Godhead, when their actions are conſiſtent with the divinity of their character. His allegories include ſome religious or inſtructive moral, wrapt up in a familiar perſpicuity, and the reader cannot fail of obſerving how many leſſons of morality Ovid has given us in the courſe of his fables. To conclude, the poem of the Metamorpoſes has been the ample magazine which has furniſhed the greateſt Poets of the following ages with fancy and allufions; and the moſt celebrated Painters with ſubjects and deſigns.

[E] By the beſt men of all parties.] We find in the Diſpenſary, and indeed in all the writings of Sir Samuel Garth, a ſtrict regard paid to merit, and due praiſes given to men of very different parties; the following lines, to avoid numerous quotations, will ſufficiently prove the truth of what is here advanced.

amiable qualities to recommend him, as could be well found in one perſon. He was a general ſcholar, without the leaſt tincture of affectation or taint of pedantry. Humane in his profeſſion, and not more ready to viſit than to relieve the neceſſitous. His converſation was free and ſprightly, his wit flowing and agreeable, and always tempered by affability and good nature. He was cenſured for his love of pleaſure, and under ſome ſuſpicion in reſpect to his religious principles (q); with reſpect to the former, it would be eaſier to excuſe than to defend him; and in regard to the latter, ſome who knew him intimately have thought that he was injured; and indeed it is not eaſy to conceive, how a man bleſſed with ſo much good ſenſe, and ſo ſolid an underſtanding, ſhould err in matters of ſuch high importance, and which ſo nearly concerned his own peace. He died after a ſhort illneſs, which he bore with great patience, January the eighteenth 1718-19, and was buried on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month, in the church of Harrow on the Hill, in the county of Middleſex, in a vault which he had cauſed to be built for him and his family (r), leaving behind him an only daughter, married to the Honourable Colonel William Boyle, a younger ſon of the Honourable Colonel Henry Boyle, who was brother to the late, and uncle to the preſent, Earl of Burlington (s).

We have already ſeen how warmly Mr Addiſon defended our author's writings, when they were attacked merely upon a principal of party; and it would be no difficult thing to cite, many compliments to him, or on his writings, from ſome of the greateſt men his age produced; but what follows, will abundantly anſwer our intention.

Lord LANDSDOWNE, on Dr GARTH's illneſs.

MACHAON ſick! in every face we find,
His danger is the danger of mankind;
Whoſe art protecting, nature could expire,
But by a deluge, or the general fire.
More lives he ſaves, than periſh in our wars,
And faſter than a plague deſtroys repairs;
The bold carowſer and adventurous dame,
Nor fear the fever, nor refuſe the flame,
Safe in his ſkill from all reſtraint ſet free,
But conſcious ſhame, remorſe, or piety.
Sire of all arts, defend thy darling ſon,
Reſtore the man, whoſe life's ſo much our own,
On whom like Adam the whole worlds reclin'd,
And by preſerving GARTH, preſerve mankind.

The celebrated Mr Pope, in a letter to a friend, gives the following account of our author's death, his ſenſe of it, and his own opinion of the character he deſerved. 'The beſt natured of men, ſays he, Sir Samuel Garth, 'has left me in the trueſt concern for his loſs. His death 'was very heroical, and yet unaffected enough to have 'made a Saint or a Philoſopher famous. But ill tongues, 'and worſe hearts, have branded even his laſt moments, 'as wrongfully as they did his life with irreligion. You 'muſt have heard many tales on this ſubject; but if 'ever there was a good Chriſtian, without knowing 'himſelf to be ſo, it was Dr Garth (4).' This letter is dated Dec 12, 1718; and his free and candid ſentiments of this great man, as they are infinitely better, ſo will they probably laſt much longer, than any monumental hiſtory. E

GASCOIGNE (Sir WILLIAM), Knight, Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, in the reign of King Henry IV. was nobly deſcended, of a very antient and numerous family, which has been ſeated ſome hundred years in Yorkſhire; where, and in other parts, it appears to have flouriſhed in very honourable diſtinction, at leaſt from the Conqueſt. As the name is derived from Gaſcony in France; as it appears in the roll of Battle-Abbey (a), among thoſe who entred this Kingdom with William the Norman, and as one of his anceſtors, brought hither by King Henry II, was, in right of his wife Eleanor, Duke of Gaſcoin (b), it has been thought that the family was not fixed here, more early than in the former, as it might not be more illuſtriouſly ſo, before the latter of thoſe Kings; yet it's firſt entrance may not have been with the earlieſt of theſe, but it might be more antiently ſettled here, than in either of thoſe reigns; as many, out of families long inhabiting this iſland, who, wearied with Harold's Uſurpation, went over to join the Conqueror, and being entred in that roll, after their return, appear as then firſt entring the nation with him (c); and as other eminent progenitors have been traced thereof, up to the Saxon times, in ſome of the elaborate pedigrees, which have been preſerved therein; or who, at leaſt, were then, at the Conqueſt, of Saxon names and lineage; tho' the name of Gaſcoigne appears not annexed to them, becauſe ſurnames were not cuſtomary, or hereditary among us, till after the entrance of the ſaid William the Norman (d), and then it was common for local names, eſpecially of French derivation, to ſwallow up thoſe that were perſonal. The family thus deſcending through, or engrafted with, different nations, may help us to account for the different ways of ſpelling it's name. For tho' we have here, in the head or title of this article, preferred that orthography, or ſpelling thereof, which is now, and has long been, moſt eſtabliſhed and received, as we generally find it in our moſt antient law-books, and as his deſcendants retain it to this day; yet hath it been written, as ſome antiquaries of his own county have obſerved (e), from very authentic precedents, more variouſly than perhaps any other among us [A]. It has alſo been obſerved from his pedigree, that the chriſtian

[A] His name has been more variouſly written than perhaps any other among us.] Surnames are ſubject to mutation, according to the caprice, not only of ſtrangers, but their owners themſelves. Tho' many are for retrenching every redundant letter, and making names correſpondent, with the language of the times, to the moſt graceful, or converſible manner of ſtile or ſpeech, and ſo as they may be rendered moſt ſmooth, eaſy and familiar, to ſpeaking and writing, reading and remembrance: yet others will pride themſelves in retaining every mark of antiquity in their names, as the moſt conciſe cognizance, and genuine teſtimony in them, both of reverence and authority, how inelegant ſoever to the eye or ear, in themſelves; or upbraiding of novelty in others; and urge, they may be found upon conſideration, to be leſs diſguiſed in their obſolete orthography, than in any modern maſquerade. Beſides, ignorance as well as willfulneſs, is ſo much greater, in ſpelling the names of particular perſons erroneouſly, than the general words in a language, that it is no wonder the greateſt pſeudography is moſt often propagated therein; eſpecially of ſuch families as, having been eminently and fruitfully diſperſed through different countries, have had their names ſubject to the different impreſſions of their ſeve-chriſtian name of William has been preſerved from the Conqueſt ſo ſucceſſively in the heir or eldeſt ſon of the family, that the like in others is rarely to be met with; there being no fewer than fifteen Williams, of whom ſix or eight were Knights, in a lineal deſcent; that is, ſeven before this Sir William the Judge, who was the eighth lineal heir by whom that chriſtian name was borne; and it was preſerved alſo as regularly in his eldeſt deſcendents, for ſeven generations after him, as may be more particularly ſeen in the note ſubjoined [B]. The ral dialects. From ſome of theſe, or ſuch like motives, many inſtances of ſuch diverſity or tranſpoſition, in ſpelling of names may be accounted for. Dr Thomas Teniſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, has quoted five or ſix authors, who have differently written the name of Sir Gervas Elwis, tho' neither of them right (1): and Dr Fuller obſerves, in his Diſcourſe upon the Alteration of Surnames, that the name of Villiers, has been written, in their old evidences, fourteen ſeveral ways (2). Yet in a volume of the principal families in Yorkſhire, whereof divers tranſcripts having been made, it is well known among the gentry of that county (3), we have obſerved this name of Gaſcoigne is ſtill more variouſly ſpelt; and Mr Thoreſby has printed no leſs than nineteen variations thereof, as they have been diſtinguiſhed out of the old deeds and records, by thoſe who have laboured moſt extenſively in the pedigree of this family: and, as he has tranſmitted them, they ſtand thus (4). Gaſkin, Gauſcin, Gaſcoigne (5); Gaſcoygne, Gaſcoinge (6); Gaſcoyn (7), Gaſcun, Gaſken; Gaſkyn, Gaſkun, Gaſton (8); Gaſtone, Gaſtoyn (9); Gaſtoynge, Gaſquin, Gaſquyne; Gawſken, Vaſcon and Guaſcogn. But there are two or three different ſpellings more, that have been occaſionally uſed, as the true name, not wantonly ſtudied for the ſake of variety, and are not here, in that liſt mentioned: one whereof, may appear as ancient or authentic as moſt of them; and that is written, de Gaſquone; another is Gaſkoigne; as may hereafter more particularly occur. But theſe various readings are all now, chiefly reduced, either to Gaſcoigne, after the ſhorter ſound of the French; or Gaſcoyne, to ſmoothen the ſpelling, and keep the found of the dipthong open, after the broader manner of the Engliſh pronunciation; tho' in current ſpeech, it is more briefly founded Gaſkin.

[B] Fifteen Williams ſucceſſively, in a lineal deſcent, as may be ſeen in the note.] Certain ſurnames have been moſt frequently preſerved, and devolved through divers families, as from other occaſions, ſo chiefly in memory of ſome eminent anceſtors who bore them; as that of Frederic, in the Tilneys; Everard, in the Digbys; Marmaduke, in the Conſtables, Wyvils, &c. or in reſpect to ſuch Princes or Potentates, who had conferred honours upon ſome branches thereof: and, as in regard to others, ſo to the Williams in particular. The name of William is of German original, and was uſed with us in the Saxon times; though it was not in ſuch vogue or requeſt, till the eſtabliſhment here of William the Conquerer. It is a compound word; and as Helm ſignifies Defence, in the German tongue, according to Martin Luther, and Kenhelm, defence of kindred (10), ſo Willy, Villi or Billi, with the Germans, like Poly, before ſeveral names among the Grecians, ſignifies Many; and conſequently Wilhelm, now mollified into William, Much Defence, or Defence of Many: though, as ſome Etymologiſts have derived the Willow tree from it's Willingneſs to grow (11), others have turned William into a Willing Defender (12). In ſeveral families, which had any dependance upon the Conqueror, and his line, eſpecially thoſe who had received grants of pardons, privileges, offices, lands, or ſeignories, his name was thus tranſmitted, and became ſo predominant, among thoſe of eminent rank, that, as our laſt cited Antiquary has recorded, upon a certain feſtival day, in the court of King Henry II, when Sir William Saint John, and Sir William Fitz-Hamon, two ſpecial officers, had commanded that none, but of the name of William, ſhould dine in the great chamber with them, they were accompanied with, an hundred and twenty Williams, all Knights (13). And as many of theſe, in grateful remembrance of thoſe Princes, who had conferred honours, promotions, or eſtates upon them, or their anceſtors, had their royal names engrafted on their own, to ſpread and ſurvive in themſelves and poſterity; ſo it is probable, from what may hereafter appear, that for ſuch like favours, the like commemoration was preſerved, with ſuch conſtant and ſingular gratitude, in this of the Gaſcoignes. Among other names derived from, or revived in memory of, our moſt famous Princes, that of Henry, but more eſpecially of Edward, has alſo been very numerous; inſomuch, that Dr Plot has taken notice of it as very obſervable (14), that there were nine Sir Edwards ſucceſſively in the Family of Littleton, of Pillaton Hall, but of this of the Gaſcoignes, as we ſaid before, there were no fewer than fifteen Williams, of whom ſix or eight were Knights, in a lineal deſcent; that is, ſeven before, and ſeven after the celebrated Sir William Gaſcoigne, the Chief Juſtice; tho' as ſome of our Antiquaries and Heralds have truly obſerved, there may be an inconvenience herein; and if a man ſhould be forced to prove his deſcent, this identity of names, would be apt to perplex or confound it, and make it hard to prove the donor and the donee in formedon, or diſtinguiſh the one from the other (15). The moſt copious pedigree we have in print, of this family, is that extracted by Mr Ralph Thoreſby, from a very extenſive one, which was lent him in the year 1696, by John Gaſcoigne, of Parlington, Eſq; the father of Sir Edward Gaſcoigne, Bart. of Nova Scotia. It is drawn out in ſixteen large ſheets or ſkins of parchment, curiouſly illuminated, and atteſted by Sir Henry St George, Norroy. In this extract, Mr Thoreſby traces not the Gaſcoignes ſo high as Ailricus, a noble Saxon of this family, who was baniſhed by the Conqueror, and has omitted moſt of the females and younger branches (16): nevertheleſs his extract appears conſiderably copious, and begins, if not ſo high as the Conqueſt, but few degrees below it, as it contains a line of ſeven deſcents before the Judge; and all of them, as we obſerved, are named William. Of the four firſt, the wives are not mentioned. The fifth, was William Gaſcoigne of Harwood; who married Elizabeth, the heir of W. Bolton. The ſixth, is called Sir William Gaſcoigne, in one account (17), though not mentioned as a Knight in this pedigree; and he, by Manſild, or Matilda, if it ſhould be tranſlated Maud, daughter of John de Gawkethorp, had William Gaſcoigne of Gawthorp; who by Agnes his wife, had five ſons and two daughters; that is to ſay, 1. This Sir William Gaſcoigne, the Chief-Juſtice. 2. Nicholas. 3. Richard. 4. Thomas; and 5. John, a Clerk: the daughters were, Anne, married to Sir Robert Conſtable; and Elizabeth, to John Aſke of Olſtroppe. The Chief Juſtice was twice married; firſt, to Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Alexander Mowbray (18), of Kirtlington, Eſq; by whom he had one ſon, Sir William Gaſcoigne, as Walſingham calls him, of Gawthorp, a brave commander in the wars of France under King Henry V (19). who, by Jane, daughter and heir of Sir Henry Wyman, had Sir William Gaſcoigne of Gawthorp, High-Sheriff of Yorkſhire, 20 Henry VI; who by Margaret, daughter of Thomas Clarell, Eſq; and relict of John Fitz-Williams, had four ſons, and five daughters; the firſt whereof was, Sir William Gaſcoigne; another was named John, of Thorp on the Hill, who married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir William Swillington of Thorp, and was anceſtor to the Gaſcoignes of Thorp: that Sir William, by Joan, Daughter of John, the ſon of Sir Ralph Nevil, of Overſley in Warwickſhire, had Sir William Gaſcoigne of Gawthorp; to whom, at the death of the ſaid John, in 1482, when Sir William was aged thirty years, fell Overſley, Merſton-Boteler, with other Lordſhips or Manors, in the the ſaid county of Warwick; which were ſold by the fourth deſcendent from this, who was Nevil's heir, to Thomas Lord Cromwell; by whoſe attainder they eſcheated to the Crown (20). That Sir William was created Knight of the Bath at the Queen's coronation in the third, not the firſt, of King Henry VII (21), Anno 1487; and marrying Margaret, Daughter of Henry Piercy, the third Earl of Northumberland, had by her

The ſaid Thomas, was Sheriff of Yorkſhire in the 24th of Eliz and had by this wife, four daughters, and one ſon, who was Sir William, the father of Thomas, the firſt Earl of Strafford. Thus we have given the eldeſt deſcendents from the Chief Juſtice, by his firſt Wife. His ſecond, was Joan, daughter of Sir William Pickering, Knight, and relict of Sir Ralph Grayſtock, Baron of the Exchequer (23), by whom he had a ſon, James Gaſcoigne, of Cardington, in Bedfordſhire. Dr Fuller has mentioned and diſtinguiſhed, from good authority, a younger brother of Gawthorp Houſe, named William Gaſcoigne, who was, long after that James, ſettled at Cardington nigh Bedford, by marrying the inheritrix thereof. He was Sheriff of Bedford and Bucks, the 22 Henry VII, and again the 7th and 9th of Henry VIII. He was alſo knighted by this King, and Comptroller of the Houſhold to Cardinal Wolſey (24).

Nicholas Gaſcoigne of Laſingcroft, next brother to the Chief Juſtice, was, by his wife Mary, the daughter of Sir Hugh Elderhow, father of ſeveral children; and anceſtor of others, who married into the families of Beckwith, Vavaſour, Ardington, Ingleby, &c. From him was deſcended John Gaſcoigne of Laſingcroft, who died in 1557; and left, among other children, John, his third ſon and heir, of whom hereafter; and George Gaſcoigne, Eſq; (25) firſt of Oldhirſt, who by Mary, daughter of John Stokeſley, was father of Sir Nicholas Gaſcoigne of Surry, who was knighted in 1603, and died in 1617; alſo of Richard Gaſcoign, Eſq; the celebrated Antiquary, and other children. This Richard was born at Sherfield, near Brentwood in Eſſex, Anno 1579, as he left it written in a note with his own hand, on the title page of a book which was part of his own library (26). He was educated at Cambridge, whether in St John's College, we are not ſure; but in that Univerſity he made others eminent for their learning beſides himſelf. He was famous among the Hiſtorians and Antiquaries, for his manuſcript Collections, before the year 1622; and as Sir Robert Cotton, St Low Kniveton, Mr W. Liſle, the Saxon Antiquary, of Wilbrougham in Cambridgeſhire, beſides others, imparted of their greateſt curiolities to him; ſo was he no leſs communicative of his own choice and invaluable collections, to ſeveral who were cultivating the like ſtudies with himſelf (27). Nor ſpared he to employ his intereſt, with ſuch of his friends, who could beſt forward their productions to the publick. Soon after Mr Dugdale was firſt brought to London by Sir Simon Archer, in 1638, and recommended by Sir Henry Spelman, to Mr Roger Dodſworth, Mr Gaſcoigne, who had great acquaintance with Sir Chriſtopher, afterwards the Lord Hatton, a noble encourager of theſe ſtudies, ſo effectually introduced Mr Dugdale to this worthy patron, that he was not only made welcome, with all expreſſion of kindneſs, but actual readineſs to promote his labours (28); which turned greatly to the benefit and advancement thereof. Wherefore, Dugdale, afterwards recording ſome particulars we have before ſpoken of, relating to the deſcendents of Nicholas Gaſcoigne of Laſingcroft, brother, as we obſerved to the Chief Juſtice, and their alliance with the Wentworths, has gratefully added theſe words, 'Nor muſt I forget that, likewiſe from the 'ſame ſtock, is alſo ſprung my ſpecial friend, Richard 'Gaſcoigne, late of Bramham Biggen, in the county of 'York, Eſq; a gentleman well worthy of the beſt reſpects from all lovers of antiquities; to whoſe good 'affections and abilities in thoſe ſtudies, his own family and ſeveral others of much eminency, allied thereto, are not a little obliged (29).' He was related, as we have ſaid above, to the Wentworth family, by the marriage into it of a female heir; and as ſhe enriched it with a large eſtate, ſo did he, with no ſmall portion of honour; by reviving, from his own extraordinary treaſury of antiquities, ſuch a numerous generation of the moſt eminent anceſtors therein. Some copy of this copious, painful, and accurate work, was made by Dr Johnſon, as appears among the voluminous collections he gathered for the Antiquities of Yorkſhire (30). For theſe, and other reſpects, Mr Gaſcoigne was much eſteemed in the Strafford family; as by Thomas, the firſt Earl, ſo alſo by his ſon William, after his death, Earl of Strafford, at Wentworth Woodhouſe. His picture was there preſerved, repreſenting him with a freſh healthy complexion, in his very old age, when his head was reverendly ſilver'd over with grey hairs. It is a half length, ſitting in a chair; attir'd in a white damaſk gown, flowered with black; and in his hand, an old parchment deed or charter, folded up, with a broad ſeal of yellow wax appendant: but if it could cover the poſthumous treatment of it's original's memory, as gracefully as it does it's length and breadth of the wainſcot, it would ſurely then be a moſt honourable ornament. Several printed books were alſo preſerved in the Library there, as hath been in ſome others, relating to the Hiſtory and Peerage of England, the Antiquities of the Counties, and Monumental Inſcriptions in the Churches, wherein any pedigrees or deſcents of noted families are mentioned; which were many of them laborioufly corrected, and enlarged with marginal notes, and additional tables of Genealogy, written in the fine, fair, little hand, of the ſaid Richard Gaſcoigne. By which we may perceive, he ſpent much of his long life, eſpecially the latter part, in theſe Studies. What family he had, is but briefly mentioned. We find in the printed pedigree, that he was, or had been married, to the daughter of Mr Colles, or, as others ſeem to have corrected it, Collet (31): and there was an old gentleman of this name, in the reign of K. Charles I, who was chief Clerk, or Deputy Keeper of the Records, in the Tower of London, under Sir John Buroughs (32); but we know not that this was the father of his wife, nor what iſſue Mr Gaſcoigne had by her. Though he was often at the Univerſities, at York, and at London, ſearching the libraries, archives, and offices of record; or at the ſeats of his learned and honourable friends, augmenting his antique collections from their family records; as Mr Henry Ferrers of Baddeſley had alſo gathered part of his many volumes of Antiquities from the living, as well as the dead, yet his own dwelling, or proper abode, was at Bramham Biggin in Yorkſhire; where it is thought he died; and, as we compute, about the year 1658; having ſeen ſome books, with his writing and illuſtrations in them, ſo late, as within one or two years of that time (33); when he muſt have been aged near fourſcore. As for his vaſt magazine of moſt valuable and venerable antiquities, which once filled the rooms of a tall ſtone-tower, their duſty dormitory, or long unmoleſted aſylum, and what became of them; ſo many original charters, patents, deeds, and other evidences, ſome in the Saxon character; ſo many rolls of pedigrees, creations, ſucceſſions; court-rolls, and others of limned portraits, from old illuminated manuſcripts, fenestral paintings, and monumental effigies, with their inſcriptions, arms, &c. beſides his infinite extracts, as well from ancient regiſters, ledgers, couchers, viſitations, obitals, wills, eſcheats, and all ſorts of other records, as from the painful reſearches of many other antiquaries, which enabled him, ſo expertly to make, as well all thoſe additions and improvements in the printed books of Heraldry, Genealogy, Topography, &c aforeſaid, as to draw out the many volumes from them, in manuſcript, which he did, of our moſt eminent families, eſpecially in Yorkſhire, even throughout the

the alphabet; each volume being distinguished by a letter thereof: what became of all this inestimable treasure, I say, except those alphabetical volumes, more happily estranged; and by what innovating, intimidating, or other infatuating, and misconceived motives, they met with a most undeserved fate, from whence it was least to be expected, being all, without distinction, wilfully sacrificed to the no less undistinguishing flames, as it is elsewhere observed (34), about seventy years after the death of their learned and worthy collector, it might be more tedious than agreeable, in this place, more amply to relate. However, thus much may be said, of what has been thought thereof, that, whatever similitude may appear in the action, there was a great disparity between the motives to that sacrifice, and those, whereby our famous Whittington (35) is said to have testified his generous loyalty, and gratitude, for the honours he had received; when, in his costly Fire of Spices, far less precious, less profuse, than that of those Antiquities! further to brighten, and enrich the fragrant flame, he made a burnt-offering of those manuscript obligations, whereby his princely benefactor had engaged himself to restore the treasures wherewith he had been intrusted (36). All we have more to observe here, of this learned Antiquary, is that, whether it was a different person, or not, of the same name and family, whose genealogy is preserved in one of our publick libraries (37), we have not been yet certified. The third son and heir of John of Lasingcroft before mentioned, and uncle to this Richard was John Gascoigne of Parlington, Esq; who by Maud, the daughter of William Arthington of Castley, Esq; had besides younger sons John Gascoigne of Lasingcroft, Parlington, and Barnbow, the eldest; who was created Baronet of Nova Scotia, by King Charles I. And this Sir John Gascoigne, dying May 3, 1637, his eldest son, by his lady, Anne, Daughter of John Ingleby, Esq; was Sir Thomas Gascoigne, Baronet, of Elmett in the West-Riding of Yorkshire; who, being above eighty-five years of age, very deaf, and superannuated, in February 1679, was indicted at the King's-Bench-Bar Westminster, for high-treason, upon the evidence of Robert Bolron, and one Mowbray, his servants; the former of whom, had been sued on his bonds for debt to Sir Thomas, and ejected from his farm for default of rent; and the latter also discarded, and disgraced, for defrauding his said master of money: yet one or both pretended to have been, notwithstanding, engaged by him in a conspiracy, to destroy the King, for a large sum of money, and bring in the Popish Religion (38). The Chief Justice Scroggs, left the Court, when he saw the malicious contrivance detecting, and the evidence against Sir Thomas likely to be invalidated: and though the other Judges would have biass'd the Jury, to find him guilty; yet, these, seeing how exceptionable the witnesses against him were, and how improbable, that Sir Thomas should shew so little favour to those, at whose mercy it was pretended, he had trusted his life, now so much endanger'd by the spirit of revenge, and avarice in them, upon such prospects especially as they had of reward, for their accusation, the said Jury brought him in Not Guilty: And 'tis remarked, as an instance in this tryal, of the new witnesses of the plot, which were then rising every day, that if a servant had cheated, or robbed his master, he would ward off the prosecution, by swearing him into the conspiracy (39). But History might accommodate us with more agreeable particulars, of some succeeding descendents in this line of the Gascoignes of Lasingcroft, Parlington, and Barnbow, were it to be continued down to Sir Edward Gascoigne, Baronet, beforementioned; whose benefactions to the Cathedral Church of York, are recorded by the historian of that city (40); or those other gentlemen of merit and distinction, who are now living; among whom we shall only mention, John Gascoigne, Esq; Rear-Admiral, the present chief of one branch of the family; to whom, and to another John Gascoyne of London, Esq; who is related to the alderman of this city, of the same name, we here make our grateful acknowledgement, and return of thanks, for the favour of their communications, relating to this article of the Lord Chief Justice. The next line, of the Judge's second brother, Richard Gascoigne of Hunslet, Esq; is but short (41). He is distinguished in the records, to have been Marshal of the Exchequer, by the grant for life, of Thomas, Earl of Kent (42). Some of our old writers pretending to give us the names of his father and mother, have mistaken both (43). He married, according to the pedigree, Anne, daughter and coheir of Henry Ellis, Esq; and dying in 1422, left a son named Thomas, and two daughters, Alice and Elizabeth: the first was married to Sir Thomas Nevil, Knt. and the second to Sir John Everingham. That Thomas was bred at Oriel College in Oxford, and became a learned Doctor of Divinity; famous both abroad and at home. In 1434, he was Vice-Chancellor, and in 1442, Chancellor of that University, which he resign'd about three years after (44). He was the author of many books, all written in Latin it seems; at least, the titles of them are all in that language. Some ancient copies of them are preserved in many Libraries; but we meet with none that have been ever printed. The most considerable of them are, An Epistle of the Proceedings at the Council of Florence, in Trinity College Library at Cambridge; his Narrative of the Decollation of Archbishop Scrope, among the manuscripts in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; his Life of St Jerom, in the Library at Magdalen College, in that University; his Complaint against the Election of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in 1443, among Bodley's MSS. and besides three or four more, upon scripture arguments (45), his Theological Dictionary, in Lincoln College; the largest, most noted, and most cited of all his works. Among the additions to one of our old Historians, set forth by the late Mr Thomas Hearne, he has given us an extract, or collection in several pages, of such particulars in this Dictionary, as are most enriched with historical intelligence (*). As for the author, there is a letter written to him by Wolfard Kober, in 1456, preserved among the manuscripts in Baliol College, Oxford; and, as appears in the pedigree, he died on the 13th of March 1457, but in other accounts, that he was flourishing three years later (46): And as for the Judge's two youngest brothers, Thomas and John, beforementioned, we have already said as much of them, as we have met with. But, whereas there was one Sir Bernard Gascoigne, who has been looked for in this pedigree, and thought to have been inadvertently omitted, we shall, to prevent any further misapprehension, here briefly shew, how likely it is, that he had no right of admittance therein. This Knight, having the reputation of being well acquainted with the German interest, and policies, was employed by King Charles II, in the quality of his envoy to the Imperial Court at Vienna, in order to negotiate a match, which was then proposed between his Majesty's brother, James, Duke of York, and the Archduchess of Inspruck. While Sir Bernard resided there, in the Emperor's court, he wrote an historical and political discourse upon the German Empire, which he then sent over in a letter to King Charles; and it was, in the beginning of the late Queen Anne's reign, set forth in print (47). There were also published at the same time with it, among other state papers, written by several other persons, the epistolary correspondence which was held by Henry Bennet, Lord Arlington, then Secretary of State, with Sir Bernard Gascoigne, on the occasion of the said match. They consist of about thirty letters in number, and contain some reasons and arguments to be used, or directions to be followed, in that negotiation, by the said Sir Bernard Gascoigne (48). But the ingenious editor of these papers, in his prefatory discourse prefixed to them, gives us to understand, that the said Description of Germany, was writ by no countryman of ours, and consequently, as we presume, unallied to the English family of Gascoignes before spoken of; for where he has given some character of it, in regard to the phrase or diction in which it is written, he confesses that, 'The style thereof is somewhat obscure 'or harsh; which ought to be pardoned, says he, in a 'foreigner, as Sir Bernard Gascoigne was, being a Florentine by birth; but, adds he, the importance and 'faithfulness from which time this place became their chief ſeat of reſidence (g). That Sir William's ſon William, married Alice, the daughter and coheir of Nicholas Frank, Eſq; by whom he had this Sir William Gaſcoigne, the Chief Juſtice, their eldeſt born; beſides the ſons and daughters whom we have mentioned in the preceding note. At Gawthorp, in the ſaid pariſh of Harwood, between Leeds and Knarſborough, it is credibly atteſted that this Chief Juſtice was born (b), and, as it has been computed, in the middle of King Edward IIId's reign, about 1350, or not much later. He was afterwards a ſtudent of the Law in the Inner Temple, as our laſt quoted author informs us; but Sir William Dugdale has given us a ſculpture of his arms, from one of the windows in Grays Inn-Hall, importing him to have been a member of that Society (i). He grew ſo eminent in his profeſſion towards the latter end of King Richard II, that he was made one of the King's Serjeants in September 1398 (k). And how much eſteemed he was by his ſucceſſor, for his knowledge and fidelity in the tranſaction of the moſt intricate and important affairs, as well relating to his own rights as thoſe of the kingdom, may be inferred from ſeveral inſtances. For, on the eighth of October in the ſame year, he was nominated by King Richard, with others, in a commiſſion of Agency, procured by the ſaid Henry of Lancaſter, Duke of Hereford (l), ſoon after King of England, when he was going into baniſhment. Theſe letters patent, which were ſo granted to Duke Henry at his departure, whereby Gaſcoigne, and the Duke's other General Attorneys, were empowered to proſecute his cauſes, and ſue livery of any Inheritance, which, during his exile, might fall to him, as that of his father John of Ghent did, and whereby his homage was reſpited for a reaſonable fine, were, as one of our Hiſtorians has truly obſerved, revoked by King Richard (m), as it appears from the Parliament rolls on the eighteenth of March following, the ſaid grant being judged unlawful by his Parliament; and when Duke Henry, the next year, aſcended the throne, that revocation was judged unlawful by his Parliament, and made one of the articles for depoſing King Richard (n); ſo that the ſaid King's ineffectual endeavours to extinguiſh the Duke's greatneſs, did but augment it, to his own deſtruction; as the general Hiſtories have related. From the firſt year of this King Henry IV, who began his reign in September 1399, to the latter end of it, we meet with the abſtracts of Gaſcoigne's opinions, arguments, diſtinctions, and deciſions, as well before he was Chief Juſtice as after, very frequently recited, among thoſe of other ſages of the Law, in our old books of Reports (o), many whereof are diſtinguiſhed, and recommended, by the brief remarks of their learned editor, as very notable, or worthy of obſervation, and may give good lights into our old law caſes; eſpecially the more choice, nice, or intricate cauſes, then canvaſſed or agitated in our courts of juſtice; with the various opinions, abilities, and characters, of thoſe who preſided in them; and have been long ſo well eſteemed to yield many precedents of good authority, that ſome famous Judges, and others learned in the laws, have taken much pains, of ſummaries as they are, to render them ſtill more ſuccinct (p). And as ſome remarks, critical or hiſtorical, have been made, by one of our moſt induſtrious Antiquaries, upon the antient adminiſtrators of juſtice, whoſe ſentiments and judgments are recorded in theſe books, ſome character or diſtinction, according to the title of his performance, may be expected to appear, of Judge Gaſcoigne therein (q); but whether ſuch diſtinction or character is there preſerved, we have not now the opportunity of information. It appears from very good authority, that he was Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, ſo early at leaſt as the ſecond year of King Henry IV, or 1401; tho' there has been ſome little diſagreement upon that head [C]. And now, the nation being embroil'd with dangerous commotions,

'faithfulneſs of the relation, will, I hope, make ſufficient compenſation for the deficiency of the language; and certainly cannot be unwelcome at this conjuncture, when England has ſo viſibly an intereſt in the affairs of Germany (49).' When the ſaid Sir Bernard Gaſcoign returned from his embaſſy into England, he took ſhipping at Dunkirk; and one of the paſſengers who came over with him, was Mrs Aphra Behn, the ingenious poeteſs. It is aſſerted by the writer of her life, that in the courſe of their voyage, they all ſaw a ſurpriſing Phænomenon, whether formed by any riſing exhalations, or deſcending vapours, ſhaped by the winds, and irradiated by refracted lights, is not explained; but it appeared, through Sir Bernard's teleſcopes, in a clear day, at a great diſtance, to be, or to reſemble, a fine, gay, floating fabrick, adorned with figures, feſtoons, &c. At firſt they ſuſpected ſome art in his glaſſes, till at laſt, as it approached, they could ſee it plainly without them; and the relater is ſo particular in the deſcription, as to aſſert that it appeared to be, a four-ſquare floor, of various coloured marble; having rows of fluted and twiſted pillars aſcending, with Cupids on the top, circled with vines and flowers, and ſtreamers waving in the air. 'Tis added, of this ſtrange viſionary, if not romantic or poetical pageant; for fancy is an architect, that can build caſtles in the clouds, as well by ſea as land; that it floated almoſt near enough for them to ſtep out upon it; as if it would invite them to a ſafer landing, than they ſought by ſailing; or portended that the one ſhould be as dangerous and deceitful as the other: for ſoon after the calm which enſued, there aroſe ſuch a violent ſtorm, that they were all ſhipwreckt, but happily in ſight of the land; to which, by timely aſſiſtance, they all got ſafe (50).

[C] There has been ſome little diſagreement upon that head.] John Stow is manifeſtly miſtaken in ſuggeſting that this Chief Juſtice, appeared no ſooner on the King's Bench than the ſixth year of King Henry the Fourth's reign (51). And Dr Fuller, in correction of him, has aſſerted, as from good authority, that Gaſcoigne was made Chief Juſtice of that Bench, on the firſt of November in the firſt year of that King (52). wherein he is alſo miſtaken; for it is manifeſt in the Parliament Rolls, that Sir Walter Clopton, was then Chief Juſtice of this Bench, from that remarkable incident of his taking the confeſſion of John Hall, who was concerned in that moſt wicked and formal murder of Thomas, Duke of Glouceſter, by ſmothering him between two feather beds, in the Prince's Inn, or Engliſh Priſon, as ſome call it, at Calais, according to the ſecret direction of King Richard (53). This confeſſion was taken, and the ſaid malefactor executed, on the commotions, by the friends of the late King Richard, and other enemies of King Henry, we find among the records, that, in July 1403, together with Ralph Nevil Earl of Weſtmorland, this Judge Gaſcoigne, and others, are commiſſioned by the ſaid King, to iſſue their power and authority, for levying and aſſembling forces in the counties of York and Northumberland, of what ſtate, degree, or condition ſoever, againſt the inſurrection of Henry Percey Earl of Northumberland (r). In the fifth year of King Henry, which is one part in 1403 the other in 1404, when an erroneous judgment, which had been given againſt Roger Deyncourt, touching a mannor in Warwickſhire, was, upon examining the proceſs and record, reverſed by this Chief Juſtice; and he gave a tranſcript of it, under his own hand, to the Clerk of the Parliament; as alſo, a ſcire facias to the ſaid Roger, returnable in the next Parliament; we obſerve in the printed abſtract of this record, the Chief Juſtice is diſtinguiſhed by the title of Sir William Gaſcoigne (*), expreſſing him to have been at that time a Knight; tho' from ſome remarks of other writers, which we have mentioned in the note directed to in the next year of that King's reign, it ſhould ſeem that he was not knighted till then. On the 25th of April 1405, we find the ſaid Earl of Weſtmorland, William Gaſcoigne, and others, alſo appointed, by letters patent, with full power and authority, from King Henry, to treat with the rebellious abettors of the ſaid Earl of Northumberland; that they, paying their fines, might be received to mercy: and there was a proclamation iſſued by the King to the ſame purpoſe, at Pontefract, the next day (s). Soon after, in the ſame year, when Archbiſhop Scrope, with others, was taken in arms againſt the King, and his Majeſty would have had Judge Gaſcoigne pronounce ſentence of death directly upon him, he maintained the law ſo incorruptibly, with regard to the eccleſiaſtical privileges, which the Archbiſhop himſelf had charged the King with violating, and ſo inflexibly refuſed to paſs ſuch ſentence, in the illegal and irregular manner required, that he incurred the King's high diſpleaſure for that refuſal, tho' for his integrity he gained great applauſe [D]. But when the heads of that inſurrection were cut off, the 28th of November, in the firſt year of that King, or 1399; and, on the third of October, in 1400, we find the ſaid Sir Walter Clopton, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, called to Parliament (54); but after that, and he had ſat about twelve years on this bench, we hear no more of him; for, in one of the volumes of old Reports before referred to, it appears, under the ſecond year of King Henry IV, that Gaſcoigne was then Chief Juſtice, as it ſeems, of the King's Bench; and alſo that he ſat, or had ſet, ſometimes, in the Common Pleas; whether before Sir William Thyrning was advanced thereto, in the foregoing year, or during that Judge's extraordinary engagements in the renunciation and depoſition of King Richard, or upon any other ſpecial cauſes, does not appear (55): but in Sir William Dugdale's Tables of Juridical Succeſſion, it is aſſerted, againſt, or under, the year 1401, that William Gaſcoigne was conſtituted Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, on the 15th of November (56); which is near two months in the third year of King Henry: ſo that Judge Gaſcoigne is promoted to this ſeat, above a year too ſoon, in Doctor Fuller, and at leaſt three years too late, in John Stow.

[D] Though for his integrity he gained great applauſe] As the Earl of Northumberland at his inſurrection, exhibited articles againſt King Henry, before the battle of Shrewſbury (57): So now after it, Archbiſhop Scrope alſo iſſued his. They contain many heavy charges againſt him; as, of perjury, falſhood, oppreſſion, tyranny, uſurpation, ſo eſpecially, of cauſing King Richard, after fifteen days and nights periſhing with hunger, thirſt and cold, in Pomfret Caſtle, to be murdered; or as the Archbiſhop ſays, put at laſt, to a moſt vile death; hitherto altogether unknown in our kingdom (58), but, by the Grace of God, no longer to be concealed (59): ſo that, ſtarving ſeems to be but one part of his ſufferings, and the other, not to have been diſcloſed in Hiſtory: for as to the aſſaſſination of Sir Pierce Exon, it ſeems romantic, and but a copy of the motives which Archbiſhop Becket's aſſaſſins received from their Prince. Archbiſhop Scrope had a ſtronger power than the King, and might have overcome his army, if his own credulity in the treacherous pretenſions of his adverſary, had not betrayed him; being enſnared, or deluded by the Earl of Weſtmorland, to enter into a parley, and diſband his forces, from a feigned approbation of his articles (60), and ſeeming revolt to his party; then was the Archbiſhop arreſted by him, and taken priſoner at Shipton More (61); and the King, knowing that the Houſe of Lords had lately, in taking the Earl of Northumberland's caſe from the Judges under their cognizance, cleared his inſurrection of treaſon, on account of his ſubmiſſion (62), and judged it to be only a treſpaſs, puniſhable by fine and ranſom, did not care to bring this caſe of the Archbiſhop's before that Judicatory (63); but reſolving to have him put to death for high-treaſon, would, when the Archbiſhop was brought to his manor houſe at Biſhopſthorp, near York, before his Majeſty, have obliged Judge Gaſcoigne to pronounce ſentence accordingly upon him as a traytor; but this upright and memorable Judge (64), who was, by no proſpect of fear or favour, to be corrupted to any ſuch violation of the ſubjects rights, or infringement of their laws and liberties, as then eſtabliſhed; which ſuffered no religious perſon to be brought to a ſecular or lay-trial, unleſs he were a heretic, and firſt degraded by the Church, as the Archbiſhop had objected againſt the King, in the caſe of others (65), abſolutely refuſed to obey the royal command, and ſaid to his Majeſty, Neither you, my Lord the King, nor any liege Subject of your's, in your name, can legally, according to the rights of the kingdom, adjudge any Biſhop to death (66). Whereupon the King, highly incenſed againſt the Judge, commanded Sir William Fulthorp (or Fulford, as Stow and others call him), who might be learned in the Laws (67), but was no Judge, to pronounce ſentence againſt the Archbiſhop, which he did, that day, being the 8th of June in the year 1405, as aforeſaid, from a high throne, or ſtage, as ſome call it, erected in the Archbiſhop's palace, after the moſt abrupt and extrajudicial manner, without indictment, trial, defence, or any other ceremony; and the Archbiſhop's tragedy was compleated the ſame day, in a corn-field without the city walls; being there, according to the King's mandate, beheaded, with Thomas Mowbray Earl Marſhall, and others. As for the miracles which are ſaid to have enſued at the place where the Archbiſhop ſuffered, upon certain lays of barley, which ſprung up next ſeaſon ſo fruitfully, tho' they had been all cruſhed and trampled down by the ſpectators of his death; and the judgments which befel the King, in thoſe leprous diſeaſes which ſoon after broke out upon him, as 'tis ſaid to have been teſtified to maſter Thomas Gaſcoigne, Profeſſor of Divinity (68), who was the Judge's nephew; with other ſuch particulars; we leave them where they are to be found, among ſome who have aſſerted (69) and others who diſcredit them (70); and ſhall only here obſerve, that Judge Gaſcoigne's conſcience was highly celebrated, for his having no ſhare in the Archbiſhop's death; and his courage, for reſiſting ſo incorruptibly ſuch a temptation to violate the laws of his country. off, it is evident that he ſoon recovered the King's favour; if now, the ſame year in which he loſt it, he received, as we ſee it aſſerted in the laſt note, the honour of knighthood from him. In April 1408, the Earl of Weſtmorland, Judge Gaſcoigne, and others, were further empowered by the King, who is expreſſed to be fully ſatisfied of their fidelity and circumſpection, to treat with, compound, and offer clemency or pardon to the adherents of the Earl of Northumberland; likewiſe to receive their fines, and pay them into the Exchequer: and this power for their ſaid treaty, is alſo dated from Pountfreyt Caſtle, on the 25th of April, in the year aforeſaid (u). Beſides the determination of particular cauſes in the Court of King's-Bench, which may be conſulted in the law books, as we before obſerved, many other publick affairs of the kingdom, of more general or national concern, we may diſcern the Chief Juſtice engaged in, to regulate or reform, according to the reſolutions and directions of the Parliament; tho' his name does not frequently occur, in ſuch abſtracts of their acts and ordinances as have appeared in print: and this may be obſerved from the beginning of Judge Gaſcoigne's adminiſtration of Juſtice in that Court. As where, upon a petition of the Commons, that the fees of all the Marſhals in every one of the King's Courts, and of the Warden of the Fleet, might be certainly, or expreſsly, ſettled and eſtabliſhed by authority; the King is ſaid to have appointed, that the Council, Chancellor, and Juſtices, ſhould take order therein (w). So alſo, where a judgment had formerly been given in the King's-Bench, in a cauſe between the late King Richard demandant, and Edmund Baſſet deforcient, for certain lands and tenements with-held from him in Somerſetſhire; and that judgment given againſt the ſaid Baſſet, was, for certain errors, revoked in the ſaid Court, now, in the reign of King Henry, with reſtitution granted of the premiſes; tho' no Judge of this Court is mentioned to have reverſed that judgment (x); it was late enough in this King's reign for Gaſcoigne to have then been the Chief Juſtice there, and to have granted the ſaid reſtitution. And, when certain Abbots, Priors, Knights, Eſquires, and other perſons of diſtinction, who had been wrongfully impeached, by a common perjured evidence in the King's-Bench, for ſundry heinous crimes, and ſuffered impriſonment; when the villainy was detected, that evidence condemned to death, and the guiltleſs priſoners diſcharged, by the King's writ; as 'tis expreſſed to be ſent to the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, it is here likewiſe manifeſt, that Chief Juſtice Gaſcoigne did then officiate in that ſeat (y), and might be principally implied, tho' no one Judge is named in the abſtract, or any thing elſe, whereby we might diſcover which of them was moſt inſtrumental in detecting ſuch extenſive injuſtice in the guilty on one ſide, and promoting ſuch a general deliverance of the innocent on the other; but the names of thoſe who were ſuch benefactors, in this ſignal relief, are thus paſſed over, and that of the malefactor, as may be ſeen, preſerved (z). As other inſtances might be given, in ſome ſucceeding years of that King's reign, how little we are able to diſtinguiſh what particular ſhare the Chief Juſtice had in theſe parliamentary references to a determination in his Court, from the ſhort and general form or manner of thoſe references; or the little we can find determined by him, in what appears among thoſe abſtracts under his own name, we ſhall give but one example more of a caſe, in which he is thus conjunctively referred to; and that was of great moment to many, as it concerned ſuch a comprehenſive reformation of practice in the Law. For the Attorneys being even then grown, by their multitude and male-practice, a publick grievance; an act was now made, in 1410 (a), not only for the reduction and limitation of them, to a certain number for every county, but alſo for their amendment and correction; as that they ſhould be ſworn every term, to deal faithfully and truly by their clients; and in breach thereof, ſhould be impriſoned for a twelvemonth, and make their ranſom according to the King's will: alſo, that the Prothonotaries and Filacers, upon conviction, ſhould endure double penalties: and it being further enacted, that the Juſtices of both Benches ſhould make this regulation, the Chief Juſtice Gaſcoigne muſt be again allowed his particular, if not a principal part in this general benefit and redreſs of the ſaid grievance thro' the whole kingdom. Upon this grant of that power to them, is endorſed, Reſpectuatur per Dominos Principem, et Conſilium (b): by which we may underſtand, that the King's eldeſt ſon, Henry Prince of Wales, was then Preſident of the Council. It ſeems the Clerks and Attorneys of both Benches, did afterwards pray for a revocation of this ſtatute, but the motion itſelf proved that the ſame was an act, notwithſtanding the Reſpectuatur thereon endorſed: however, the Judges of both Benches were appointed further to conſult thereupon, as well as more effectually to reform many other miſchievous corruptions and irregularities in their Courts (c). But there is another deciſion remitted to our Chief Juſtice, in this abſtract of the Parliament rolls, wherein he is expreſsly named; and that is, in the caſe of William Lord Roos of Hamalake, and his complaint againſt Sir Robert Thirwit, one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench, in the latter end of November, or beginning of the next month, in 1411 (d), for withholding certain manors and ſtiles the Judge at this time no more than Eſquire; which may agree very well with what another Hiſtorian obſerves of his receiving the honour of knighthood this year, the ſixth of King Henry IV (71), if we may allow the King's reſentment was but ſhort, or that he was ſo ſoon reconciled to him, for ſuch diſobedience of his unlawful injunction, as to correſpond with his conferring upon him, the ſame year, ſuch a mark of his favour.

and commons in the county of Lincoln; and for lying in wait, with five hundred men, to apprehend or ſeize the ſaid Lord. Sir Robert confeſſed his fault before the King, and offering to abide by the order of two Lords, the complainant's kindred, they made a long award; and further enjoined Sir Robert to make a great feaſt at Melton le Roos, in the ſaid county; that he ſhould prepare two fat oxen, twelve ſheep, two tuns of Gaſcoigne wine, with other proviſions; and then aſſemble thither, all ſuch Knights, Eſquires, and Yeomen, as were his accomplices in this riot; where they ſhould confeſs their miſbehaviour to the Lord Roos, crave his pardon, and make him an offer of five hundred marks in recompence; which the ſaid Lord Roos ſhould refuſe, but pardon them, and partake of their dinner, in token of his reconciliation: and it was referred by the arbitrators aforeſaid, to Sir William Gaſcoigne the Chief Juſtice, to determine the common right between them (e); but to which party he adjudged it, does not appear. It is thought to have been in the latter part of the King's reign, that his ſon, Prince Henry, indulged himſelf with ſome of his corrupt courtiers, in that interval of wild and diſorderly frolicks which ſeveral authors have taken notice of (f). In the courſe whereof, as the Chief Juſtice had before given an extraordinary teſtimony that no reſpect of dignity, however ſupream, in the King himſelf, could move him to an undue adminiſtration of the Law; ſo there occurred ſuch a memorable occaſion to exert the like reſolution againſt the obſtruction of it, in that famous incident of the Prince's being committed to priſon by our Chief Juſtice, now about the latter end of this reign [E], that no act of his, or any other Judge, has been more celebrated by Hiſtorians, Poets, and other eminent writers, to ſucceeding generations. The ſubſtance of the ſtory, as here briefly gathered from the moſt credible accounts, is, that a ſervant of Prince Henry's being arraigned before Judge Gaſcoigne, at Weſtminſter, for felony, and the Prince hearing of it, came into Court, commanded him to be unfettered, and offered to reſcue him; wherein being oppoſed, he ruſhed up to the Bench, with ſuch fury, that, as

[E] The Prince's being committed to priſon by the Chief Juſtice, now about the latter end of this reign.] Tho' we find not the year in which this extraordinary incident occurred, yet we may gather from ſeveral circumſtances in our old Hiſtorians, that thoſe wild excurſions which Prince Henry gave into, with ſome of his diſſolute and flattering attendants, were more eſpecially made in the latter part of his father's life. For he was carefully educated, and governed at the Univerſity of Oxford, in his green or younger age; and when he came from thence, he was laudably engaged in ſpiriting up his father's armies with his preſence, to appeaſe the commotions in the kingdom, as at Shrewſbury and in Wales, even till the flight of Owen Glendour. We may alſo frequently ſee him ſummoned to the Parliament; and how ſome propoſitions were there made, that he ſhould be ſent with a commiſſion to abide in Wales in the year 1407 (72), for the more effectual ſuppreſſion there of the rebellion. We may ſee him likewiſe mentioned, in ſome years, as Preſident of the Council; as where, in May 1410, when two of the Counſellors were changed, the Speaker recommended Prince Henry, and his brothers the Lords Thomas, John, and Humphry, to advancement; for which the King thanked him, and promiſed ſatisfaction at opportunity (73); and, as it is recorded elſewhere, under that year, the ſaid Lord Thomas was then created Duke of Clarence; the Lord John, Duke of Bedford; and Humphry, Duke of Glouceſter (74). Tho' others, from the records, affirm, that the ſaid Lord Thomas of Lancaſter was not created Duke of Clarence till two years after, and about eight months before his royal father's death (75). Again we may alſo find, that on the laſt of November 1411, the King is prayed, by the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Thomas Chaucer, the ſon of Geffrey the Poet, in the name of the Commons, to give thanks to the Prince, and others appointed to be of the King's Council in the laſt Parliament, for well employing the treaſure therein granted (76). And yet there is interval or ſpace enough before the King's death, which was more than fifteen months after that, for ſuch a contempt to have been committed in the Court of King's Bench, as might occaſion the impriſonment of the Prince. For this aſſault of the Chief Juſtice, is agreed upon to have been done, when the Prince was well grown into the years of manhood, and beyond the controllment of any tutors (77). And it muſt have been alſo after he was Preſident of the Council, becauſe the Hiſtorians likewiſe agree that the King, upon the ſaid inſult of his Chief Juſtice, diſcarded the Prince of Wales from the Council-board, and took his brother Thomas, whom they call Duke of Clarence at that time, into his room, to the Prince's great reluctance, remorſe, and open reproach. If the Prince had been reformed any conſiderable time before the King died, there would have been no occaſion for him to be ſeen in that ſtrange kind of emblematical dreſs or diſguiſe at Court; breaking in, as it were, upon the King's retirement, ſo weak and crazed, or near his latter end, as he appears to have been; and in a blue ſilk gown, full of black eylet-holes, with the needles hanging, like ſo many trickling drops of penetential tears, from every one, by the ſilk that wrought them; and offering a dagger for the King to kill him, if he ſuſpected his duty or loyalty (78); in order to diſſipate the jealouſies which he thought had been infuſed into him, by thoſe traducers who might take advantage from his miſconduct towards others, to ſuggeſt that he would grow dangerous and diſloyal to his father. Beſides, if the Prince had, for a good while before the King's death, renounced his irregular and diſcreditable frolicks, he would alſo have diſcharged his looſe accomplices or aſſociates in them; but, it ſeems, he kept them company till he came to the throne; becauſe, not till then, is he ſaid to have ſummoned and diſmiſſed them; and if it were not ſo, the reflection would be very improper in Polidore, and all our other Hiſtorians who have followed him in it; where they ſay, This man was he, ſpeaking of the Prince, after he was King Henry V, who made it manifeſt how neceſſary and commendable it was, for honours, according to the proverb, to change mens manners (79). In the ſame ſenſe Chriſtopher Ocland, one of our Latin Poets; and ſo Shakeſpear alſo underſtood the Hiſtorians, where he ſays of the Prince,

> The breath no ſooner left his father's body,
> But that his wildneſs, mortify'd in him,
> Seem'd to die too (80).

And tho' he had in a former play made an anachroniſm in relation of this incident, or antidated the Prince's violent oppoſition of the Chief Juſtice on the Bench, where he ſpeaks as if it was before the ſuppreſſion of Archbiſhop Scrope's Inſurrection (81); yet afterwards, in the ſame play, more conformable to hiſtorical direction, he deſcribes the Prince to have been ſo much in the heighth of his irregularities, and ſo abſolutely unreclaimed from them, till after his father's death, that it is moſt likely, from the Poet's own repreſentation, this miſdemeanor of the Prince's was not long before it.

as ſome ſay, it was expected he would, or, as others, that he did, ſtrike the Chief Juſtice; who, nothing diſturbed thereat, after ſome earneſt expoſtulation, upon ſuch interruption of the proceedings, and indignity, in that place, charged the Prince to go directly to the King's-Bench priſon, and there, to wait his father's pleaſure; but in ſuch venerable, ſuch coercive expreſſions; wherein the paternal authority of the King, was ſo inforced by the awful gravity of the Judge, that the Prince's calm ſubmiſſion to that diſgraceful puniſhment, was no leſs ſudden and ſurprizing, than the outrageous offence had been, which drew it upon him. And when that diſturbance, with this commitment, were, by ſome officious courtiers, ſo repreſented to the King, that it might foment his diſpleaſure, he diſcreetly defeated the ill-will of his informers; and, taking it in the right ſenſe, returned God moſt joyful thanks, that in this one example, he had given him both a Judge who could miniſter, and a ſon who could obey juſtice (g). 'Tis further affirmed, by many creditable writers of this ſtory, that for this, and other irreputable actions, the Prince was removed from the Council table, as Preſident thereof, and his brother, Thomas of Lancaſter, then, or not long after, Duke of Clarence, admitted in his place: tho' he was probably reſtored before the King's death, as we have ſeen ſome diſpoſitions to repentance and amendment in the foregoing note, and might find him giving other inſtances thereof, as well in the general Chronicles, as the particular Hiſtories, written at large, of his father's reign and his own. But as this was an event too extraordinary to eſcape the embelliſhment of our dramatic Poets, ſome of their audience have rather been inclined to think it a poetical invention, than built upon matter of fact; tho' it may be ſeen upon compariſon, that nothing appears in this ſtory upon the ſtage, except by the heigthning or colouring of the language, but what is founded upon the authority of our Hiſtorians, and other grave writers [F]. However, as both Poets

[F] It may be ſeen upon compariſon, that nothing appears in this ſtory on the ſtage, &c. but what is founded upon the authority of our Hiſtorians, &c.] There were two plays in which Judge Gaſcoigne was brought upon the ſtage by the Poets in Queen Elizabeth's reign, upon this occaſion of his committing the Prince to priſon. The firſt was the play of King Henry V (82), a different work from what we have now of Shakeſpear's under that name, and written ſome years before it; becauſe Richard Tarlton, the famous Comedian, who died in 1592, acted in it, not only his own part of the Clown, but alſo that of the Chief Juſtice; the player who was to have performed the ſame being abſent. In this play the Judge on the Bench was to receive a blow of Prince Henry, who was repreſented by one Knell, another drole Comedian of thoſe times; and when it was to be done, he ſtruck Chief Juſtice Tarlton ſuch a ſwinging box on the ear, as almoſt fell'd him to the ground, and ſet the whole houſe † in an uproar of merriment. When Tarlton the Judge went off, preſently after entered Tarlton the Clown; and, according to that liberty wherewith the players in thoſe days were indulged, of obtruding interrogatories of their own, in the midſt of their acting, he very ſimply, and unconcernedly, aſked the occaſion of all that laughter, like one who was an utter ſtranger to it. O! ſaid another of the actors, had'ſt thou been here, thou had'ſt ſeen Prince Henry hit the Judge a terrible box on the ear. What, ſtrike a Judge! quoth Tarlton. Nothing leſs, ſaid t'other. Then, reply'd he, it muſt indeed be terrible to the Judge, ſince the very report ſo terrifies me, that methinks the blow remains ſo freſh ſtill on my cheek, that it burns again. This, it ſeems, raiſed a greater acclamation in the houſe than there was before; and this was one example of that extempore wit or humour, for which Tarlton was ſo much admired and remembered many years after his death (83). The ſecond play in which our Chief Juſtice is introduced on the ſtage, was written by Shakeſpear (84); but he more judiciouſly therein, has ſunk the action of the Prince's ſtriking the Judge, as an indecorum too groſs and diſagreeable, into a narrative. Their ſpeeches are too long to be here tranſcribed intirely; therefore we ſhall only extract ſo much of them, as may be neceſſary to ſhew how nearly the Poet has followed the ſenſe of the Hiſtorians in matters of fact, and only rendered them more lively and emphatical, by a greater variety of argument and aggravation, eſpecially on the Judge's part, in juſtification of himſelf. For, as it was not conſiſtent with the integrity of his conduct, in the character of a Chief Juſtice, to betray that of a maleſactor, by any abject apology or repentance; ſo the Poet has very properly made him declare, before he ſaw his new Sovereign, the late Prince of Wales, whom he had ſo indiſcriminately puniſhed as a common offender, that he would never beg a foreſtalled remiſſion of him, for the power and priviledge he had exerted in right to the honour and prerogative of his office on that occaſion. Accordingly, upon the firſt interview between them, after the ſaid Prince was King Henry V, and he began to expoſtulate a little upon that rough treatment, the Judge diſcourſed him ſo convincingly into a better underſtanding of the matter, that he perfectly turned the tide of his wild blood, reaſoned him into a ſelf-conviction, and into a full reconciliation both to that treatment, and himſelf who had inflicted it; where the Poet makes the Judge intimate, that his reſentment proceeded not from the offence committed againſt him, but his royal father in him; with whoſe authority he was inveſted, in the adminiſtration of the law; and while he was upon his publick duty, in the place of his Sovereign, ſerving his country; or, as the Poet's words are,

Ch. Juſt. Whilſt I was buſy for the commonwealth,
Your Highneſs pleaſed to forget my place;
The majeſty and power of law and juſtice;
The image of the King, whom I preſented;
And ſtruck me, in my very ſeat of juſtice:
Whereon, as an offender to your father,
I gave bold way to my authority,
And did commit you. If the deed were ill,
Be you contented, wearing now the garland,
To have a ſon ſet your decrees at nought;
To pluck down juſtice from your awful bench;
To trip the courſe of law, and blunt the ſword
That guards the peace and ſafety of your perſon:
Nay more! to ſpurn at your moſt royal image,
And mock your workings in a ſecond body.
Queſtion your royal thoughts, make the caſe your's;
Be now the father, and propoſe a ſon;
Hear your own dignity ſo much prophan'd:
See your moſt dreadful laws ſo looſely ſlighted;
Behold yourſelf, ſo by a ſon diſdain'd;
And then, imagine me taking your part,
And in your power ſoft ſilencing your ſon:
After this cold conſiderance, ſentence me;
And as you are a King, ſpeak in your ſtate,
What I have done that miſbecame my place,
My perſon, or my Liege's ſoveraignty?

King. You are right, Juſtice, and you weigh this well
And I do wiſh your honours may increaſe,
Till you do live to ſee a ſon of mine
Offend you, and obey you, as I did,

Poets and Hiſtorians have generally thought it ſufficient, in repreſenting the ſame, to diſtinguiſh Judge Gaſcoigne in it, under his title only of the Chief Juſtice, without thinking it

So ſhall I live to ſpeak my father's words;
Happy am I, that have a man ſo bold,
That dares do juſtice on my proper ſon:
And no leſs happy, having ſuch a ſon,
That would deliver up his greatneſs ſo,
Into the hands of Juſtice! You committed me;
For which I do commit, into your hand,
Th' unſtained ſword that you have us'd to bear;
With this remembrance; that you uſe the ſame,
With the like bold, juſt, and impartial ſpirit,
As you have done 'gainſt me. There, is my hand.—
You ſhall be as a father to my youth;
My voice ſhall ſound as you do prompt mine ear,
And I will ſtoop, and humble my intents,
To your well-practis'd, wiſe directions (85).

(85) Shakeſpear's ſecond Part of Hen. IV. Act 5.

Thoſe who are curious to know how much, or what parts, of theſe ſpeeches are founded upon truth, may find, that the moſt material points or particulars in them, which, among the unread part of their auditories, often paſſed for poetical licence, were, long before this Poet's time, authorized, by good hiſtorical and other grave writers. One of them is Sir Thomas Eliot, a gentleman of good credit and diſtinction, not only for his ſervices to the government under King Henry VIII, but for the learning and virtuous principles he teſtified in many books, which he ſet forth for the benefit of the publick. This author, deſirous of preſenting the ſaid King with the mirror of ſuch an accompliſhed Miniſter, Ruler, or Governor as he wiſhed under him, has accordingly drawn a capital piece of ſuch a character; and in one of the chapters, to ſhew how requiſite the virtue of Placability, or a reconcilable diſpoſition, is in ſuch a perſon, has illuſtrated the ſame by an example of this incident, in it's full circumſtances, between the Prince and our Chief Juſtice; which, becauſe it has been very ſeldom, if ever, perfectly or exactly recited, without abridgment or alteration; and as his book is now grown, from it's great age, very ſcarce, we ſhall here revive it entirely, as follows, in the author's own words. ‘ We lack not of this virtue, ſays he, domeſtical examples, I mean of our own Kings of England; but moſt ſpecially one, whych, in myne opinion, is to be compared with any, that ever was written of, in any region or country. (*) The moſt renowned Prince, Kynge Henry the fifte, late Kyng of Englande, durying the lyfe of his father, was noted to be fierſe, and of wanton courage. It hapned that one of his ſervauntes, whome he favoured well, was for felony by him committed, arreigned at the Kynge's-Benche; whereof the Prynce beyng advertiſed, and incenſed by light perſones aboute him, in furyouſe rage came haſtyly to the barre where his ſervant ſtode as a pryſoner, and commanded hym to be ungyved, and ſet at lybertee. Wherat al men were abaſhed, reſerved the Chief Juſtice; who humbly exhorted the Prince to be contented, that his ſervaunte moughte bee ordered accordyng to the auncient lawes of this realme; or yf he wolde have hym ſaved frome the rigour of the lawes, that he ſhould obtaine, if he mought, of the Kynge his father, his gracious pardon; whereby no lawe, or juſtice ſhulde be derogate. With which anſwere the Prince nothyng appeaſed, but rather more inflamed, endeavoured hymſelfe to take away his ſervant. The Judge, conſyderyng the perillous example and inconvenience that mought therby inſue, with a valiant ſpirit and courage, commaunded the Prince upon his allegeance, to leave the pryſoner and departe his way; with which common commandement the Prince, being ſet all in a fury, all chaſed and in a terrible manner, cam up to the place of jugement, men thinking that he wold have ſlaine the Judge, or have done to hym ſome damage; but the Judge ſittyng ſtil without moving, declared the majeſtee of the Kingis place of judgment, and, with an aſſured and bold countenance, had to the Prince theſe wordes followyng. Syr, Remembre your ſelfe; I kepe here the place of the King your Sovereigne Lorde and Father, to whom ye owe dowble obedience; wherefore eftſoones, in his name, I charge you deſyſte of your wylfulneſſe, and unlaufull enterpryſe, and from henſforthe gyve good example to thoſe, whych hereafter ſhall be your propre ſubjects. And now, for your contempte and diſobedience, go you to the priſon of the Kynges-Bench, wherunto I commytte you, and remayne ye there pryſoner, untill the pleaſure of the Kynge your father be further knowen. With whyche wordes beyng abaſhed, and alſo wondryng at the marvailous gravitee of that worſhipfull Juſtice, the noble Prince, laiyng his weapon apart, doyng reverence, departed and went to the Kynges bench, as he was commanded. Wherat, his ſervantes diſdeigning, came and ſhewed to the Kyng all the holle affayre. Wherat he, a whyle ſtudienge; after, as a man all ravyſhed with gladnes, holding his eyes and handes up towards Heaven, abrayded with a lowde voyce: O mercifull God! Howe much am I bounde to your infynite goodneſſe? ſpecially, for that ye have given me a Judge, who feareth not to miniſter juſtyce; and alſo a ſonne, who can ſuffer ſemblably, and obey juſtice (86)! Here Sir Thomas remarks, how worthy of being preſerved in memory theſe three perſons were. Firſt, the Judge; who, tho' a ſubject, could ſo undauntedly execute juſtice on the heir apparent of the crown: ſecondly, a Prince; who, in the midſt of his paſſion, could be ſo ſuddenly ſtruck, by a grave reproof of his evil example, both with ſhame thereat, and ſubmiſſion to his reprover: laſtly, a King; who could ſo laudably rejoice, to hear of ſuch diſobedience in a ſon, by ſuch a ſubject corrected.

(86) The Boke named The Governour, deviſed by Sir Thomas Elyot, Knt. Printed by Tho. Berthelet, 8vo. 1546. Boke II. Cap. 6. p. 102.

In this account it may be obſerved, that Sir Thomas Eliot does not mention the Chief Juſtice to have received any blow of the Prince, tho' Shakeſpear, in the play, does; in which particular he is ſupported by authors as ancient, tho' in others the Poet ſeems to have followed him. And notwithſtanding that one Hiſtorian thinks this account in Eliot reſts upon his credit only (87), as to the ſpeeches we ſuppoſe, of the Judge, and the King, yet he has not himſelf over-faithfully quoted the ſtory from him, becauſe he mentions alſo, as from his authority, the blow given; which as we may ſee above, is not to be found in this author, tho' that circumſtance is aſſerted by ſome of our Hiſtorians, who wrote as early as himſelf (88), expreſsly enough, to juſtify the recitation; and more particularly afterwards, by an Italian writer of our hiſtory (89). And though Judge Gaſcoigne is not named in the relation of this ſtory, either by theſe, or ſeveral other authors who mention it, (the effect of which ſilence, or omiſſion, we ſhall ſee in the next note) yet no body will doubt the ſubſtance of it, and matter of fact, or that he was the Judge by whom the Prince was ſo committed, who has but read or heard, how early, frequently, and unconteſtedly, the Lawyers and Judges themſelves, were wont to cite this very caſe, as a precedent, in other ſucceeding caſes of commitment. We ſhall here produce but one inſtance; and that, in the words of Crompton, a grave and learned Counſellor in Queen Elizabeth's reign, which are as follow. ‘ WHIDDEN vouche un Caſe in Temps GASCOIGNE, Cheefe Juſtice D'Englitierr, que commit le PRINCE (que voile aver pris un Priſoner del 'Barre in Banco Regis*) al priſon; que luy obey humblement, et ala auxi a ſon commandement; in que le* ROY grandment rejoice, in ceo quil avoit Juſtice que oſaſt miniſter juſtice a ſon Fits le Prince, et que il avoit Fits que lui obey. Et CATLIN dit in cel caſe, que il ne uſont de monſtre in le Brē, pur que ils met pur home, mes ceo nous reſervom⁹ in nrē Pectus, car poit eſtr pur treaſon, ou grand conſpiracie (90). That is to ſay; ‘ Whidden cites a caſe, in the time of Gaſcoigne, Chief Juſtice of England, who committed the Prince to priſon, becauſe he would have taken a priſoner from the bar at the King's-Bench; and he very ſubmiſſively obeying him, went thither according to order: at which the King was highly rejoiced, in that he had a Judge who dar'd to miniſter juſtice upon his ſon the Prince, and that he had a ſon who obey'd him. And Catlin ſays, in this caſe, that they were not wont to ſpecify the cauſe of the commitment it needful to make any mention of his name, the conſequence of this inaccurate diſtinction, ſeems to have been an attempt to ſupply that omiſſion of his name by an erroneous ſubſtitute, which might transfer the ſhining character of an invincible defender of the laws, from one Chief Juſtice to another [G], without any ground to ſupport the uſurpation. Therefore

' ment in the Brief, or Habeas Corpus, but reſerved ' that in their own breaſt; becauſe it might be for ' treaſon, or ſome grand conſpiracy.' Here is a ſummary of the moſt material points of the ſtory, confirmed by the moſt credible authorities; thoſe of Sir John Whiddon, and Sir Robert Catlyn, two eminent Lawyers; the former a Judge, the latter Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, near two hundred years ago; and probably they were not the firſt who made a precedent of it, but if the old law books were to be ſufficiently inſpected, we might find others who had cited it before them. If after theſe teſtimonies there needed any further confirmation of this extraordinary event, we might ' alledge the ſolid evidence of that metallic memorial, which, not long after it occurr'd, was ſtruck in honour thereof; being a ſmall medal, not ſo broad as a guinea, repreſenting the Judge himſelf, ſitting by another on the Bench, and, with a writing in his hand, reading or ſpeaking to a perſon preſumed to be the Prince, among others in the Court before him; with this inſcription round the edge of it in the old Engliſh character; Sir Wylliam de Gaſquone (91). An impreſſion, or ſtamp of this medal, with printing-ink, as it is remembered by thoſe who have ſeen it, was made and preſerved in the margin of a large manuſcript volume, containing the pedigree of that noble family, whereunto the Gaſcoignes were by marriage allied, as is before mentioned, againſt the Rundle wherein the name of Sir William Gaſcoigne is written; which pedigree was partly deduced by Robert Glover, Somerſet-Herald, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and is alſo adorned with the arms of the ſeveral relative or collateral branches, blazon'd in their proper colours; as is uſual in the like accurate tables of conſanguinity, which have been drawn out in commemoration of the Gaſcoignes alſo, and other eminent families. But as this illuſtrious example, which has propagated ſuch a variety of encomiums, attracted ſome of our ancient Poets to flouriſh upon it, as we have ſeen towards the beginning of this note, in their theatrical entertainments: ſo does it continue ſtill to ſhine with ſuch equal luſtre and influence upon ſome Moderns, as hath induced them alſo to celebrate, in the Chief Juſtice, that ſalutary correction and reſtraint which was ſo ſignally, ſo happily, conducive to the Prince's glorious converſion, whereby he ſoon after became ſuch a renowned Conqueror in France, as in other efforts of their genius, ſo in the following Epigram; wherewith we ſhall conclude our remarks upon this part of our ſubject.

[G] Tranſfer the ſhining character of an invincible defender of the laws from one Chief Juſtice to another.] It ſeems that in default of a name to this ſtory in Hiſtory, Sir John Hody was the Judge firſt propoſed to father the ſaid impriſonment of the Prince upon; but this choice being ſoon found ſo ignorantly made, in that the ſaid Chief Juſtice could not be met with in Hiſtory, upon the King's-Bench, till many years after that Prince's death (92), his title to the action was relinquiſhed. But how well the change was mended, in fathering it upon another who was Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, and how much more properly cognizable the caſe was in that Court, may be ſeen in Bracton, Staunford, Crompton, and other writers who diſtinguiſh the proper juriſdiction of our Courts. This other was Sir William Hankford, who was Sir John's countryman; for to a native of Devonſhire, ſome Antiquaries of that county were very fond of intituling the credit of this notable commitment. And one of them ſays accordingly, that this was the noble and famous Juſticiary that dared to do juſtice upon the King's ſon (93), who afterwards was the glory of the Engliſh nation, by the name of Henry V. And upon this authority, another writer, who undertook to revive the eminent men that were born in the ſaid county, has given us an abſtract of this ſtory under the life, and in the name of Sir William Hankford (94), much as it is to be found in John Speed, and other compilers of our general chronicles; tho' neither under the name of Hankford in this author, nor that of any other Chief Juſtice: And adds this reflection, upon the Prince's immediate obedience to the Judge's ſentence, out of Sir Richard Baker: You would wonder to have seen how calm the Prince was in his own cauſe, who in the cauſe of his companion had been ſo violent (95): As if this Hiſtorian had, by nominating the Judge, authorized him to attribute the ſaid commitment to his Worthy: whereas Baker, in his recital thereof, like moſt others, neither names Sir William Hankford, nor any other Chief Juſtice. But if he had conſulted John Stow, he might have perceived that this Hiſtorian underſtood the Judge, who ſo ordered the Prince to priſon, was Sir William Gaſcoign; tho' indeed he has not very exactly ſettled the whole time of his ſitting on the Bench (96), as we have before obſerved: nor would he have found any direction in this Hiſtorian, for ſending the Prince to the Fleet; but, according to the relation he follows of Sir Thomas Eliot, to the priſon of the King's-Bench (97).

(92) Sir John Hody was not conſtituted Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench till the 13th of April 1440, and then had 140 marks per ann. allowed for his more decent port, &c. as appears in Dugdale's Chron. Series; Alſo in Chronica Juridicalia, &c. 8vo. 1685. p. 127; So he is out of the queſtion.

(97) We have been informed, that there is a lodging room in the King's-Bench priſon, which is called the Prince of Wales's chamber to this day.

Now the liberty that has been taken of tranſferring the ſtory of this commitment from one Judge to the other, ſeems to have been hence derived; that a name being ſo often wanted to an event ſo remarkable, and it was reſolved that one ſhould be ſupplied; as there was no chronological ſucceſſion of the Judges then extant, when Riſdon, or ſome other of his countrymen, firſt advanced this miſnomer, to afford any exact light or diſtinction therein: And as Hankford was a Judge firſt of one Bench, during the Prince's minority, and Chief Juſtice of the other all the time he was King, till after his death: As the time of Gaſcoigne's death was not then publickly known in Hiſtory: As Hankford might be thought a Judge of the King's-Bench, while Gaſcoigne was Chief Juſtice on it; or Hankford's ſucceſſion, in his place, might be computed ſooner than it was; he was preferred, as the moſt probable perſon to fix the ſtory upon.

But as this riot which the Prince made, was never pretended to be in the Court of Common-Pleas; whereof Hankford was one of the Judges indeed, but Sir William Thyrning Chief-Juſtice, while Gaſcoigne was ſo on the King's-Bench; as Hankford was never one of the Judges in the King's-Bench; much leſs while Gaſcoigne was Chief Juſtice there, and till he ſucceeded him: as Gaſcoigne did not die ſoon enough for the caſe to come before his ſaid ſucceſſor, in the King's Bench; therefore, if it was Sir William Hankford, who, after he was Chief Juſtice thereof, did commit the ſon of King Henry IV. to priſon, it muſt be after he was Henry the Vth, and King of England; which will not be eaſily allow'd. And as it is agreed on all hands, that the cauſe was brought before the King's-Bench, while that King Henry was Prince of Wales, it muſt conſequently be allowed to have been under the juriſdiction of Sir William Gaſcoigne. But there are greater improbabilities told under the name of Sir William Hankford, tho' not ſo much to his repetation; among which is, the cunning contrivance he is charged with, of bringing himſelf upon this account, to an untimely end (98). But it is more ſtrange, than, in all probability, true, that a grave, learned, and pious Judge, who had built a church upon his own eſtate at Annery in Devonſhire, ſhould, in his old age, turn ſuch a criminal, as to conſpire a robbery upon himſelf, even of his own life, and by the innocent hands of one of his own ſervants! deſigning it ſhould appear, a murder fore as the glory of that action seems to be sufficiently rescued, and restored, to it's right owner, from the misguiding conceptions of ignorance, or the impotent endeavours of circumvention to supplant him therein, by those authorities which have been here assembled, in the foregoing note; and as it might therefore be unnecessary to appear any further sollicitous in appropriating the fame, we shall proceed to observe that Judge Gascoigne persevered conspicuously in the discharge of his duty, not only to the last session in the Parliament-House, and the last term in Westminster-Hall, during the reign of Henry IV, but even beyond the demise of this King, to the beginning of his son and successor Prince Henry, in the royal throne, as it is manifestly apparent in the records; notwithstanding the evidence of those Heralds and Antiquaries, who, tho' respectfully to be regarded in many other communications relating to him, and his family, have in the pedigrees thereof been somewhat deficient in fixing the date of his death; and tho' it may, in the latitude of a rhetorical style, be granted, that his sitting on the Bench, ran parallel in a manner to the King's sitting on the throne (b), yet historically, or strictly speaking, the measure of the King's reign is too long for his administration at the beginning, and too short in the end. So that as all authors consent to his departure out of this life on the 17th of December, I think we may safely take the liberty of prolonging it only a single year beyond their computation; and instead of contracting it to the last or fourteenth of Henry IV, extend it to the first year of King Henry V, or 1413, unless we can think it allowable that he was summoned to attend the Parliament out of his grave [H]; as he will appear to have been, if he died the der committed, in such manner by another, as to clear him of the crime, himself of suicide, and save his effects from confiscation. For so, many Historians inform us, that, pretending to be enraged with his park-keeper, for suff'ring his deer to be stoln, he charged him that, the first person he met, at unseasonable hours, who wou'd not stand, and give account of himself, he shou'd shoot him; and that he wou'd indemnify, or discharge him. Accordingly, the keeper did meet with a man in the park, under an oak tree, one dark night, who wou'd not stand and declare what his business was; whereupon he shot him dead, and it proved to be his Master (99). One relator of this tragedy informs us, he has seen the stump of that tree, which is called, says he, Hankford's Oak to this day (100). And one motive to this desperate destruction of himself, is pretended to have been, his having committed the Prince of Wales to prison, and his dreadful apprehensions from thence, that being King, he wou'd be revenged for the disgrace (101); tho' he had preferred him, after Gascoigne's decease, to be his representative on the King's Bench; which fear, throwing him into insuperable melancholy and despair, provoked him to this preferable course, of getting himself murdered, that he might not be put to death; which is so ridiculously incredible, that it needs no other confutation, than to observe that, on the sixth of October 1423, he was confirmed Chief Justice of the King's Bench (102); which proves that he could neither be in any fear of revenge from King Henry V, who had then been above twelve months in his grave, nor so disorder'd, with any such melancholy, despair, or distraction of mind, as is pretended, when he was thought capable, to the very conclusion of his life, which happened in less than three months after, of discharging his office, and deciding causes upon the bench. And that date, by the way, may also serve to rectify another, in the inscription as quoted from his monument (103); by which, thro' some error in the copy, or defect in one figure of the date, we are led to believe, he died a year sooner than he did.

(103) In Fuller, Prince, &c.

[H] Unless we can think it reasonable, that he was summon'd, to attend the Parliament, out of his grave.] Though in the pedigrees we have seen of this family, both in manuscript and print, Sir William Gascoigne is mentioned to have died on the 17th of December, 1412; and though it is believed that Dr Fuller, in his account of this Chief Justice (104), received direction to confine himself to the same date, from Mr Richard Gascoigne the Antiquary, because he acknowledges that he was informed by him of the Judge's birth-place; and says, 'That date is fairly legible on his stately 'monument in Harwood church (105);' yet we think it will appear that there is a little miscomputation therein, and that occasioned, either through some error in the transcript from the tomb of Sir William Gascoigne, or some such dimness of one, and the same last numerical figure upon it, as might cause the like mistake in space of time, with that which we observed before in the inscription taken from Sir William Hankford's (106). For, it is credibly asserted, that Chief Justice Gascoigne gave his judgment upon a certain brief in Hillary-Term the fourteenth of Henry IV (107), or between the latter end of January, and the middle of February, the said year beforementioned, 1412 (108), which may be near two months after the time of his death above quoted, as from his tomb. And the said King Henry died on the 20th of March following, which is above three months after that date of Gascoigne's death, as it is said to have been inscribed on the tomb: yet we shall find him to have been, after that King's death, alive, and called to Parliament, in the first year of King Henry V. But if in reverence to monumental authority, it must not be granted that Gascoigne was living after the said King Henry's coronation, which was the ninth of April 1413, we must reject that speech as a forgery, which he is affirmed to have made the day after it, to those who had been his dissolute comrades, while he was Prince of Wales; whom he then summon'd before him to renounce and discharge them, after a formal manner. In this speech the Chief Justice is expressly mentioned to be alive, as it is recorded by John Trussell; who, in the preface of his history, having declared against making, or devising fictitious speeches, for any of the eminent personages commemorated therein, we shou'd the more reasonably give credit to it (109); and in the said speech, after this King had told those his companions, It was sufficient, that for many years together, he had fashion'd himself according to their unruly dispositions, not without reluctance; and wandered with them in a wilderness of riot and unthriftiness; whereby he had made himself almost an alien to the hearts of his father and allies, and so disparaged, or depreciated himself, that in the eyes of mankind, his presence was grown vulgar and stale, and like the cuckow in June, heard but not regarded; he proceeds in brief to relate how, when one of them was convented before the Lord Chief Justice, he interposed, and struck him on the face; and that he was by him deservedly committed for the same: for which act of justice, says he, I shall ever hold him worthy of the place, and my favour; and wish all my Judges to have the like undaunted courage, to punish offenders of what rank soever, &c (110). But if through any little disagreements in this speech with the more ancient accounts already related, any readers shall except against it, as doubting the genuineness thereof, there is no need to contend for it; since we have authorities, which they will think unexceptionable, from the Records themselves, to prove that our Chief Justice was living after the said King came to the crown, and was then called, as we before said, to the Parliament. For, in Sir William Dugdale, who has mentioned all the writs of summons directed to him, from the third of Henry IV, we may see the last of them, dated from Westminster, the 22d of March, in the first year of this King the year before. There is no doubt but the ſolemnity of his funeral was magnificently proportionable, as well to his eminent dignity, his honourable family, plentiful fortune, and exalted fame, as to the ſepulchral honours wherewith his remains were diſtinguiſhed in Harwood church, the Place of his interment. Upon his ſtately monument are to be ſeen the effigies of himſelf at length; and, on his right hand, one of his wives by him. He is repreſented in his Judge's robes, with his hood on; a large purſe faſtened to his girdle on his left ſide, and a long dagger on the right (i). But the inſcription which was cut on a braſs fillet, and inlay'd about the verge of the tomb, having been torn away during the civil wars, we cannot aſſert what date, or further particulars it contained, otherwiſe than from a doubtful copy, ſaid to have been taken from the monument before the ſame was robbed thereof, and thoſe particulars were legible. Of this inſcription having formerly received ſome account, as alſo of ſome other antiquities relating to the family, from the late Rev. Mr Knight, Vicar of Harwood, and other correſpondents, our reader may not think them unworthy of preſervation in this place [I]; the rather becauſe, if the ſaid inſcription meets with

King Henry V, to meet in the Parliament that was to be there held, in the third week of Eaſter; and it did aſſemble accordingly, on the 15th of May in the ſaid year 1413 (111), when, there is no intimation of the leaſt doubt to the contrary, but Sir William Gaſcoigne was at this time preſent in it. But, being afterwards incapacitated by age or infirmities, to officiate in court, or attend in the next Seſſions of Parliament, ſummoned from Weſtminſter, on the firſt of December, to be held at Leiceſter, on the 29th of January following, in the ſecond year of the King (112), and ſo on, through his reign, to the third of Henry VI, the like writs are directed to Sir William Hankford, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench; and Sir William Gaſcoigne is no more mentioned. Whence it is evident, that, as he is univocally allowed to have died on the 17th of December, it was in this firſt year of Henry V, or 1413, and not the laſt of Henry IV, as the Genealogiſts and Hiſtorians have in a ſingle year miſreckon'd. And tho' Sir William Hankford is ſummoned, by the nominal title of Chief Juſtice, in the writ directed to him, on the ſaid firſt of December, yet it is diſtinguiſhed that he was not ſo conſtituted, till the 29th of January following, which is computed to have been in the year of our Lord, 1414 (113). But though many authors in this particular point of Chronology, have thus ſhorten'd a little the line of this celebrated Chief Juſtice's life, we have met with one who has made ample amends, and ſpun it out to a length beyond all authority or belief; as may be ſeen in the enſuing note.

[I] Our reader may not think them unworthy of preſervation in this place.] The account we formerly received from the late Rev. Mr Knight, in a letter containing theſe antiquities relating to the Gaſcoigne family, may beſt appear in the words of the ſaid letter; which is as follows.

Harwood, April 20, 1742.

SIR,

'HAVING been acquainted by Mr Green of 'Wakefield, who was lately at my houſe, that 'an account of the Lord Chief Juſtice Gaſcoigne's 'Monument in my church would be acceptable to you, 'if what I have here drawn up will afford you any ſa-'tisfaction, it will be highly pleaſing to me.

'' 'Tis a misfortune there is no Inſcription now re-'maining on that monument; and the arms relating to 'the family, once viſible on the ſhields carved there-'on, are now no longer ſo; having been only blazon'd 'in colours and not cut in Baſſo-Relievo. Yet it is 'obſervable, that ſome of the armorial lines, whereby 'eſcutcheons are divided, may be ſtill ſeen upon them, 'and particularly on one of thoſe at the eaſt end of the 'ſaid monument, where we can behold the too per-'pendicular lines drawn through the middle of the eſ-'cutcheon, in form of a pale; which I am perſuaded 'once bore the arms of the family. Beſides the robes 'of a Judge, in which the effigies is apparell'd, is a 'very prevailing evidence that it was carved to repre-'ſent this excellent Lord Chief Juſtice, as we find no 'other of his ſtation or dignity here interr'd.

'' And what may further ſtrengthen our belief therein 'is, that in the eaſt window of the iſle or chapel 'where the monument ſtands, are ſome remains of 'painting on the glaſs; among which are three figures 'kneeling; whereof, two repreſent women, on each 'ſide one, and the third, a man in the middle, and 'him I take to be the Lord Chief Juſtice Gaſcoigne; 'part of whoſe ſcarlet robe ſtill appears, though the 'greater part thereof is unfortunately defaced; which 'is confirmed, by an eſcutcheon of his arms, ſtill to be 'ſeen over his head; and I take the other two figures, 'which are pretty entire, to repreſent his two wives, 'as partly appears from the arms of Gaſcoigne, which 'are, Argent, on a Pale Sable; a Demi Luce, Or; 'and are impaled with their own, on each of their 'mantles; but more clearly from the eſcutcheons of 'their own arms, placed over their heads; which arms 'are, firſt, thoſe of the illuſtrious family of Mowbray, 'viz, Gules; a Lion Rampant Argent, armed and lan-'gued Azure; a Bordure gobonated, Or, and Argent: 'the other, thoſe of the ancient family of Pickering, 'viz Ermin; a Lion rampant Azure, crowned, Or; 'armed and langued Gules. The arms of Mowbray 'are quarter'd with thoſe of Gaſcoigne, the latter di-'ſtinct. Now that thoſe painted figures and arms re-'preſent and belong to the ſaid Chief Juſtice and his 'wives, is confirmed by the pedigree of the Gaſ-'coignes, printed in Mr Thoreſby's Antiquities of 'Leeds, to which I refer you for further ſatisfaction: 'and what is more, the original of the ſaid pedigree, 'which I have ſeen by the favour of Sir Edward Gaſ-'coigne, exhibits the painted figures abovementioned, 'by a copy thereof when entire; painted in ſuch a 'lively manner upon the parchment roll, as perfectly 'corroborates the obſervations I have drawn from the 'ruinous remains of the window, which is now in a 'worſe condition than it was when I firſt made theſe 'remarks, and conſequently lets in leſs light to our 'enquiries. But that I am not miſtaken in my ac-'count of thoſe figures and arms, the remainder of an 'inſcription at the bottom of the ſaid window, as it 'ſtood when I took it, will ſtill more evidently demon-'ſtrate; which ſtands thus; Orate pro Gulielmo 'Gaſcoyne, et Elisabetha, et Johanna Uxoribus ejuſdem. I have ſupply'd, as you ſee, the 'chaſms which time had then made, and are now 'greater; yet I think, without any room to doubt 'ſuch ſupplement, as the name of his ſecond wife ap-'pears in the pedigree, to be Joan.

'' But whereas Mr Thoreſby dates the Chief Juſtices's 'death in 1412, it ſeems to be a miſtake, by what is 'mentioned in the ſpeech of King Henry V, to his li-'centious aſſociates, while he was Prince, as it is re-'corded in Truſſel's Continuation of Daniel's Hiſtory; 'in which ſpeech, this Chief Juſtice appears to be then 'living; and the ſame is confirmed by a copy of the 'inſcription, ſaid to have been preſerved, as it origi-'nally ſtood upon the monument; which I deſigned 'to have annexed to this account, had not Mr Green, 'who received it from me, been before hand with me, 'in tranſmitting it to you, wherefore it is omitted. 'And though, as you obſerve, Dr Fuller affirms, that 'the date of the Judge's death, which he mentions, is 'fairly written on his tomb in Harwood church; yet 'it does not appear from thence that he had ſeen it; 'nor is it likely that it was legible when he wrote the 'latter part of his Worthies; becauſe moſt of the braſs 'margins which contained the monumental inſcrip-with nothing to confirm the ſame, it may here carry with it ſufficient caution, or advertiſement, that others may not be miſguided by it. It is alſo obſerved, that the Arms of England are carved or painted at the foot of the Judge's tomb, with thoſe of France, Semé Fleurs de Lis (k); which Henry V. reduced to three of thoſe flowers, not long after he came to the crown, being the ſame number then worn by Charles VI. of France (l): and thus much is all we have here to obſerve of the ancient, valiant, and virtuous family, as Camden ſtiles it, of the Gaſcoignes.

(l) Fr. Sandford, as before, fol. 277.

'tions in churches, were torn away, by the ſacrilegious plunderers in the grand rebellion; whereof there are viſible inſtances in other parts of my church. But the inſcription communicated to you, which I received of a curious gentleman in London, is probably more to be relied on, than that in the printed authority aforeſaid, becauſe it ſeems to have been tranſcribed from the tomb when it was entire; being preſerved in an old volume of monumental draughts, and arms from the Windows of ſeveral remarkable churches in Yorkſhire, as they might be ſtanding perhaps an hundred and fifty years ſince; from which volume, among the MSS in the Herald's Office, it was copied, and ſent me by the ſaid gentleman, Mr Smart Lethieullier of Bond-ſtreet.

'There is a monument under the arch in the ſouth wall of the chapel, where Judge Gaſcoigne's is, which, as I ſuppoſe, is his father, and mother's, from the numerous progeny repreſented in effigie on one ſide, and at the end thereof; which progeny agrees pretty well with that in the pedigree; only, in this, a part is probably left out, for want of room. I take the other monument under the oppoſite arch, on the ſide of the great chancel, to be that of his grandfather and grand-mother, who was the heireſs of Gawthorp.

'When I ſaw the pedigree aforeſaid at Sir Edward Gaſcoigne's, and ſome other antiquities, I received from him the impreſſion of an original ancient ſeal, belonging to that family. It exhibits a perſon ſetting, who is thought to be William the Conqueror, and delivering a deed, it ſeems, to a perſon kneeling before him, who is ſuppoſed to be one of the family of Gaſcoigne, and to receive thereby a grant of lands. Other two perſons are alſo repreſented kneeling by him, probably for the ſame purpoſe; and there ſeems to be the head of another ſtanding by the Conqueror, as one of his officers or attendants. The legend round the ſeal is Sir Willeme Gasqvone. Mr Richard Gaſcoigne has left ſome obſervations on this ſeal in MS (which are in Sir Edward's hands) who writes his name as here ſet down, to the beſt of my remembrance. If theſe, or any other particulars I can furniſh you with, will anſwer your enquiries, it will be very agreeable to,

'SIR,

'Your moſt Obedient

'Humble Servant,

'R. KNIGHT (114).'

(114) He died at his Vicarage in Yorkſhire, in July 1747.

Here it may not be improper to remark, that the deed or patent, appearing, in this old family ſeal, to be given by W. the Conqueror, or one of his ſucceſſors, to an anceſtor of Judge Gaſcoigne, ſeems to be the ſame, which Mr Richard Gaſcoigne is repreſented in his picture beforementioned, to be holding in his hand, and doubtleſs he was poſſeſs'd of the old grant or patent ſo painted therein; which in all probability we ſhould find he has explained, or mentioned the contents of, in his ſaid obſervations upon that ſeal, were the curious obliged with an edition thereof from the preſs. Another account we have alſo received of this ſeal (115), with ſome further conſtructions of the images upon it; which, as they may be of uſe towards attaining the full knowledge or explanation thereof, we ſhall here alſo recite: 'There is ſtill preſerved in this family, the ſeal of the firſt William, the inſcription about it, in Gothic characters, and his name ſpelt in the Gaſcon manner, Sigillum Willelmi de Gasquone. There is repreſented on it, a King, ſitting in a chair of ſtate, with another perſon by him, who ſeems to be a coaſſeſſor, and delivering a charter to a knight on his knees before him, agreeable to the cuſtom both of the Conqueror's and Henry IId's times: and perhaps the grant referred to by this device, when the eldeſt ſon of that King Henry was aſſociated with him in the royalty (116).' As for the copy, ſaid in the letter above, to have been taken of the Inſcription on the Chief Juſtice's monument, from a MS in the Herald's Office wherein it was preſerved, before that braſs edging was ript off whereon it was inſcribed; and which, as Mr Knight has alſo above ſaid, was ſent by the late Mr William Green, an ingenious carver and ſtatuary ſome time of Wakefield (117), in a letter to the writer of this article; that letter, containing the ſaid inſcription, is alſo ſtill in being; and the ſubſtance in it, of what concerns this matter is, That in, or about the year 1736, Sir John Forteſcue Aland (118) being in Yorkſhire, took a journey of ſome miles, to ſee Judge Gaſcoigne's monument; but finding no epitaph on it, and Mr Knight the Vicar of Harwood diſtant from home, he returned unſatisfied of the intelligence he wanted; as it was thought he intended to publiſh ſomething concerning the ſaid Judge. But afterwards, by letters from London, he ſought and obtained of Mr Knight, ſuch an account of the antiquities in Harwood church, &c. relating to this family, as we have printed above: yet Sir John received not the ſaid inſcription, becauſe Mr Knight was not then poſſeſſed of it. And after Mr Lethieullier had oblig'd him with it, Mr Knight ſent him, at his requeſt, or in return of the favour, a caſt of Judge Gaſcoigne's face from the effigies on his monument, taken, or finiſhed off, by Mr Green, in plaiſter of Paris; and he gave Mr Green a copy of the Inſcription; which, as he ſent it to us, in a letter (119), dated a fortnight before that above was written by Mr Knight, we ſhall here exactly tranſcribe; after having firſt obſerved, that in one part of Mr Lethieullier's letter, above quoted in the text, it is ſaid to be the effigies of his ſecond Lady, Joan, daughter of Sir William Pickering, which lies at the right-hand of the Judge on his Monument, but in this inſcription, to be that of his firſt Lady, Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Mowbray: and yet we believe, the great difference in the chronological aſſertion of the Judge's death, no leſs than ſixteen years later than any other account, will be a greater difficulty to digeſt. But here it is, juſt as we received it Hic Jacet Willielmus Gaſcoine, nuper Capitalis Juſticiar' de Banco Henrici nuper Regis Angliæ, et Elizabetha uxor ejus: Qui quidem Willielmus obiit Die Dominica, 17°. Die Decembris, Ao. Dni. 1429 (120) Beſides the general exception to which this date, in the year of our Lord, is liable, by being ſo widely different from all authority or likelihood, the day of the week may alſo poſſibly, upon calculation, be found incoherent with the day of the month in the ſaid year; and thus much, if this date is ſuch an error as we take it to be, we thought here obſervable, to prevent the propagation thereof. GASTRELL (FRANCIS), late Biſhop of Cheſter, a man of great learning, and an excellent preacher, was born at Slapton in Northamptonſhire, about the year 1662 (a). His education was at Weſtminſter-ſchool, under the famous Buſby; from whence he was elected Student of Chriſt-Church in Oxford. There he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1684; that of Maſter, April 20, 1687; and that of Bachelor of Divinity, June 23, 1694 (b). About the time he took this laſt degree, he was Preacher to the Honourable Society of Lincoln's-inn: and was ſo eminent and admired for his ſound, elegant, and uſeful manner of preaching, that he was appointed to preach in the year 1697, the Lecture founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle, Eſq; The eight Sermons he made upon that occaſion, were publiſhed by him in 1697, in one continued Diſcourſe [A], that the ſtrength of the proofs therein uſed might appear more plainly from their connexion (c). By way of continuation, or ſecond part, of the ſame moſt important ſubject, he publiſhed in 1699, another Diſcourſe, to which he gave the title of, 'The Certainty of the Chriſtian Revela-'tion, and the Neceſſity of Believing it, eſtabliſhed [B].' On the 13th of July 1700, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (d): and, being Chaplain to the Houſe of Commons, was preſented by Queen Anne to a Canonry of Chriſt-Church in Oxford; to which he was inſtituted January 5, 1702-3, and inſtalled the 16th of the ſame month (e). He publiſhed, in 1702, 'Some Conſiderations concerning the Trinity, and the way of manag-'ing that Controverſy [C].' And afterwards put out another piece againſt Dr Samuel Clarke, upon that ſubject [D]. But his moſt conſiderable work, next to his Boyle's Lectures, was an excellent book, which he intituled, 'The Chriſtian Inſtitutes, or the ſincere 'Word of God [E].' He alſo publiſhed in 1707, a Sermon preached at the Anniverſary meeting

[A] The eight Sermons he made upon that occaſion, were publiſhed by him in 1697, in one continued Diſcourſe.] He intit'led it, 'The Certainty and Neceſ-'ſity of Religion in general, or the firſt Grounds and 'Principles of Humane Duty eſtabliſh'd; In eight 'Sermons, preach'd at St Martin's in the Fields, at 'the Lecture for the year 1697, founded by the Ho-'nourable Robert Boyle, Eſq; 8vo.'

In the Preface he obſerves, That 'in every age of 'the world we have any account of left us, the Wick-'edneſs of Mankind has much the largeſt ſhare in their 'Hiſtory; and if we believed the Complaints of the 'ſeveral Hiſtorians, who acquaint us with what paſ-'ſed in their days, we ſhould be diſpoſed to conclude, 'that thoſe particular times, we were reading of, 'were certainly a great deal worſe than any that went 'before, and that conſequently Vice having been al-'ways growing, and gathering ſtrength, as the world 'advanced in age, the preſent Generation of men 'muſt far exceed all their predeceſſors in wickedneſs: 'But though (ſays he) I have a very ill opinion of the 'age we now live in, I cannot look upon this re-'flection, as juſt and well grounded. The true occa-'ſion, both of the Obſervation, and the Complaints 'grounded upon it, he takes to be that variety of 'Wickedneſs, whereby the ſeveral Ages and Coun-'tries of the world have been diſtinguiſhed from 'one another. For there have been as many diſ-'ferent methods and faſhions of ſinning, among men, 'as forms of government; and as many changes and 'revolutions in vice as in Empire Some periods of 'time have been remarkable for open Cruelty, Rapine, 'and Oppreſſion; others for Treachery, and private 'Revenge, and all the ſecret ways of deſtruction: 'Other ages there have been, when Luxury and Riot, 'and all manner of extravagant Luſt and Debauchery, 'were the publick reigning Vices: Sometimes Pro-'faneneſs, and a publick Contempt of Religion have 'prevailed; at other times, Indifference, and a care-'leſs Neglect of all that is good; ſometimes Hypo-'criſy, and an open Pretence to piety and virtue, 'have been uſed for a cover to a cloſe and ſecret 'practice of all manner of vice; and at other times, 'men have had the Impudence to defend the worſt 'actions, by endeavouring to make them appear con-'ſiſtent with religion. Theſe, and many more ſuch 'like differences, are obſervable in the Hiſtory of for-'mer times; but the peculiar diſtinguiſhing character 'of this Age is a publick denial of Religion, and all 'the obligations of it, with an endeavour to diſprove 'the Evidences brought for it, and to offer a more ra-'tional Scheme of Libertiniſm'

In the firſt Lecture, he thus defines Religion. 'By 'Religion in general, I mean all that Worſhip, Ser-'vice, or Obedience, we, that call ourſelves Men, 'are to pay to God; or whatever we are, in any 'reſpect, obliged to, upon the proſpect of his favour, 'or under the penalty of his diſpleaſure, in this, or a 'future ſtate.'

And, a few pages lower, he gives the following Deſcription of the Supreme Being. 'I conceive God to 'be One Unchangeable Being, of an intelligent na-'ture, who always neceſſarily exiſted of himſelf, who 'knows every thing that can be known, who can do 'every thing that is poſſible to be done, who does 'every thing he wills, and nothing but what he 'wills himſelf, who enjoys an unalterable ſtate of the 'greateſt happineſs that can be enjoyed, who never 'wills or does any thing inconſiſtent with this ſtate, 'who makes himſelf the ultimate end of all he does, 'and next to that the good or happineſs of all ſuch 'beings as are capable of it; which, together with 'all other beings, and every thing that belongs to 'them, were from him, and depend upon him for 'their continuance; and laſtly who brings about 'whatever he wills or deſigns, by the fitteſt and moſt 'proper means.'

[B] The certainty of the Chriſtian Revelation, and the Neceſſity of Believing it, eſtabliſhed.] The reſt of the title, is, 'In oppoſition to all the Cavils and 'Inſinuations of ſuch as pretend to allow Natural Re-'ligion, and reject the Goſpel.' It is dedicated to the Lord Chief Juſtice Holt; to whom the ingenious Author pays very handſome compliments, and with a great deal of truth.

[C] Some Conſiderations concerning the Trinity, and the way of managing that Controverſy.] To the third Edition, which came out in 1707, is ſubjoined, A Vindication of it, in anſwer to Antony Collins's Eſſay concerning the uſe of Reaſon.

[D] And afterwards put out another piece againſt Dr Samuel Clarke, upon that ſubject.] This was intituled, 'Remarks upon Dr Clarke's Scripture-Doctrine 'of the Trinity, by the Author of Some Conſidera-'tions concerning the Trinity, and the ways of ma-'naging that Controverſy.' Lond. 1714, 8vo. Dr Clarke publiſhed an Anſwer to it, at the end of his Reply to Mr Nelſon; and obſerves, That the Objections in thoſe Remarks, were ſet forth to particular advantage, by the ſkill of a very able and Learned Writer; and propoſed with a reaſonable and good ſpirit.

[E] The Chriſtian Inſtitutes, or the ſincere Word of God.] The reſt of the title is, 'Being a plain and im-'partial Account of the whole Faith and Duty of 'a Chriſtian. Collected out of the Writings of the 'Old and New Teſtament: Digeſted under proper 'heads, and delivered in the words of Scripture.' In the meeting of the Charity-ſchools in London [F]. In 1711, he was Proctor in Convocation for the Chapter of Oxford; and made one of the Chaplains in ordinary to Queen Anne. Upon the tranſlation of Sir William Dawes to the Archbiſhoprick of York, Dr Gaſtrell being nominated Biſhop of Cheſter in his room, was conſecrated in Somerſet-houſe Chapel April 4, 1714, and allowed to keep his Canonry in commendam with that ſmall Biſhoprick (f). But being one of thoſe Prelates that were advanced during the four laſt years of Queen Anne, the Miniſtry of King George I. thought fit to frown upon him, without any ſufficient reaſon; which ſo much diſguſted him, that he oppoſed and proteſted againſt moſt of their meaſures (g). He ſhewed his zeal for the Univerſity of Oxford, in 1717, when it was attacked in the Houſe of Lords, upon account of the pretended riot on the Prince of Wales's birth-day (h). And when the Bill was depending, for inflicting pains and penalties, on his old friend and fellow-collegian Dr Francis Atterbury, Biſhop of Rocheſter, he ſpoke in his behalf [G]. In the year 1719, &c. he had (out of a tender regard for the Honour and Intereſt of the Univerſities) a conteſt with the Crown, about filling up the Wardenſhip of Manchester-college. For Samuel Peploe, Maſter of Arts of the Univerſity of Oxford, having obtained a grant of that Wardenſhip from King George I; and it being a neceſſary qualification, according to the foundation-charter of the ſaid college, that he ſhould be Bachelor of Divinity; inſtead of taking this degree regularly at Oxford [H], he procured a faculty for it from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Dr Gaſtrell, who, as Biſhop of Cheſter, was to admit him; not thinking a Lambeth-degree to be a good and effectual qualification in law for any eccleſiaſtical dignity or benefice, refuſed to give him inſtitution, and publiſhed his Caſe [I]. the preface, he obſerves, that 'ſeveral Abſtracts, or 'Summaries of Chriſtian Doctrine, had been drawn 'up, for the benefit of ſuch as will not be at the 'pains to ſearch and ſtudy the Scriptures; ſuch as, by 'reaſon of their age, are not capable of reading them 'with judgment; and ſuch as, through ſome preju-'dice or evil diſpoſition of mind, may be apt to miſ-'apply them.——But the great misfortune is, that 'theſe very books, which were intended to lead us 'more eaſily and certainly into the knowledge of 'Scripture, are moſt of them ſo framed, as to repre-'ſent the Religion there delivered to us, in a falſe 'light.——The chief occaſion of which abuſe, is, 'the many Differences and Diviſions that have hap-'pened among Chriſtians, both with regard to their 'Faith, and to their Rules and Meaſures of ſerving 'God; which Differences, as they plainly roſe at 'firſt, from a greater deference that was paid, either 'to the Traditions, or Writings of Men, than to the 'Word of God; ſo have they been kept up ever ſince, 'by a greater care that hath been taken by the ſeveral 'ſects, to inſtruct their children in thoſe things which 'diſtinguiſh them from one another, than to teach 'them the common Doctrines and Duties of their moſt 'holy profeſſion: From whence it follows, that the 'books compoſed by them for that purpoſe, muſt 'needs give a very different, and the greateſt part of 'them, for that reaſon, a very falſe account, of the 'Chriſtian Religion.——Now, for the better remov-'ing any falſe opinions we may have received from 'thoſe different accounts which are given us of Scrip-'ture by other men, as well as preventing any wrong 'judgments we might be diſpoſed to make of the 'Word of God, when we read it ourſelves; I have 'often thought (ſays he) that it would be a work of 'great uſe, to collect out of the writings of the Old 'and New Teſtament, all the Doctrines and Precepts 'therein diſperſed; to lay them together in ſuch an 'order and method, as to give the Chriſtian reader a 'full and diſtinct view of his whole Faith and Duty at 'once; and by keeping all along the Language of 'Scripture, to leave no room for miſrepreſentation. 'This is what I have endeavour'd to do in the follow-'ing Treatiſe, as being fully ſatisfied of the truth of 'what a great writer obſerves, (1) That we cannot 'ſpeak of the things of God better than in the words of 'God.'

[F] A Sermon preached at the Anniverſary meeting of the Charity-Schools in London.] It is intituled, 'The Religious Education of poor Children recom-'mended, in a Sermon preach'd in the pariſh Church 'of St Sepulchres, June 5, 1707. Being Thurſday 'in Whitſon-week, at the Anniverſary meeting of the 'Gentlemen concerned in promoting the Charity-'Schools lately erected in the Cities of London and 'Weſtminſter: And of the poor Children educated in 'the ſaid Schools, in number about three thouſand.' On Pſalm cxlvii. 12, 13.——In one part of it (2), he has this pretty alluſion, or compariſon.——'Theſe 'Schools are not like the Popiſh Monaſteries, and other 'places of religious retirement; thoſe ſtanding Pools 'of Charity, which, if they do not ſtink and grow 'corrupt, yet, being pent up within narrow bounds, 'carry no refreſhment or fruitfulneſs to other parts. 'Theſe are pure and wholſome Streams, which are 'always running, and diſperſing themſelves into dif-'ferent channels, and by that means, communicating 'their virtues to all the dry and barren parts of the 'land. The children that are here educated, will af-'terwards be diſtributed into many families, &c.'

He alſo publiſhed, without his name, A moral Proof of a Future State. And perhaps ſome other pieces, of that kind.

[G] He ſpoke in his behalf.] The ſubſtance of his ſpeech was. 'That extraordinary proceedings may 'be recurr'd to, upon extraordinary occaſions, and 'when they are evidently neceſſary for the preſerva-'tion of the State; but that this was very far from 'the preſent caſe, ſince the Conſpiracy, in which the 'Biſhop of Rocheſter was charged to have had a ſhare, 'had been diſcover'd and diſappointed long be-'fore (3).'

[H] Inſtead of taking this degree regularly at Oxford.] When Biſhop Gaſtrell firſt ſcrupled to admit the Archbiſhop's Degree for a qualification, he ſaid [to uſe his own words] to Mr Peploe; 'That, being 'in all reſpects qualified to take his Degree regularly 'in the Univerſity, he might proceed that way, with-'out any fear of being denied; but, if he deſired any 'Favour, uſually indulged to other perſons, that I 'would endeavour to obtain it for him; and I did 'not doubt but the Univerſity would readily grant it.' Upon what views and motives [adds the Biſhop] Mr Peploe declined taking his Bachelor of Divinity's Degree in Oxford, when he had actually prepared the beſt part of the Exerciſe required in order to it, I cannot tell; but ſure I am that he might have done it without hurting the Archbiſhop's pretenſions (4).

[I] And publiſhed his Caſe.] Under this title, 'The Biſhop of Cheſter's Caſe, with relation to the 'Wardenſhip of Manchester. In which is ſhewn, 'That no other Degrees but ſuch as are taken in the 'Univerſity, can be deemed legal Qualifications for 'any eccleſiaſtical preferment in England.' Oxford 1721. fol. As this Book is now grown very ſcarce, the Reader will not be diſpleaſed with an extract of it. The learned Author then obſerves (5), That the Authority of Parliament, upon which the Archbiſhop grounds his pretended Right, is Statute 25 Hen VIII. c. 21. But there being no mention of Degrees in that Act; nor any thing that, upon a careful peruſal of the Act, can lead any one to think of Degrees; the Power now referred to the King's Bench, was decided in favour of Mr Peploe. Biſhop Gaſtrell did not long ſurvive this conqueſt over himſelf and the Univerſities; for he died at his Canon's lodgings in Chriſt-Church November 14, 1725, in the 62d. or 63d. year of his age: and was buried in the Cathedral there, without any monument (i). But he left a ſufficient monument of himſelf in his excellent writings. And his virtues are far from being yet forgotten. Beſides his other honourable employments, he was one of the Commiſſioners for building the fifty new Churches in London: and a member of the Society for propagating the goſpel in foreign parts (k). He was ſucceeded in the See of Cheſter, by Mr Peploe abovementioned.

now challenged by the Archbiſhop, of conferring Degrees, muſt be couched under the general Powers there conveyed to him, which are ranked under theſe two heads, viz 1. 'All manner of licences, diſpenſations, 'faculties, &c. as heretofore hath been uſed and ac- 'cuſtomed to be had at the See of Rome, —— or of any 'perſon by authority of the ſame.——2. All other 'licences, diſpenſations, &c. for all ſuch cauſes and 'matters as ſhall be convenient and neceſſary to be had, 'for the honour and furety of the King, and the wealth 'and profit of the realm.' But Degrees, as he ſhews (6), were not uſed and accuſtomed to be had, for theſe kingdoms at the See of Rome; becauſe no body ever had a good, juſt, and reaſonable cauſe to have recourſe to Rome for them, there being always a ſtanding Power within this realm, from whence they might be obtained. And it was not likely that any perſons would be at an exceſſive charge to obtain Degrees from Rome, which they might take at a cheaper rate here at home; namely, in our Univerſities.——Moreover, in the ſame Statute of 25 Hen VIII, it being enacted, 'That 'there ſhall be two books made and drawn of one 'tenour, in which ſhall be contained the Taxes of all 'cuſtomable Diſpenſations, Faculties, and other writ-'ings, wont to be ſped at Rome:' Therefore, from two entries, made in a Taxation-book, now remaining in the Faculty-office (7), ſome have inferred the Archbiſhop's right of conferring Degrees.——But our learned Author ſhews this Tax-book (now in the Faculty-office) to be of no manner of authority, or validity (8). For it is only a copy of an ancient paper-manuſcript, taken about the year 1680; And that ancient paper manuſcript, was not one of the original Tax-books directed to be made by the foreſaid ſtatute; as appears by this very material reaſon, among others, Becauſe it is not ſigned or ſubſcribed by any body; whereas the Act poſitively orders, that every Leaf of thoſe Books (which were enacted to be made and drawn of one tenour), and both ſides of every leaf, ſhould be ſubſcribed by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor of England, the Lord Treaſurer, and the two Chief Juſtices of both Benches for the time being. And ſuch ſubſcription was abſolutely neceſſary to render the ſaid books authentick.——Beſides, in that ancient MS. paper, the number of heads upon which Faculties were granted, are 225: whereas by an order of Council in 1576, they were reſtrained to 13. And conſequently it cannot be ſuppoſed, that a book where 225 ſeveral kinds of Faculties were taxed, ſhould be looked upon as an authentick ſtandard for granting Faculties, at a time when 13 only were judged grantable, which were no way diſtinguiſhed from the other in the old book (9). Therefore, our learned Author thinks, that the ſaid ancient paper manuſcript was only a looſe collection of various matters, taken out of ſeveral different books, relating both to the ordinary and extraordinary juriſdiction of the Court of Rome, put together, with a deſign to compoſe out of it ſuch a Tax book as the Act of Parliament directed to be made, and which he believes was never made (10).——In conſidering what the Practice hath been with relation to Degrees conferred by the Archbiſhop, ſince Statute 25 Hen VIII; He obſerves, there are very few inſtances of ſuch Faculties granted before the Reſtauration (11) And concludes, that no ſuch Cuſtom of conferring Degrees can be pleaded, as will eſtabliſh the Right now claimed by the Archbiſhop; becauſe Cuſtom muſt be certain, uniform, conſtant, and uninterrupted; whereas the Practice in this caſe has been various, both as to Form and Authority, with a long intermiſſion of at leaſt 80 years, after a very conſiderable change made in the firſt ground and foundation of the pretence (12). —After having duly examined ſeveral Acts of Parliament, Canons of Councils, Records, Articles of Enquiry at Archbiſhops and Biſhops Viſitations, &c. he draws what may be called his general concluſion, That Degrees conferred by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury could never be reputed or taken to be any more than bare Titles of Honour, which were attended with no legal or canonical Effect whatſoever; and as they are conferred without Inveſtiture, ſo they give no right to any habit at all (13).
